THE TRIBES AND CASTES OF BENGAL.

H. H. RISLEY.
James Brown

With the writer's kind regards

July 1892
Oficial edition, circulated for criticism.

THE TRIBES AND CASTES OF BENGAL.

By H. H. Risley,

Indian Civil Service, Companion of the Indian Empire, Officier d'Académie Française.

ETHNOGRAPHIC GLOSSARY.

Vol. I.

τὸς πόθεν ἐς ἀνδρῶν; πόθει τοι πόλις ἥδε τοκῆς;
Odyssey i, 170.

CALCUTTA:
Printed at the Bengal Secretariat Press.
1892.
TO THE MEMORY OF

Dr. James Wise,
SOME TIME CIVIL SURGEON OF DACCA,

THIS VOLUME,

EMBODYING IN PART THE RESULTS OF HIS RESEARCHES DURING THIRTEEN YEARS' RESIDENCE IN EASTERN BENGAL, IS DEDICATED.

PREFACE.

The following volumes contain the results of what is, I believe, the first attempt to apply to Indian ethnography the methods of systematic research sanctioned by the authority of European anthropologists.

I am painfully aware that in many respects the work is exceedingly imperfect, and can hardly claim to do more than map out and define in view of further inquiry the large field of research which had to be covered. In attempting within a given time to draw up an ethnographic description of the various castes and tribes found among the seventy millions of people inhabiting the territory administered by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, it is difficult, on the one hand, to secure complete information regarding all the groups which have to be dealt with, and on the other to avoid making general statements concerning castes as a whole, which are only true of particular sections of those castes. For this reason it has been decided to bring out at first an official edition, and to invite criticism with the object of supplying omissions and correcting mistakes. All suggestions will be carefully considered, and the conclusions to which they give rise embodied in a second edition. It is hoped that criticisms may be sent in promptly enough for this second edition to be brought out within eighteen months' or two years' time. All communications on this subject should be addressed to me at the Bengal Secretariat, Calcutta.
INTRODUCTORY ESSAY:

CASTE IN RELATION TO MARRIAGE.

CONTENTS.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>The race basis of caste</td>
<td>i</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Origin of ethnographic inquiry in Bengal</td>
<td>ii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ethnographic Conference at Lahore: their scheme</td>
<td>iv</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Its scientific objects</td>
<td>v</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Its administrative objects</td>
<td>vi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Its bearing on famine relief</td>
<td>vii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>On land questions and marriage</td>
<td>viii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Its administrative machinery</td>
<td>viii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Based on Census statistics</td>
<td>vi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Obscure entries</td>
<td>xi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Method of working</td>
<td>xiii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dr. James Wise</td>
<td>xiii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The advance of Brahmanism at the present time</td>
<td>xv</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Probably typical of its advance in the past</td>
<td>xvii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Resort to anthropometry</td>
<td>xix</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mr. Nesfield's theory of caste</td>
<td>xx</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Necessity for testing it</td>
<td>xxii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Professor Flower's opinion</td>
<td>xxiii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anthropometric scheme</td>
<td>xxiv</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ethnography defined</td>
<td>xxv</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anthropometry</td>
<td>xxvi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Indian conditions favour anthropometry</td>
<td>xxvii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stratification of caste</td>
<td>xxvii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hinduism and Islam</td>
<td>xxvii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Railways and religion</td>
<td>xxix</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Race in relation to caste</td>
<td>xxx</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The method of anthropometry</td>
<td>xxx</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Three types: Aryan, Dravidian, and Mongoloid</td>
<td>xxxi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Aryan type</td>
<td>xxxii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Dravidian type</td>
<td>xxxii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The nasal index</td>
<td>xxxiii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The literary theory of caste</td>
<td>xxxiv</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Modern representatives of the four original castes</td>
<td>xxxx</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Theory of the 'mixed castes'</td>
<td>xxxvi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The origin of caste</td>
<td>xxxvii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Influence of fiction</td>
<td>xxxix</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Penka's Herkunft der Arier</td>
<td>xxxx</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CONTENTS.

Prevalence of dolichocephaly in Northern India ............... xxi
Language and race .................................................. xlii
Exogamy and endogamy .............................................. xliii
Exogamy in Bengal: Totems of Santál and Oraons .......... xliii
Totems of the Bhumi of Western Bengal ......................... xlii Totems of the Mahili, Korá and Kurmi of Chota Nagpur .......... xlii Totems of the Kurnhás of Orissa ................................ xlvii Calculation of prohibited degrees ............................... li Exogamy among the Brahmans ...................................... I Diffusion of Brahanical section-names ......................... li Territorial sections ................................................... lii
Classification of exogamous groups ............................. liii
Rajput exogamy ....................................................... liv
Kandh exogamy ....................................................... lv
Family groups ........................................................... lv
Local groups ........................................................... lvii Nickname groups ...................................................... lx
Official groups ......................................................... lx
The origin of exogamy ................................................ lx
Exogamy and natural selection ................................... lxii
Is inter-breeding injurious ........................................ lxiii
Female infanticide and exogamy ................................. lxv
The two kinds of infanticide ....................................... lxvii Origin of totemism .................................................... lxviii
Working of endogamy ................................................ lxix Endogamous groupings of the Bágdi caste ...................... lxx Widow and infant marriage ........................................ lxxi
Prohibition of widow marriage ................................... lxxiv
Causes of its revival ................................................ lxxv Considerations of property, of spiritual benefit, of sacramental doctrine lxxv
The law of hypergamy ................................................. lxxvi
Widow marriage in Behar ............................................ lxxvii
Its limits ............................................................... lxxviii
Its ritual ............................................................... lxxviii
Status of children ................................................... lxxix Tendency towards prohibition of widow marriage in Behar .... lxxxi
In Chota Nagpur ....................................................... lxxxiv
In Bengal Proper and Orissa ...................................... lxxxii
Feeling of the people as to extension of widow marriage ... lxxxiv Prevalence of infant marriage .................................. lxxxv
Origin of infant marriage ......................................... lxxxvi
Mr. Nesfield's theory ............................................... lxxxviii
His view discussed ................................................... lxxxix Influence of hypergamy .............................................. xc
The case for infant-marriage ...................................... xciii
INTRODUCTORY ESSAY:

CASTE IN RELATION TO MARRIAGE.

On a stone panel forming part of one of the grandest Buddhist monuments in India—the great tope at Sanchi—a carving in low relief depicts a strange religious ceremony. Under trees with conventional foliage and fruits, three women, attired in tight clothing without skirts, kneel in prayer before a small shrine or altar. In the foreground, the leader of a procession of monkeys bears in both hands a bowl of liquid and stoops to offer it at the shrine. His solemn countenance and the grotesquely adoring gestures of his comrades seem intended to express reverence and humility. In the background four stately figures—two men and two women—of tall stature and regular features, clothed in flowing robes and wearing most elaborate turbans, look on with folded hands and apparent approval at this remarkable act of worship. Antiquarian speculation has for the most part passed the panel by unnoticed, or has sought to associate it with some pious legend of the life of Buddha. A larger interest, however, attaches to the scene, if it is regarded as the sculptured expression of the race sentiment of the Aryans towards the Dravidians, which runs through the whole course of Indian tradition and survives in scarcely abated strength at the present day. On this view the relief would belong to the same order of ideas as the story in the Ramayana of the army of apes who assisted Rama in the invasion of Ceylon. It shows us the higher race on friendly terms with the lower, but keenly conscious of the essential difference of type and not taking part in the ceremony at which they appear as patronising spectators. An attempt is made in the following pages to show that the race sentiment, which this curious sculpture represents, so far from being a figment of the intolerant pride of the Brahman, rests upon a foundation of fact which scientific methods confirm, that it has shaped the intricate groupings of the caste system, and has preserved the Aryan type in comparative purity throughout Northern India.

Some nine years ago, when the vast array of figures called up by the last census of India was being gradually worked into shape, it occurred to the Census Commissioner that this costly statistical material might be made the basis of an attempt to extend and systematise our knowledge of the customs, beliefs, and occupations of the Indian people.
In August 1882, while the statistics of the census of 1881 were still under compilation, Sir

Origin of ethnographic inquiry in William Plowden reported that the local census officers throughout India had been directed not only to show the major castes and the occupations under large general heads in their statistical tables, but also to give in the body of their report the numbers of all castes recorded, and the names of all occupations followed by 10,000 persons or more in each province. He then suggested that lists should be drawn up for each district, showing separately the castes and occupations found in each, with their vernacular designations, to be followed by an abstract showing clearly to what larger head, if any, each caste or occupation had been attached. Finally, he proposed that when these lists had been made out, detailed enquiries should be instituted locally regarding any special caste or occupation about which further information might seem desirable, and that the result of these enquiries should be embodied in a memorandum to be appended to the district lists in question. In a subsequent letter he drew attention to Mr. Denzil Ibbetson’s Memorandum on Ethnological Enquiry in the Panjáb,¹ and

¹ This admirable paper is reprinted with Mr. Ibbetson’s permission as Appendix III to the second volume.
suggested that copies of it should be circulated to the district officials in other provinces, in order to assist them in collecting information regarding the castes and occupations of the people. The Census Commissioner's proposals were generally approved by the Government of India and commended to the consideration of the Local Governments and Administrations in India, but in no Province besides Bengal was it found possible to initiate any large scheme of enquiry. Early in 1884 the Government of Bengal recommended to the Government of India the appointment of the present writer for a period of two years to conduct an enquiry into castes and occupations throughout Bengal. "The results of the enquiry," it was said, "would be of great value in connection with the next census; but it is still more important to observe that, if the enquiry is postponed till after the next census, it will be impossible to make it so complete as it can now be made. The late census showed how rapidly the old aboriginal faiths are being effaced, and what progress is being made in the absorption of the primitive races in the great system of Hinduism. At the same time the opening of communications, the increase in the facilities for travel, and the spread of education, are tending to obliterate the land-marks of the Hindu faith, to slacken the bonds of caste, and to provide occupations unknown to the ancient polity. There is nothing to be gained, and much to be lost, by postponing this important work. If it is not undertaken now, a mass of information of unsurpassed interest will be lost to the world." While thus laying stress on the importance of the work, the Lieutenant-Governor considered that the officers of the regular staff had not sufficient leisure to prosecute ethnographic enquiries in addition to their ordinary duties; while many of them had no special taste for such enquiries. Moreover, as the chief value of the work would consist in the comparative treatment of the customs of the same or different castes in different districts of these provinces, it was essential that this comparison should be made by a single officer, who would have before him a large body of facts, and would not be confined to the data obtainable within a single district. The scheme was sanctioned by the Government of India and the Secretary of State; but, owing to administrative reasons, effect was not given to the appointment till early in February 1885.

After making some experimental enquiries in Behar and North-Eastern Bengal, and preparing a scheme for collecting information regarding the castes and occupations of the people in a systematic manner, I visited Lahore in March 1885 for the purpose of conferring with Mr. Denzil Ibbetson, Director of Public Instruction in the Panjáb, and Mr. J. C. Nesfield, Inspector of Schools in Oudh, both of whom had considerable experience in similar enquiries, and were in a position to offer valuable advice on the subject. The Conference sat from the 18th to the 22nd March, and drew up proceedings which will be found in Appendix II to the second volume. One chief object of our deliberations was to secure, so far as might be possible, that ethnographic researches carried on in different Provinces of the Bengal Presidency should proceed on the same general lines in order that their results might be of some service to students of comparative ethnology in Europe. We considered the question as to the best means to be adopted to collect original data in addition to those already on record in books, reports, and publications of learned societies. For this purpose two sets of questions were drawn up, which form annexures B and C to the proceedings. The general series (annexure B) was framed with the object of bringing out by as few and as simple questions as possible the leading characteristics of any particular caste. The special series (annexure C) goes into more minute detail, and attempts to cover the main heads of ethnographic enquiry in India. The former represents the amount of original enquiry which we considered might fairly be imposed upon the district staff, while the latter was intended for use only by those whom inclination might lead to pursue the subject further. In order to guard against the confusion which may arise from the ambiguous use of words, we also prepared a note upon certain doubtful points of ethnographic nomenclature, in which we attempted to define, for the purpose of the proposed inquiries, the principal terms ordinarily used to denote the various forms of social organization prevalent in India. The endeavour throughout was not so much to strike out new lines of inquiry as to adapt the methods already sanctioned by the approval of European men of science to the special conditions which have to be taken account of in India. Considerable use was made of the series of questions or heads of enquiry prepared by a committee of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland in 1874, and to this doubtless is owing the fact that when the proceedings of the Conference were submitted for criticism to a number of scientific experts and learned societies in Europe, we received comparatively few complaints that subjects had been omitted or inadequately dealt with. Use was also made of the set of questions given in Mr. O. L. Tupper's volumes on the Customary Law of the Panjád.

The scheme of inquiry sketched by the Conference may seem at first sight to cover a far wider range than can have been contemplated by the Census Commissioner and the Government of India. But this apparent extension was found to be unavoidable directly the attempt was made to give effect to the general idea thrown out by Mr. Plowden. In dealing with the intricate fabric of social usage, it is difficult to define the component parts of the main subject closely enough to distinguish minutely the point where administrative utility fades away into scientific interest. Most of all in the East, where religion, law, custom, and morality are all inextricably mixed and jumbled up together, would the attempt to attain such precision be futile and
It was understood, therefore, from the first that the objects to be aimed at in the enquiry were partly scientific and partly administrative. From the standpoint of the modern science of anthropology, it was hoped that it might be possible, by careful observation and record of the social practices now prevailing in Bengal, to arrive at fresh data throwing light on the ethnological problems which scientific men, such as Sir John Lubbock, Sir Henry Maine, Mr. E. B. Tylor, Herr Bachofen, M. Fustel de Coulanges, and Herr Adolf Bastian, have discussed in Europe. The principal points, which it was supposed a record of Indian custom might help to clear up, are the early history of marriage, the development of the family, modes of relationship, the early history of inheritance, and the growth of property in land. These are some of the questions which European ethnologists are interested in, and a distinct hope has already been expressed by Sir Henry Maine that something may be done to render available, for the use of scientific men in Europe, the large body of barbarous or semi-barbarous custom, both Aryan and non-Aryan, which still survives in India. It was felt that many of the ethnological speculations of recent years have been based too exclusively upon comparatively unverified accounts of the customs of savages of the lowest type; that the unrivalled opportunities for observation which European officials in India possess have hitherto been imperfectly utilised; and that such results as have been obtained have been recorded in publications not readily accessible, and without sufficient regard to the lines of investigation pursued by ethnologists in Europe. It was also apprehended that the rapid spread of education, and the growth of practical intelligence in India, may lead, within the next generation, to the abandonment of many practices which are of special interest to ethnologists. Besides the general problems enumerated above, there are various questions of special interest to students of Indian history and literature, which may be rendered more intelligible by an accurate record of the actual facts existing at the present day in respect of caste arrangements.

From the administrative point of view, on the other hand, many persons will set down the enquiry as practically useless. Indian administration, it will be said, is not made any more efficient by the elucidation of historical or pre-historic problems. Such researches are in the nature of luxuries. Government may countenance them in the same way and to the same extent as it patronizes learned societies; but they have no direct bearing upon the actual work of administration. This view is, at first sight, plausible enough, but it ignores the important fact that native society is made up of a network of subdivisions governed by rules which affect every department of life, and that, in Bengal at any rate, next to nothing is known about the system upon which the whole native population regulates its domestic and social relations. If legislation, or even executive action, is ever to touch these relations in a satisfactory manner, an ethnographic survey of Bengal, and a record of the customs of the people, is as necessary an incident of good administration as a cadastral survey of the land and a record of the rights of its tenants. The census provides the necessary statistics. It remains to bring out the facts which lie behind the statistics. The relations of different castes to the land, their privileges in respect of rent, their relations to trade, their social status, their internal organization, their rules as to marriage and divorce,—all these are matters intimately concerned with practical administration. For instance, the marriage and divorce customs of the lower castes are constantly coming into the criminal courts, and it would be a decided advantage to judicial officers if accurate information could be made available on the subject. Again, the distribution of the various castes in each district has a direct and important bearing on the relief of distress, as different classes of the population may require different modes of relief. In order to deal effectively with a famine, we want to know what is the characteristic occupation of each caste in the distressed area, what is their social status, and from whose hands they can take cooked food or sweetmeats, respectively, without losing caste. To our ignorance of these peculiarities is due the loss of life which so often results from the reluctance of people to come to relief camps where they think their notions of purity of diet are likely to be disregarded, or their caste endangered by work which to them is degrading. There exists now in Orissa a caste, called Chattar-khai, recorded in the lists of 1881, which is made up of people who lost their caste in 1866 for eating in relief-kitchens (chattras). The caste is divided into an upper and a lower sub-caste—the former comprising Brahmans, Karans, Khandaita and Gop-Goalas, the latter consisting of the castes ranking below these in the social scale. Members of each sub-caste marry within that group, irrespective of the caste to which they originally belonged; but no intermarriage is possible between members of the two sub-castes. All Chattar-khais are entirely cut off from their original castes. It can hardly be doubted that much social misery must have been endured before these people adopted a solution so entirely at variance with the principles in which they had been brought up, and that for one who became a Chattar-khai, many died of want. The same argument applies to the working of primary village schools, and to some kinds of land questions. Thus, the Mundas in Lohardugga and the Santáls in the Santál Parganás and elsewhere put forward apparently fantastic claims to privileges in respect of land, the clue to which is probably to be sought in some traditional customary law peculiar to the Dravidian races of Central India. Under the head of marriage, again, an accurate knowledge of the practices actually prevailing among the main body of the people, as distinguished from the literate castes, could hardly fail to be an important factor. in any influence that Government or unofficial bodies might, at any time, bring to bear with the object of discouraging infant-marriage or promoting the remarriage of widows. Social reforms are beginning to be discussed by the leader of native society, and a time may come when Government will be invited to exercise its influence in such matters. It is clear, at any rate, that the more Government officers know about the religious and social customs of the people of their districts, the better able they will be to deal either with the possible social problems of the future, or with the practical questions referred to above.

For these reasons it was decided by the Government of Bengal to publish and circulate the questions framed by the members of the Conference, and to enlist the aid of the district officers and of others who were in a position to help in obtaining answers to them. Experience had shown that a single person can do very little towards collecting the requisite information within a given time. To elicit facts by oral inquiry is necessarily a lengthy process, and accuracy can only be secured by testing the statements of particular individuals or groups of individuals by numerous independent observations. On the other hand, it was essential that no more labour than was absolutely necessary should be thrown upon the regular administrative staff, and particularly upon the district officers. Every district officer was therefore requested to nominate from among his subordinates one or more officers who were qualified and willing to assist, in addition to their ordinary work, in collecting information for their respective districts or subdivisions. The names of the officers selected were reported to Government. They corresponded direct with the officer in charge of the enquiry, who supplied them with copies in English and vernacular of the general series of ethnographic questions (enclosure B to the proceedings of the Conference), and indicated what use should be made of these questions in each district. The functions of the district officer in the matter were limited to seeing that the selected officers did what was required of them within a reasonable time.

Through the agency of the district officers, supplemented by a good deal of personal enquiry and correspondence, were secured the services of 190 correspondents scattered over every district of Bengal, and communicating in their turn with an indefinite number of representatives of the tribes and castes which formed the subjects of enquiry. Operations were based in the outset on a series of statistical memoranda prepared by the Census Office, showing for every thana (police circle), subdivision, and district the strength of each caste, the number of Mahomedans (who in theory, at any rate, do not recognize caste), and the occupations of both Hindus and Mahomedans. Copies of these memoranda were sent to the correspondents in each district, and they were asked to obtain by

---

1 The names of these gentlemen are shown in Appendix IV to the second volume. The work entrusted to them was, with few exceptions, admirably done, and to them, more than to any efforts of my own, is due whatever measure of success may have been attained. I may be permitted to take this opportunity of specially acknowledging the very valuable assistance and advice which I received from Dr. D. D. Cunningham, F.R.S., Professor of Physiology, Medical College, Calcutta; from Messrs. W. B. Oldham and Denzil Ibbetson, of the Bengal Civil Service; Mr. J. C. Nesfield, Inspector of Schools, Oudh; Mr. A. H. Giles, of the Bengal Police; the Revd. L. Skrefsrud and Revd. A. Campbell, missionaries to the Santalas; Mr. W. H. P. Driver, Emigration Agent, Ranchi; Babu Protob Chandra Ghosh, Registrar of Calcutta; Babu Sarat Chandra Das, C.I.E., Deputy Inspector of Schools; Mr. James Taylor, Tahsildar of Khandmals; Lala Sheo Nandan Lal Ray, Deputy Collector, Patna; Babu Bepin Behary Mukherji, Deputy Collector, Kandi; Babu Haris Chandra Rai, Assistant Superintendent of Ghatwali Survey, Bankura; Babu Adya Nath Banerji, Head Assistant, Statistical Department, Bengal Secretariat; and most of all from the late Babu Bakhal Das Haldar, Manager of the Chutiá Nágpur Ráj. My most cordial acknowledgments are also due to Babu Tara Pada Mukharji, of the Bengal Secretariat, who has acted as my clerk throughout; and has done me invaluable service in revising proofs and arranging matter; to Babu Kumud Behari Sámanta, Civil Hospital Assistant, who took nearly all of the measurements in Bengal, and made some useful ethnographic inquiries; to Chandí Singh, who, under Mr. Nesfield’s supervision, took the measurements in the North-Western Provinces and Oudh; and to Civil Hospital Assistant Alá-ud-din, who did similar work in the Panjáb, in addition to his ordinary duties and without extra pay.
personal enquiry, or by any means that seemed likely to yield accurate results, replies to the shorter series of questions for certain specified castes, and to elucidate, as briefly as possible, the numerous obscure and unintelligible entries in the memoranda which purported to be caste designations, but could not readily be recognized as referable to any known caste. Correspondents were also invited, if disposed to travel beyond the range of the shorter questions, to make use of the special questions annexed to the proceedings of the Lahore Conference. With regard to the obscure entries, it should perhaps be explained that all of them were originally written in the local vernacular by the Census enumerators, were then transliterated into English by temporary clerks, who often wrote from dictation instead of reading the entries themselves, and were set up in type from manuscript copied from this transliteration. In this way the process of compilation of itself opened the door to all kinds of mistakes. An unusual caste appellation misunderstood and misspelled by an ignorant enumerator might be misread by a clerk of small local experience, and finally be transformed past all recognition by a printer's error. For instance, in one of the police circles of the Patna district a number of persons were entered under the name ṭijra. No such caste or sub-caste as ṭijra exists, and the word was therefore taken to be a misprint for hijra, a eunuch or hermaphrodite. It being, however, prima facie unlikely that so many as 139 persons of both sexes in one thanā should come under this category, I made further enquiry into the matter, and ascertained that the people in question were Dosādhs, who had described themselves by the common padabi (title) of Hájra. What seems to have happened is this: The enumerator who filled in the schedule wrote Hájra in Urdu, possibly omitting the alif. This was transliterated as Hijra, and eventually printed as Tijra. The case is worth quoting as an instance of the transformation which perfectly simple words may undergo when the process of transliteration has to be performed by a temporary establishment of clerks on a large scale and under great pressure as to time. But actual errors and misprints, though they form a large proportion of the unintelligible entries in the schedules of an Indian census, by no means account for the whole. Names of small castes, of religious sects, of sections or septs, titles, family names, names of occupations, trades, etc., are, in our present stage of knowledge regarding the internal structure of Indian social groups, almost equally difficult to identify, even when no clerical error has occurred in the triple process of writing in the local vernacular, transliterating, and finally printing them. Before such names are finally banished in the Census Report to the large group set down as "unknown," elaborate attempts have to be made to elucidate them, and the correspondence carried on with this object between the Deputy Superintendent of Census and the district officers adds materially to the cost of the census, as the work of tabulation is delayed and an expensive establishment maintained while enquiries are being carried on. It was therefore for sound administrative reasons that Mr. J. A. Bourdillon, Deputy Superintendent of Census for Bengal, expressed a hope that "something would be done before the next census comes round to prepare a dictionary of castes and a proper classification of occupations. Hundreds of names of castes, clans, or families (containing, however, very few members in most cases) have been unavoidably relegated to the 'unknown' group, because no one could say to what main caste they belong. As to occupations, as has been explained long since, the English system of classification is utterly unsuited to this country and completely destroys all sense of proportion between the different groups, as may be judged from the fact that, according to it, 'tenant-cultivator,' 'farmer's daughter,' 'hangman,' and 'crocodile-catcher' are all placed upon the same level, and are all considered as principal occupations of the people of these provinces."
In organizing the enquiry the object kept in view throughout was to multiply independent observations and to give as much play as possible to the working of the comparative method. The local correspondents were instructed to extend their inquiries over a wide field, to mistrust accounts published in books, to deal with the people direct, and to go for their information to the persons most likely to be well informed on questions of custom, such as priests, marriage brokers, genealogists, headmen of caste panchāyats, and the like. When reports were received, they were tested by comparison with notes on the same caste collected by myself, with reports by other correspondents in the same or different districts, with accounts already published, and with Dr. Wise’s unpublished notes. Correspondents were invited to clear up discrepancies thus brought to notice, and frequently an entire report was sent back, with marginal annotations, for further inquiry upon points which appeared to be doubtful. As the inquiry proceeded, several special subjects were taken up and examined in circular letters addressed to all correspondents with the object of summarising the general results ascertained up to a certain stage, and thus indicating lines of inquiry which might lead to fuller results.

An elaborate study of the castes of Eastern Bengal was made by the late Dr. James Wise, who was for ten years Civil Surgeon of Dacca, and in that capacity had great opportunities of observing the social life of the people. I quote from a letter written to me by him in July 1885, not long before his death, a description of the admirable method which he adopted for the collection of evidence of custom:—“My system was as follows: Mr. H. M. Weathrall, District Superintendent of Police at Dacca in my day, who spoke rural Bengali as well as any native, accompanied me whenever I started on a tour. Having ascertained where any caste predominated, we went there, and invited the Purohit and headmen to meet us. Having wrung from them every particular and written down the result at once, we did the same wherever another settlement of the caste was found. On comparing the records, we arrived at the conclusion given in my notes. If still in doubt, we tested the facts by a third or even a fourth visit. I know of no plan so likely to elicit truth as this." Working on these lines, Dr. Wise collected during his residence at Dacca a very considerable mass of original information concerning the religion, customs, and occupations of the population of Eastern Bengal as represented by the inhabitants of the Dacca district. His notes also contain copious references to the special literature of the subject, and indicate very wide reading. It seems to have been his intention to prepare an exhaustive illustrated monograph on the ethnography of that part of Bengal; and with this view he employed a professional photographer to take a series of nearly two hundred photographs of representative types and groups of all classes of the people. The greater portion of his materials was provisionally worked up by him into a volume, which he modestly designated "Notes on the Races, Castes, and Trades of Eastern Bengal," but only a dozen copies of this appear to have been printed, and Dr. Wise declined to publish any part of it until it had been tested by further and fuller enquiry. In the cold weather of 1884-85 he visited India, and made a tour in Dacca with this object; but even then, from mistaken diffidence as to his literary capacity, he deferred the commencement of his systematic work, and it is impossible to gather from his papers what form he had intended it to take. In the course of this visit to India, Dr. Wise discussed with me the scheme of an ethnographic survey of Bengal, which was then under consideration, and made over to me the printed portion of his notes for any use that I might think fit to make of them. At the time of his death, which occurred suddenly on the 11th of July 1886, he had before him, and was, I believe, inclined to accept, a proposal which I made to him, that we should collaborate for the production of a book on the ethnography of the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. Some months later the whole of his papers were made over to me by Mrs. Wise on the understanding that after testing the data contained in them as far as possible in the manner contemplated by Dr. Wise himself, I should incorporate the results in the ethnographic volumes of the present work, and, by dedicating those volumes to Dr. Wise, should endeavour to preserve some record, however imperfect, of the admirable work done by him during his service in India. Mrs. Wise also sent me the negatives taken under her husband's supervision in or about 1874 in the belief that these could be used for the purpose of illustration. For several reasons this has been found impossible. Not only would the expense of reproducing them by any permanent process be greater than the Government of Bengal could properly be asked to incur, but the introduction of photographs of the types of one (and that by no means the most interesting) part of Bengal would necessarily have involved the preparation of similar illustrations for the other parts—an undertaking which would have cost a very large sum, and would have indefinitely delayed the completion of the present work.

During several years of district work in Chota Nagpore, and again while organizing the recent inquiry, some special opportunities have come in my way of observing the progress of the great religious and social movement described by Sir Alfred Lyall as "the gradual Brahmanising of the aboriginal, non-Aryan, or casteless tribes." That this movement is progressing on a large scale is beyond doubt; but it by no means maintains a uniform character throughout its sphere of action, and it includes in Bengal

1 Asiatic Studies, p. 102.
at least four distinct processes, which may be analysed as follows:—

1. The leading men of an aboriginal tribe, having somehow got on in the world and become independent landed proprietors, manage to enrol themselves in one of the leading castes. They usually set up as Rajputs; their first step being to start a Brahman priest, who invents for them a mythical ancestor, supplies them with a family miracle connected with the locality where their tribe are settled, and discovers that they belong to some hitherto unheard-of clan of the great Rajput community. In the earlier stages of their advancement they generally find great difficulty in getting their daughters married, as they will not marry within their own tribe, and Rajputs of their adopted caste will of course not intermarry with them. But after a generation or two their persistency obtains its reward, and they intermarry, if not with pure Rajputs, at least with a superior order of manufactured Rajputs, whose promotion into the Brahmanical system dates far enough back for the steps by which it was gained to have been forgotten. Thus a real change of blood may take place; while in any caste the tribal name is completely lost, and with it all possibility of accurately separating this class of people from the Hindus of purer blood, and of assigning them to any particular non-Aryan tribe. They have been absorbed in the fullest sense of the word, and henceforth pose, and are locally accepted, as high-caste Hindus. All stages of the process, family miracle and all, can be illustrated by actual instances taken from the leading families in Chota Nagpore.

2. A number of aborigines embrace the tenets of a Hindu religious sect, losing thereby their tribal name and becoming shnabs, Ramayats, and the like. Whether there is any mixture of blood or not will depend upon local circumstances and the rules of the sect regarding intermarriage. Anyhow the identity of the converts as aborigines is usually, though not invariably, lost, and this also may therefore be regarded as a case of true absorption.

3. A whole tribe of aborigines, or a large section of a tribe, enrol themselves in the ranks of Hinduism under the style of a new caste, which, though claiming an origin of remote antiquity, is readily distinguishable by its name from any of the standard and recognized castes. Thus the great majority of the Kochh inhabitants of Rungpore now invariably describe themselves as Rajbansis or Bhanga Kshatriyas—a designation which enables them to represent themselves as an outlying branch of the Kshatriyas who fled to North-Eastern Bengal in order to escape from the wrath of Parasu-Rama. They claim descent from Raja Dasarath, father of Rama; they keep Brahmans, imitate the Brahmanical ritual in their marriage ceremony, and have begun to adopt the Brahmanical system of gotras. In respect of this last point they are now in a curious state of transition, as they have all hit upon the same gotra (Kasyapa), and thus habitually transgress the primary rule of the Brahmanical system, which absolutely prohibits marriage within the gotra. But for this defect in their connubial arrangements—a defect which will probably be corrected in a generation or two as they and their purohits rise in intelligence—there would be nothing in their customs to distinguish them from Aryan Hindus, although there has been no mixture of blood, and they remain thoroughly Kochh under the name of Rajbansi.

4. A whole tribe of aborigines, or a section of a tribe, become gradually converted to Hinduism without, like the Rajbansis, abandoning their tribal designation. This is what is happening among the Bhumij of Western Bengal. Here a pure Dravidian race have lost their origin, language, and now speak only Bengali: they worship Aryan gods in addition to their own (the tendency being to relegate the tribal gods to the women), and the more advanced among them employ Brahmans as family priests. They still retain a set of totemistic exogamous subdivisions closely resembling those of the Mundas and the Santáls, but they are beginning to forget the totems which the names of the subdivisions denote, and the names themselves will probably soon be abandoned in favour of more aristocratic designations. The tribe will then have become a caste, and will go on stripping itself of all customs likely to betray its true descent. The physical characteristics of its members will alone survive. After their transformation into a caste, the Bhumij will be more strictly endogamous than they were as a tribe, and even less likely to modify their physical type by intermarriage with other races.

There is every reason to suppose that the movement, of which certain phases are roughly sketched above, has been going on for many centuries, and that, although at the present day its working can probably be most readily observed in Chota Nagpore, the Orissa hills, and parts of Eastern and Northern Bengal, it must formerly have operated on a similar scale in Bengal Proper and Behar. The well-known tenth chapter of Manu, which endeavours to account for the existence of the non-Aryan castes by representing them as the offspring of marriages between the four original castes, gives clear indications that in Manu's time, fixed by Burnell at 500 A.D., some of the non-Aryan races had already begun to intrude upon the Brahmanical caste system, while others were still in the tribal stage. Arguing from facts now observable, it seems likely that some of the castes alleged by Manu to be the result of more or less complicated crosses are really tribes which had lost their identity like the Rajbansis; for at the present day, if we look merely to customs, ceremonies, and the like, we find in the majority of cases that the admission of a tribe into the Hindu community results after a generation or two in the practical disappearance of the tribe as such. Its identity can no longer be traced by direct enquiry from its members, or inferred from observation of their usages. The Rajbansi and the Bhumij are instances of tribes in an early stage of transition, whose antecedents can be accurately determined. Later on not only do distinctive customs fall into disuse, but the tribe itself, after its promotion to the rank of a caste, breaks up into a number of endogamous groups, each of which practically forms a separate caste. But even in this extreme case the physical characteristics which distinguished the tribe tend on the whole to be preserved; and it is this persistence of the type which accounts for the differences of feature, which, though only definable by scientific methods, are marked enough to render it possible within certain limits to make a fair guess at a man's caste from his personal appearance.

These general impressions regarding the differences of physical type observable within the range of the recognized caste organization, coupled with the difficulty of throwing much light upon the true origin of the lower and intermediate castes by collating customs and ceremonies which they have borrowed in the most liberal fashion from the higher castes, suggested to me the possibility of applying to the leading tribes and castes of Bengal the methods of recording and comparing typical physical characteristics which have yielded valuable results in other parts of the world. Those methods might, it seemed, enable us to detach considerable masses of non-Aryans from the general body of Hindus, and to refer them, if not to the individual tribes to which they originally belonged, at least to the general category of non-Aryans, and perhaps to such specific stocks as Dravidian, Lohitic, Tibetan, and the like. If, for example, in Europe, where the crossing of races constantly obscures their true affinities, the examination of statistics drawn from physical measurements has been found to throw light upon the distribution of different race stocks in the population, a similar analysis of the leading tribes and castes in Bengal, where crossing operates only on a comparatively small scale, would prima facie appear likely to enable us to determine the divergence of each of these aggregates from known Aryan or non-Aryan types. Such an analysis would, it was thought, be regarded with approval by the leaders of the Hindu community in all parts of Bengal, among whom both the orthodox and the advanced lay considerable stress upon the purity of their Aryan descent: it would appeal in some measure to scientific men in Europe, and the results would command whatever political value may attach to the demonstration that a given population either is or is not composed of homogeneous ethnic elements.

The necessity of applying some exact method was strengthened by the publication of Mr. J. C. Nesfield's "Brief View of the Caste System of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh." In this remarkable work, which bears throughout the impress of Comte's historical and philosophical speculations, the view is put forward that "the bond of sympathy or interest which first drew together the families or tribal fragments, of which a caste is composed, and formed them into a new social unit, was not, as some writers have alleged, community of creed or community of kinship, but community of function. Function, and function only, as I think, was the foundation upon which the whole caste system of India was built up." In introducing his theory Mr. Nesfield points out in language which leaves little to be desired on the score of clearness and emphasis, that it is incompatible "with the modern doctrine which divides the population of India into Aryan and aboriginal. It presupposes an unbroken continuity in the national life from one stage of culture to another, analogous to what has taken place in every other country in the world whose inhabitants have emerged from the savage state. It assumes, therefore, as its necessary basis, the unity of the Indian race. While it does not deny that a race of 'white-complexioned foreigners,' who called themselves by the name of Arya, invaded the Indus valley vici Kabul and Kashmir some four thousand years ago and imposed their language and religion on the indigenous races by whom they found themselves surrounded, it nevertheless maintains that the blood imported by this foreign race became gradually absorbed into the indigenous, the less yielding to the greater, so that almost all traces of the conquering race eventually disappeared, just as the Lombard became absorbed into the Italian, the Frank into the Gaul, the Roman (of Roumania) into the Slav, the Greek (of Alexandria) into the Egyptian, the Norman into the Frenchman, the Moor (of Spain) into the Spaniard; and as the Norwegians, Germans, etc., are at this day becoming absorbed into Englishmen in North America, or as the Portuguese (of India) have already become absorbed into Indians. I hold that for the last three thousand years at least no real difference of blood between Aryan and aboriginal (except perhaps in a few isolated tracts, such as Rájputana, where special causes may have occurred to prevent the complete amalgamation of race) has existed; and the physiological resemblance observable between the various classes of the population, from the highest to the lowest, is an irrefragable proof that no clearly defined racial distinction has survived—a kind of evidence which ought to carry much greater weight than that of language, on which so many fanciful theories of ethnology have been lately founded. Language is no test of race; and the question of caste is not one of race at all, but of culture. Nothing has tended to complicate the subject of caste so much as this intrusion of a philological theory, which within its own province is one of the most interesting discoveries of modern times, into a field of enquiry with which it has no connection. The 'Aryan brother' is indeed a much more mythical being than Ráma or Krishna, or any other of the popular heroes of Hindu tradition whom writers of the Aryan school have vainly striven to attenuate into solar myths. The amalgamation of the two races (the Aryan and the Indian) had been completed in the Panjáb as we may gather from the Institutes of Manu) before the Hindu, who is the result of this amalgamation, began to extend his influence into the Ganges valley, where by slow and sure degrees he dissemi-inated among the indigenous races those social and religious maxims which have been spreading wider and wider ever since throughout the continent of India, absorbing one after another, and to some extent civilizing, every indigenous race with whom they are brought into contact, raising the choice spirits of the various tribes into the rank of Brahman or Chhatri, and leaving the rest to rise or fall in the social scale according to their capacities and opportunities."

A theory which assumed so scientific a form and led up to such important social and political Necessity for testing it.

conclusions was obviously entitled to be tried by a more precise test than the vague personal impressions concerning the physical type and race affinities of particular castes or tribes which figure so largely in Indian ethnological literature. Evidence showing resemblances or differences of custom, religion, social status, culture and profession would clearly afford no sure grounds for criticizing an hypothesis based on the assumption of the substantial identity in physical type of the numberless distinct aggregates which make up the population of India.
Once concede this identity of type, and the question of the real origin of Indian caste recedes into a dim pre-historic distance, where it would be waste of labour to attempt to follow it. If it were really true, as Mr. Nesfield supposes, that “the great majority of Brahmans are not of lighter complexion or of finer and better bred features than any other caste:” if, to quote another passage, a stranger walking through the class-rooms of the Sanskrit College at Benares
"would never dream of supposing that the students seated before him were distinct in race and blood from the scavengers who swept the roads," we might either accept Mr. Nesfield's hypothesis on the ground that it is as likely to be true as any other, or might put the problem aside altogether for the sufficient reason that no data would be available for its solution. If, on the other hand, as many competent observers hold, marked differences of type may be traced within the limits of the caste system, the modern system of anthropometry might, it seemed, be relied upon, if applied on a sufficiently large scale, to distinguish some of the leading types, and perhaps even to furnish a clue to their origin. It would at any rate form an effective, if not a conclusive, test of the validity of the assumption on which Mr. Nesfield's theory rests, while it might, at the same time, contribute materially to the solution of other problems concerning the true affinities of particular tribes or groups of tribes.

Starting with this general idea, I wrote to Professor Flower, F.R.S., Director of the Natural History Department of the British Museum, explaining the nature of the enquiry on which I was engaged and the particular difficulty which I desired to overcome, and asked for his advice as to the character and number of the measurements to be taken, the apparatus which should be used, and the form in which the results should be recorded. In a long letter, discussing the subject very thoroughly, Professor Flower observed:—"I entirely agree with you that physical characters are the best—in fact, I may say the only true—tests of race, that is, of real affinity. Language, customs, etc., may help or give indications, but they are often misleading. Therefore the physical examination which you propose to make of the tribes of the Indian empire will be most important. The difficulty, however, is to define and test these characters. I have endeavoured, in my last address to the Anthropological Institute, to formulate what is known of the differences between the great divisions of the human race, and these are easy enough when we meet with pure examples. There is of course no mistaking a Mongol Tartar, a pure Caucasian, or a Negro. But the differences you will meet with among the different tribes of India are much more difficult of discrimination; for although you may have a Mongolic element along the northern and eastern frontier, and possibly a Negro or Negrito element forming a substratum of the population in the southern part of the Peninsula, I take it that the great mass of the people of India Proper belong to the great division of the human species, which (for want of a better name) may still be called Caucasian, and whether Aryan, Dravidian, or whatever else, will be found to agree in their main physical characteristics, although they may possibly be separated by slight characters, which would be elucidated by such an investigation as that you have in hand. Such characters will in my opinion be found chiefly in the features and not in the proportions of the cranium: the shape of the nose, mouth, and cheeks, though so difficult of definition, are wonderfully characteristic of sub-races. Of course they vary individually, but averages can be obtained from large numbers which should be pretty constant. The nasal index (height and breadth of nose compared) is perhaps the most valuable means of distinguishing races in the skull, and I should think it ought also to be the same in the living. As far as I have been able to observe, the proportions of the cranium (when a sufficient number are observed) are pretty constant throughout the whole Indian peninsula, ranging between dolicho and meso-cephaly, the only tendency to brachy-cephaly being where the Mongolic element has been introduced in the north."

For fuller instructions concerning the mode of operations to be followed, Professor Flower referred me to the exhaustive work "Les Éléments d'Anthropologie Générale," by Dr. Paul Topinard, Professor of the School of Anthropology and Secretary to the Anthropological Society of Paris. Having satisfied myself that Professor Topinard's instructions for dealing with living subjects, and the instruments prescribed by him, were applicable to Indian conditions, I proceeded, after making some experimental measurements in Rangpur, to frame a complete scheme for giving effect to his system in Bengal. This scheme was submitted to Professors Flower and Topinard for criticism, and, after having received their approval, was sanctioned by the Government of Bengal, the services of Civil Hospital Assistant Babu Kumud Behari Sémanta, then attached to the Tibet Mission, being placed at my disposal for the purpose of taking measurements. After some experience had been gained in the working of the system in Bengal, proposals were drawn up for extending it to other parts of India. In the North-West Provinces Sir Alfred Lyall sanctioned a special grant of Rs. 1,000 for instruments, measuring agency, etc., and a fine series of measurements were taken by Chandi Singh, an ex-pupil of the Balrampur Medical School, under the supervision of Mr. J. C. Nesfield, Inspector of Schools for Oudh, himself a high authority upon the castes of that part of India. A small but interesting set of measurements was also taken in the Panjáb by Civil Hospital Assistant Alá-ud-din under the supervision of Deputy Surgeon-General Stephen. In every case the measurers were taught the use of the instruments by me, and were supplied with printed instructions, defining the procedure with extreme minuteness of detail, and discussing at length a variety of difficulties which experience had suggested to me.

Before attempting to sketch the main results of the Bengal inquiries we may pause for a moment to take stock of our terminology. Thanks to Sir John Lubbock and Dr. E. B. Tylor, the study of ethnography has of late years begun to be understood in England. "It embraces," says M. Elisee Reclus, "the descriptive details, and ethnology the rational exposition, of the human aggregates and organizations known as hordes, clans, tribes, and nations, especially in the earlier, the savage, and barbarous stages of their progress." In other words, ethnography collects and arranges large masses of social data;
etnology applies the comparative method of investigation, and frames by this means hypotheses concerning the origin of the tribes themselves.

The less familiar anthropometry has an ancient and curious history. By its aid the Egyptian sculptors of Carnac and Memphis worked out an artistic canon of the ideal proportions of the human figure, the influence of which may be traced in Greek art, which was studied by Da Vinci and Dürer, and which has descended to French studies in the form given to it by their contemporary Jean Cousin. Its latest application may be witnessed in a branch of the Prefecture of Police at Paris, where the features and limbs of convicted criminals are measured under scientific supervision, and the results recorded with a view to tracing their identity in future. For our present purpose an-thropometry may be defined as the science which seeks, by measuring certain leading physical characters, such as the stature and the proportions of the head, features, and limbs, to ascertain and classify the chief types of mankind, and eventually by analysing their points of agreement and difference to work back to the probable origin of the various race-stocks now traceable. Like ethnography and ethnology, it forms part of the circle of studies grouped together under the head of anthropology.

Looked at merely as a scientific experiment, an anthropometric examination of even a small fraction of the people of India promised to yield results of no ordinary interest.
Nowhere else in the world do we find the population of a large continent broken up into an infinite number of mutually exclusive aggregates, the members of which are forbidden by an inexorable social law to marry outside of the group to which they themselves belong. Whatever may have been the origin and the earlier developments of the caste system, this absolute prohibition of mixed marriages stands forth at the present day as its essential and most prominent characteristic, and the feeling against such unions is so deeply engrained in the people that even the Theistic and reforming sect of the Brahmo Samaj has found a difficulty in freeing itself from the ancient prejudices. In a society thus organized, a society sacrificing everything to pride of blood and the idea of social purity, it seemed that differences of physical type, however produced in past time, might be expected to manifest a high degree of persistence, and that the science which seeks to trace and express such differences would find a peculiarly favourable field for its operations. In Europe anthropometry has to confess itself hindered, if not baffled, by the constant intermixture of races which tends to obscure and confuse the data arrived at by measurement. In a country where such intermixture is to a large extent eliminated, there were grounds for believing that divergent types would reveal themselves more clearly, and that their characteristics would furnish some clue to their original race affinities.

Apart from these special conditions, the necessity of having recourse to methods of research more exact in their character and less misleading in their results than the mere collation of customs and beliefs is brought into prominence by the transformation which religion is gradually bringing about in Indian society. At the risk of driving patient analogy too hard, we may perhaps venture to compare the social gradations of the Indian caste system to a series of geological deposits. The successive strata in each series occupy a definite position determined by the manner of their formation, and the varying customs in the one may be said to represent the fossils in the other. The lowest castes preserve the most primitive customs, just as the oldest geological formations contain the simplest forms of organic life. Thus the totems or animal-names, by which the Mundas and Oraons regulate their matrimonial arrangements, give place, as we travel upwards in the social scale, to group-names based upon local and territorial distinctions, while in the highest castes kinship is reckoned by descent from personages closely resembling the eponymous heroes of early Greek tradition. Even the destructive agencies to which the imperfection of the geological record is attributed have their parallel in the transforming influence by which the two great religions of modern India, Brahmanism and Islam, have modified the social order. A curious contrast may be discerned in their methods of working and in the results which they produce.

Islam is a force of the volcanic sort, a burning and integrating force, which, under favourable conditions, may even make a nation. It melts and fuses together a whole series of tribes, and reduces their internal structure to one uniform pattern, in which no survivals of pre-existing usage can be detected. The separate strata disappear; their characteristic fossils are crushed out of recognition, and a solid mass of law and tradition occupies their place. Brahmanism knows nothing of open proselytism or forcible conversion, and attains its end in a different and more subtle fashion, for which no precise analogue can be found in the physical world. It leaves existing aggregates very much as they were, and so far from welding them together, after the manner of Islam, into larger cohesive aggregates, tends rather to create an indefinite number of fresh groups; but every tribe that passes within the charmed circle of Hinduism inclines sooner or later to abandon its more primitive usages or to clothe them in some Brahmanical disguise. The strata, indeed, remain; or are multiplied; their relative positions are, on the whole, unaltered; only their fossils are metamorphosed into more advanced forms. One by one the ancient totems drop off, or are converted by a variety of ingenious devices into respectable personages of the standard mythology; the fetish gets a new name, and is promoted to the Hindu Pantheon in the guise of a special incarnation of one of the greater gods; the tribal chief sets up a family priest, starts a more or less romantic family legend, and in course of time blossoms forth as a new variety of Rajput. His people follow his lead, and make haste to sacrifice their women at the shrine of social distinction. Infant-marriage with all its attendant horrors is introduced; widows are forbidden to marry again; and divorce, which plays a great and, on the whole, a useful part in tribal society, is summarily abolished. Throughout all these changes, which strike deep into the domestic life of the people, the fiction is maintained that no real change has taken place, and everyone believes, or affects to believe, that things are with them as they have been since the beginning of time.

It is curious to observe that the operation of these tendencies has been quickened, and the sphere of their action enlarged, by the great extension of railways which has taken place in India during the last few years. Both Benares and Manchester have been brought nearer to their customers, and have profited by the increased demand for their characteristic wares. Siva and Krishna drive out the tribal gods as surely as grey shirtings displace the more durable hand-woven cloth. Pilgrimages become more pleasant and more popular, and the touts, who sally forth from the great religious centres to promote these pious excursions, find their task easier and their clients more open to persuasion than was the case even twenty years ago. A trip to Jagannáth or Gya is no longer the formidable and costly undertaking that it was. The Hindu peasant who is pressed to kiss the footprints of Vishnu, or to taste the hallowed rice that has been offered to the Lord of the World, may now reckon the journey by days instead of months. He need no longer sacrifice the savings of a lifetime to this pious object, and he has a reasonable prospect of returning home none the worse for a week's indulgence of religious enthusiasm. Even the distant Mecca has been brought, by means of Messrs. Cook's steamers and return-tickets, within the reach of the faithful in India; and the influence of Mahomedan missionaries and return pilgrims has made itself felt in a quiet but steady revival of orthodox usage in Eastern Bengal.

Rapidly as the levelling and centralising forces do their work, a considerable residue of really primitive usage still resists their transforming influence. The race element remains, for the most part, untouched. Diversity of type is still the rule, and identity the exception among the manifold groupings of the Indian people. To a practised eye the personal appearance of most Hindus gives a fairly accurate clue to their caste; and within certain limits it is even possible to determine the strata of the population to which given sections of Mahomedans must have belonged before their conversion to Islam.

The scientific methods which anthropometry prescribes attempt to fix vague personal impressions by reducing them to statistical formulas. No one could mistake a Brahman for a Kol, but the most minute verbal description of their characteristic differences of feature falls far short of the numerical analysis that can be arrived at by measuring specific dimensions of the head, nose, cheekbones, orbits, forehead, and zygomatic arches, and working out their proportions by the system of indices invented by the Swedish anthropologist, Anders Retzius, in 1842. Add to these weight, stature, and the facial angle devised by Cuvier, extend the observations to about a hundred specimens of each group, and it will be found that the averages calculated from this mass of figures bring out a uniform tribal type to which all individuals tend to conform. The data thus obtained from nearly Three types: Aryan, Dravidian, and Mongoloid.

6,000 persons, representing 89 of the leading castes and tribes in Northern India, from the Bay of Bengal to the frontiers of Afghanistan, enable us to distinguish two extreme types of feature and physique, which may be provisionally described as Aryan and Dravidian. A third type which in some respects may be looked upon as intermediate between these two, while in other, and perhaps the most important, points it can hardly be deemed Indian at all, is found along the northern and eastern borders of Bengal. Its most prominent characters are a relatively short (brachycephalic) head; a broad face; a short, wide nose, very low in the bridge, and in extreme cases almost bridgeless; high and projecting cheekbones, and eyelids peculiarly formed so as to give the impression that the eyes are obliquely set in the head. With this type, which may conveniently be described as Mongoloid, we have for our present purpose no immediate concern. Except in the districts of Assam and North-Eastern Bengal, it has contributed comparatively little to the evolution of caste as it now exists in India, and may be left out of consideration in the attempt to trace the stages of growth by which the prevailing state of things has been arrived at.

In adopting, even tentatively, the designations Aryan and Dravidian I am aware that I am disregarding advice which Professor Max Müller was good enough to give me, about three years ago, in a letter since published (I believe) in an Appendix to his latest work. He warned me against the confusion which might arise from using philological terms to denote ethnological conclusions. I am entirely sensible of the value and the necessity of the warning, and fully recognize his right to speak with authority on such questions. But we must have some general names for our types: it is a thankless task to invent new names; and I trust to justify my invasion of the domain of philology by the universal practice of the Indians themselves, and by the example of Professor Sayce, who did not hesitate, on a recent occasion to speak of the Aryan race as an established ethnic aggregate.

The Aryan type, as we find it in India at the present day, is marked by a relatively long (dolichocephalic) head; a straight, finely cut (lepto-rhine) nose; a long, symmetrically narrow face; a well-developed forehead, regular features, and a high facial angle. The stature is fairly high, ranging from 171.6 centimeters in the Sikhs of the Panjáb to 165.6 in the Brahmans of Bengal; and the general build of the figure is well proportioned, and slender rather than massive. In the castes which exhibit these characteristics the complexion is a very light transparent brown—"wheat-coloured" is the common vernacular description—noticeably fairer than that of the mass of the population. Colour, however, is a character which eludes all attempts to record or define its gradations, and even the extreme varieties can only be described in very general terms. As representative Aryan groups we may name the Sikhs and Khatris of the Panjáb, and the Brahmans, Kayasths, Babhans, and Chattris of Bengal and the North-West Provinces. A larger series of measurements would probably add several more castes to the list, especially in the Panjáb, where the observations were greatly restricted by financial difficulties.

In the Dravidian type the form of the head usually inclines to be dolichocephalic, but all other characters present a marked contrast to the Aryan. The nose is thick and broad, and the formula expressing its proportionate dimensions is higher than in any known race, except the Negro. The facial angle is comparatively low; the lips are thick; the face wide and fleshy; the features coarse and irregular. The average stature ranges in a long series of tribes from 156.2 to 162.1 centimeters; the figure is squat, and the limbs sturdy. The colour of the skin varies from very dark brown to a shade closely approaching black. The most characteristic Dravidian tribes are the Málé Pahárias of the Rajmahal hills, and the Mundas and Oraons of the Chota Nagpur plateau. The two latter are better known under the general name of Kol, which, according to Herr Jellinghaus, a good authority on this subject, means "pig-killer" or "pig-eater," and belongs to the large class of epithets by which, since Vedic times, the Aryans have expressed their contempt for the voracious and promiscuous appetite of the Dravidian. Others, however, and this is perhaps the better opinion, regard Kol as a corruption of Hor or Horo, the Mundari word for 'man,' which has been adopted as the name of the tribes in question.

Between these extreme types, which may fairly be regarded as representing two distinct races, we find a large number of intermediate groups, each of which forms for matrimonial purposes a sharply defined circle, beyond which none of its members can pass. By applying to the entire series the nasal index or formula of the proportions of the nose, which Professors Flower and Topinard agree in regarding as the best test of race distinctions, some remarkable results are arrived at. The average nasal proportions of the Málé Pahária tribe are expressed by the figure 94.5, while the pastoral Gujars of the Panjáb have an index of 66.9, the Sikhs of 68.8, and the Bengal Brahmans and Kayasths of 70.4. In other words, the typical Dravidian, as represented by the Málé Pahária, has a nose as broad in proportion to its length as the Negro, while this feature in the Aryan group can fairly bear comparison with the noses of sixty-eight Parisians, measured by Topinard, which gave an average of 69.4. Even more striking is the curiously close correspondence between the gradations of racial type indicated by the nasal index and certain of the social data ascertained by independent inquiry. If we take a series of castes in Bengal, Behar, or the North-Western Provinces, and arrange them in the order of the average nasal index, so that the caste with the finest nose shall be at the top, and that with the coarsest at the bottom of the list, it will be found that this order substantially corresponds with the accepted order of social precedence. The casteless tribes, Kola, Korwas, Mundas, and the like, who have not yet entered the Brahmanical system, occupy the lowest place in both series. Then come the vermin-eating Musahars and the leather-dressing Chamárs. The fisher castes of Bauri, Bind, and Kewat are a trifle higher in the scale; the pastoral Goala, the cultivating Kurmi, and a group of cognate castes from whose hands a Brahman may take water, follow in due order, and from them we pass to the trading Khatris, the landholding Bábhans, and the upper crust of Hindu society. Thus, it is scarcely a paradox to lay down as a law of the caste organization in Eastern India that a man's social status varies in inverse ratio to the width of his nose. Nor is this the only point in which the two sets of observations—the social and the physical—bear out and illustrate each other. The character of the curious matrimonial groupings for which the late Mr. J. F. McLennan devised the happy term exogamous, also varies in a definite relation to the gradations of physical type. Within a certain range of nasal proportions, these subdivisions are based almost exclusively on the totem. Along with a somewhat finer form of nose, groups called after villages and larger territorial areas, or bearing the name of certain tribal or communal officials, begin to appear, and above these again we reach the eponymous saints and heroes, who in India, as in Greece and Rome, are associated with a certain stage of Aryan progress.

The nasal index.

It would be vain to attempt within the compass of this essay to analyse and compare the large mass of figures which has been collected, or to develop at length the inferences which they may be thought to suggest. I can only glance at a few of their more important bearings. In the first place, it deserves notice that the data obtained by the most modern anthropological method agree in the main not only with the long chain of Indian tradition, beginning with the Vedas and ending with the latest vernacular treatise on the theory and practice of caste, but also with the rationalised and critical story of the making of the Indian peoples, as it has been told by Sir William Hunter in the Imperial Gazetteer. Here the historian shows how, through the veil of fable and miracle in which pre-historic India is shrouded, traces may be discerned of a protracted struggle between a lower and a higher race, which would have tended to produce much the same results as our statistics bring out. Studied in the light of these statistics it would seem that the standard Indian theory of caste may deserve more respectful consideration than has been accorded to it of late years.

The division of the people into four classes corresponding roughly to the chief professions or modes of life of the time is in itself plausible enough, and is supported by parallel cases in the history of ancient societies. It is nowhere stated that these groups were rigidly exclusive, like modern castes, and the rules laid down to regulate their intermarriage show a general resemblance to those observed by the Kulin classes of to-day. So far as anthropological considerations are concerned, there would be no great difficulty in our recognizing the Brahmans, Rajputs and higher trading castes as descendants of the three upper classes—Brahmans, Kshatriyas, and Vaisyas—of the ancient Aryan Commonwealth. The Sudras alone have no compact aggregate as their modern representative. But the fourth caste in the ancient system was apparently not of pure Aryan descent, and it is a plausible conjecture that it may have been constantly recruited by the admission of Dravidian elements.

Modern representatives of the four original castes.

The dominant Aryan society must have exercised a strong attraction on the Dravidians, but the only caste into which the latter could ordinarily expect to be received would be the Sudra. Their admission into this group would doubtless have been facilitated by resort to the fiction, characteristic of all early societies, that they had belonged to it all along. But such accretions must have swelled the caste to unwieldy dimensions, and thus have introduced the tendency to disintegration or fission, which affects all social aggregates in India. In course of time, as new groups split off, and took to themselves new names, the original caste would have been, so to speak, lost in the crowd, and only a small nucleus would have retained its original designation. In support of the hypothesis that the survivors of the ancient Sudras are to be sought among the higher strata of the so-called mixed castes, we may point to the fact that a group of castes, whose physical characters approach more closely to the Aryan than to the Dravidian type, still cling to the name Sudra, and regard themselves as descendants of the classical fourth caste.

Modern criticism has been especially active in its attacks on that portion of the traditional theory which derives the multitude of mixed or inferior castes from an intricate series of crosses between members of the original four. No one can examine the long lists which purport to illustrate the working of this process without being struck by much that is absurd and inconsistent. But in India it does not necessarily follow that, because the individual applications of a principle are ridiculous, the principle itself can have no foundation in fact. The last thing that would occur to the literary theorists of those times, or to their successors, the pandits of to-day, would be to go back upon actual facts, and to seek by analysis and comparison to work out the true stages of evolution. They found, as I infer from troublesome experience among some of my Indian coadjutors, the à priori method simpler and more congenial. That at least did not compel them to pollute their souls by the study of plebeian usage. Having once got hold of a formula, they insisted, like Thales and his contemporaries, in making it account for the entire order of things. Thus, castes which had been developed out of corporations like the mediæval trade guilds, or which expressed the distinction between fishing and hunting, agriculture and handicrafts, were all supposed to have been evolved by interbreeding.

But the initial principle, though it could not be stretched to explain everything, was in the main correct. It happens that we can still observe its workings among a number of Dravidian tribes, which, though not yet drawn into the vortex of Brahmanism, have been in some degree affected by the example of Hindu organization. As regards intertribal marriages, they seem to be in a stage of development through which the Hindus themselves have passed. A man may marry a woman of another tribe, but the offspring of such unions do not become members of either the paternal or maternal groups, but belong to a distinct endogamous aggregate, the name of which often denotes the precise cross by which it was started. Among the large tribe of Mudas we find, for instance, nine such groups—Khangar-Munda, Kharia-Munda, Konkpat-Munda, Karanga-Munda, Mahili-Munda, Nágbansi-Munda, Oraon-Munda, Sad-Munda, Savar-Munda—descended from intermarriages between Munda men and women of other tribes. The Mahilis, again, have five sub-tribes of this kind, and themselves trace their descent to the union of a Munda with a Santál woman. Illustrations of this sort might be multiplied almost indefinitely. The point to be observed is that the sub-tribes formed by inter-tribal crossing are from an early stage complete endogamous units, and that they tend continually to sever their slender connection with the parent group, and stand forth as independent tribes. As soon as this comes to pass, and a functional or territorial name disguises their mixed descent, the process by which they have been formed is seen to resemble closely that by which the standard Indian tradition seeks to explain the appearance of other castes alongside of the classical four.

From the literary theory of caste we are led on to speculate regarding the origin of caste itself. How comes it that the Aryan race, which in South Europe, as Herr Penka has shown, has modified its physical type by free intermixture with Turanian elements, displayed in India a marked antipathy to marriage with persons of alien race, and devised an elaborate system of taboo for the prevention of such unions? An explanation may, perhaps, be found in the fact that in India alone were the Aryans brought into close contact with an unequivocally black race. The sense of differences of colour, which, for all our talk of common humanity, still plays a great, and, politically, often an inconvenient, part in the history of the world, finds forcible expression in the Vedic descriptions of the people whom the Aryans found in possession of the plains of India. In a well-known passage the god Indra is praised for having protected the Aryan colour, and the word meaning colour (varna) is used down to the present day as the equivalent of caste, more especially with reference to the castes believed to be of Aryan descent. Another text depicts the Dasyus or Dravidians as noseless; others dwell on their low stature, their coarse features, and their voracious appetite. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that from these sources there might be compiled a fairly accurate anthropological definition of the Dravidian tribes of to-day. When it is added that the aggregates which would be included in the definition represent the lower end of a long series of social gradations, which in their turn correspond not only to varieties of physical type, but also to peculiarities of custom and tribal structure, it is obviously but a short step to the conclusion that the motive principle of Indian caste is to be sought in the antipathy of the higher race for the lower, of the fair-skinned Aryan for the black Dravidian.

It will be said, reasonably enough, that this hypothesis, however applicable to certain larger groups, fails to account for the vast network of intricate divisions which the caste system now presents. The differences of type which distinguish the various trading, agricultural, pastoral, and fishing castes from each other are, it may be argued, not sharp enough to have brought the sentiment of race antipathy into play. On what principle, then, were these multifarious groups separated from the larger aggregates of which they formed part? I would reply, by the influence of fiction—a factor which Sir Henry Maine has shown to have contributed largely to the development of early societies. For illustrations of the working of this principle we need not travel far. The caste-making impulse has by no means spent its force, and its operation can be studied in most Indian districts at the present day. In Bengal, where the Aryan and Dravidian elements are in continual contact, it has created a series of endogamous groups, which may be roughly classified as Ethnic, Provincial or Linguistic, Territorial or Local, Functional or Occupational, Sectarian, and Social. In the first of these classes the race basis is palpable and acknowledged. The others have been generated by the fiction that men who speak a different language, who dwell in a different district, who worship different gods, who observe different social customs, who follow a different profession, or practise the same profession in a slightly different way, must be of a fundamentally different race. Usually, and in the case of sub-castes invariably, the fact is that there is no appreciable difference of race between the newly formed group and the aggregate from which it has been broken off.

If, then, caste was an institution evolved by the Aryans in the attempt to preserve the purity of their own stock, and afterwards expanded and adapted, by the influence of a series of fictions, to fit an endless variety of social, religious, and industrial conditions, we may expect that the physical data recently collected will have some bearing on Herr Karl Penka's speculations concerning the origin of the Aryans themselves. Clearly the Indian Aryans represent the furthest extension of the race towards the East. All along the eastern and northern frontier of Bengal we meet with a fringe of compact tribes of the short-headed or brachycephalic type, who are beyond question Mongolian. Starting from this area, and travelling up the plains of India north-westward towards the frontier of the Panjáb, we observe a gradual but steady increase of the dolichocephalic type of head, which Herr Penka claims as one of the chief characteristics of the original Aryans. Bengal itself is mostly mesaticephalic, and dolichocephaly only appears in some of the Dravidian tribes. In Behar dolichocephalic averages are more numerous; in Oudh and the North-West Provinces this type is universal, and it reaches its maximum in the Panjáb. Assuming that Herr Penka has correctly determined the original Aryan type to be dolichocephalic, and that the theory of caste propounded above is the true one, these are just the results which might be looked for. According to the French anthropologists, the shape of the head is the most persistent of race characters, and the one which offers the greatest resistance to the leveling influence of crossing. That the Aryans should have retained this more durable character while undergoing a change in the more fugitive character of colour is in keeping with what we know of the conditions, social and climatic, to which they were exposed. In point of colour, indeed, the Aryan castes are by no means so dark as Europeans are apt to suppose. The complexion, moreover, tends to grow lighter the further north-west we go, and survivals of reddish-blonde complexion and auburn hair are met with beyond the frontier.

A possible objection may be disposed of here. It may be argued that if the Dravidians are dolichocephalic, the prevalence of this character in North-Western India may be accounted for by the assumption of an intermixture of Dravidian blood. But if this were so, the proportion and degree of dolichocephaly would increase as we approach the Dravidian area, instead of diminishing, as is actually the Moreover, it is impossible to suppose that the races of the North-West, if originally brachycephalic, could have acquired their dolichocephalic form of head from the Dravidians, without at the same time acquiring the characteristic Dravidian nose and the distinctive Dravidian colour.

Owing in the main to the labours of Broca and the French anthropologists, it is no longer necessary to challenge the assumption of the elder generation of philologists that affinity of language implies affinity of race. That view has now been abandoned by most, if not all, of the leading authorities on the subject, and the best opinion of the present day seems to regard the fact that races speak the same language as proving little more than that at some time or other they must have been in close local contact. Abundant illustrations of the working of this process can be given from tribes all along the frontier of Bengal. In the first place it is clear that the hitherto recognized distinction between Dravidian and Kolarian stocks, concerning which so much has been written during the last twenty years, rests solely upon linguistic peculiarities, and does not correspond to any differences of physical type. The Málé of the Rajmahal hills and the Oraons of Chota Nagpore, both of whom speak languages classed as Dravidian, are identical in point of physique with the Mundas and Santáls, who are classed on linguistic grounds as Kolarian. Secondly, a number of tribes concerning whose non-Aryan origin there can be no manner of doubt, have within recent times adopted Aryan dialects and abandoned their original languages. Thus the Dravidian Bhumij, Kurmi, and Mahili of Western Bengal now speak only Bengali, the most Aryan of the Indian vernaculars, while the Mongoloid Khambus and Murmis of the Darjiling hills have taken to Hindi, and the Maghs and Tipperahs of the Eastern frontier have adopted, or are on the way to adopt, Bengali.
It is now nearly thirty years since the late Mr. J. F. McLennan introduced to the scientific world, in his well-known essay on Primitive Marriage, the terms exogamy and endogamy. The laws governing marriage which these terms denote were, when Mr. McLennan wrote, unnamed. He was, I believe, the first to draw attention to them, and the terms devised by him have been adopted by all who have since written on the same subjects. In the preface to the latest edition of Studies in Ancient History, Mr. D. McLennan, brother of the author, complains that both terms have in some cases been misunderstood, and gives a definition of each which may conveniently be quoted here. Exogamy, he says, "is prohibition of marriage between all persons recognized as being of the same blood, because of their common blood,—whether they form one community or part only of a community, or parts of several communities; and accordingly it may prevent marriage between persons who (though of the same blood) are of different local tribes, while it frequently happens that it leaves persons of the same local tribe (but who are not of the same blood) free to marry one another." Endogamy, on the other hand, "allows marriage only between persons who are recognized as being of the same blood-connection or kindred; and if, where it occurs, it confines marriage to the tribe or community, it is because the tribe regards itself as comprising a kindred."

Seeing, then, that caste is mainly a matter of marriage, special attention has been paid throughout the inquiry to the marriage usages of the tribes and castes concerned. Following up a suggestion made by Sir Henry Maine questions were framed tending to elucidate the practice of every caste in respect of the outer or endogamous limit within which a man must marry, and the inner or exogamous limit within which he may not marry. Taking the exogamous limit first, we find the non-Mahomedan races of Bengal at the present time regulating their matrimonial arrangements by several different kinds of exogamous subdivisions. At the bottom of the social system, as understood by the average Hindu, stands a large body of non-Aryan tribes and castes, each of which is broken up into a number of what may be called totemistic exogamous septs. Each sept bears the name of an animal, a tree, a plant, or of some material object, natural or artificial, which the members of that sept are prohibited from killing, eating, cutting, burning, carrying, using, etc. Well-defined groups of this type are found among the Dravidian Santáls and Oraons, both of whom still retain their original language, worship non-Aryan gods, and have a fairly compact tribal organization. The following are specimens selected from among the seventy-three Oraon and the ninety-one Santál septs:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Oraon</th>
<th>Santál</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Name of Sept.</td>
<td>Totem</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chirra.</td>
<td>Squirrel.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ergo.</td>
<td>Rat.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Hos of Singbhum and the Mundas of the Chota Nagpore plateau have also exogamous septs of the same type as the Oraons and Santáls, with similar rules as to the totem being taboo to the members of the group. The lists given in Appendix I contain the names of 323 Munda septs and 46 Ho septs. Six of the latter are found also among the Santals. The other Ho septa appear to be mostly of the local or communal type, such as are in use among the Kandhs, but this is not quite certain, and the point needs looking into by some one well acquainted with the Ho dialects, who would probably find little difficulty in identifying the names, as the tribe is well known to be in the habit of giving to places descriptive names having reference to their natural characteristics. Nearly all the Munda sept names are of the totem type, and the characteristic taboos appear to be recognized. The Tarwâr or Talwâr sept, for example, may not touch a sword, the Udbaru may not use the oil of a particular tree, the Sindur may not use vermilion, the Baghala may not kill or eat a quail, and, strangest of all, rice is taboo to the Dhán sept, the members of which must supply its place with gondli or millet.

A step higher in the social scale, according to Hindu estimation, the Bhumij of Western Bengal and Orissa mark an early stage in the course of development by which a non-Aryan tribe transforms itself into a full-blown caste, claiming a definite rank in the Brahmanical system. With the exception of a few residents of outlying villages bordering on the Munda country of Chota Nagpore Proper, the Bhumij have lost their original language (Mundári), and now speak only Bengali. They worship Hindu gods in addition to the fetishistic deities more or less common to them and the other Kolarians, but the tendency is to keep the latter rather in the background and to relegate the less formidable among them to the women and children to be worshipped in a hole-and-corner kind of way, with the assistance of a tribal hedge-priest (Láyád), who is supposed to be specially acquainted with their ways. Some of the leading men of the tribe, who call themselves Bhuinbárs, and hold large landed tenures on terms of police service, have set up as Rajputs, and keep a low class of Brahmans as their family priests. They have, as a rule, borrowed the Rajput class titles, but cannot conform with the Rajput rules of intermarriage, and marry within a narrow circle of pseudo-Rajputs like themselves. The rest of the tribe, numbering at the last Census 226,167, are divided into a number of exogamous groups, of which the following are examples. It is curious to observe, in a tribe still in a state of transition, that one of the Brahmanical gotras, Sándilya, has been borrowed from the higher castes, and in the process of borrowing has been transformed from a Vedic saint into a bird:—

Bhumij.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of Sept.</th>
<th>Totem</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Sálrisi</td>
<td>Sál fish</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hánśda</td>
<td>Wild goose</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leng</td>
<td>Mushroom</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sándilya</td>
<td>A bird</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hemron</td>
<td>Betel palm</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tumarung</td>
<td>Pumpkin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nág</td>
<td>Snake</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

At a further stage in the same process of evolution, and on a slightly superior social level, we find the Mahilis, Koras, and Kurmis, all of whom claim to be members of the Hindu community. They have totemistic exogamous sections, of which the following are fairly representative:—

Mahilis.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of Section</th>
<th>Totem</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Dungri</td>
<td>Dumur fig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turu</td>
<td>Turu grass</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kánti</td>
<td>Ear of any animal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hánśada</td>
<td>Wild goose</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murmu</td>
<td>Nilgái</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Koras.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of Section</th>
<th>Totem</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Kasyab</td>
<td>Tortoise</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saulá</td>
<td>Sál fish</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kásibak</td>
<td>Heron</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hánśda</td>
<td>Wild goose</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jutku</td>
<td>Pig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sánpu</td>
<td>Bull</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kurmis.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of Section</th>
<th>Totem</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Kesaría</td>
<td>Kesar grass</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Karár</td>
<td>Buffalo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dumuría</td>
<td>Dumur fig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chonchmutruár</td>
<td>Spider</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hastówár</td>
<td>Tortoise</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalbanauár</td>
<td>Net</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sankhowár</td>
<td>Shell ornaments</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bághbanuár</td>
<td>Tiger</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Katiár</td>
<td>Silk cloth</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Of these three castes the Mahilis appear to have broken off most recently from the tribe. They still worship some of the Santál gods in addition to the standard Hindu deities; they will eat food cooked by a Santál; their caste organization is supervised, like that of the Santáls, by an official bearing the title of Parganait; they permit the marriage of adults and tolerate sexual intercourse before marriage within the limits of the caste; and they have not yet attained to the dignity of employing Brahmans for ceremonial purposes. If I may hazard a conjecture on so obscure a question, I should be inclined to class them as Santáls who took to the degraded occupation of basket-making, and thus lost the jus connubii within the tribe. In the case of the Korás there is no clue to warrant their affiliation to any particular tribe, but their traditions say that they came from the Chota Nagpore plateau, while their name suggests a Dravidian origin, and it seems possible that they may be an offshoot of the Mundas, who somehow sank from the status of independent cultivators to their present position of earth-cutting and tank-digging labourers. They allow adult marriage, their standard of feminine chastity is low, and they have not yet fitted themselves out with Brahmans. In the customary rules of inheritance which their panchayát or caste council administers, it is curious to find the usage known in the Panjáb as chundávand, by which the sons, however few, of one wife take a share equal to that of the sons, however many, of another. The Kurmis may perhaps be a Hinduised branch of the Santáls. The latter, who are more particular about food, or rather about whom they eat with, than is commonly supposed, will eat cooked rice with the Kurmis, and according to one tradition regard them as elder brothers of their own. However this may be, the totemism of the Kurmis of Western Bengal stamps them as of Dravidian descent, and clearly distinguishes them from the Kurmis of Behar and the North-West Provinces. They show signs of a leaning toward orthodox Hinduism, and employ Brahmans for the worship of Hindu gods, but not in the propitiation of their family and rural deities, or in their marriage ceremonies.

One more instance of totemism deserves special notice here, as it shows the usage maintaining its ground among people of far higher social standing than any of the castes already mentioned. The Kumbhârs of Orissa take rank immediately below the Karan or writer-caste, and thus have only two or three large castes above them. They are divided into two endogamous sub-castes—Jagannáthi or Uria Kumbhârs, who work standing and make large earthen pots, and Khattya Kumbhârs, who turn the wheel sitting and make small earthen pots, cups, toys, etc. The latter are immigrants from Upper India, whose number is comparatively insignificant. For matrimonial purposes the Jagannáthi Kumbhârs are subdivided into the following exogamous sections:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of section</th>
<th>Totem</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Kaundinyá</td>
<td>Tiger</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarpa</td>
<td>Snake</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neul</td>
<td>Weasel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Goru</td>
<td>Cow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mudir</td>
<td>Frog</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhadbhadríá</td>
<td>Sparrow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kurmmá</td>
<td>Tortoise</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The members of each section express their respect for the animal whose name the section bears, by refraining from killing or injuring it, and by bowing when they meet it. The entire caste also abstain from eating, and even go so far as to worship, the sâl fish, because the rings on its scales resemble the wheel which is the symbol of the craft. The Khattya Kumbhârs have only one section (Kásyapa), and thus, like the Rájbanís of Rungpore, are really endogamous in spite of themselves. The reason, no doubt, is that there are too few of them in Orissa to fit up a proper exogamous system, and they content themselves with the pretence of one. Both sub-castes appear to be conscious that the names of their sections are open to misconception, and explain that they are really the names of certain saints who, being present at Daksha's horse sacrifice, transformed themselves into animals to escape the wrath of Siva, whom Daksha, like Peleus in the Greek myth, had neglected to invite.* It may well be that we owe the preservation of these interesting totemistic groups to the ingenuity of the person who devised this respectable means of accounting for a series of names so likely to compromise the reputation of the caste. In the case of the Khattya Kumhárs, the fact that their single section bears the name of Kásyapa, while they venerate the tortoise (Kachhap), and tell an odd story by way of apology for the practice, may perhaps lend weight to the conjecture, in itself a fairly plausible one, that many of the lower castes in Bengal, who are beginning to set up as pure Hindus, have taken advantage of the resemblance in sound between Kachhap and Kasyap (chh and s both become sh in colloquial Bengali) to convert a totemistic title into an eponymous one, and have gone on to borrow such other Brahmanical gotras as seemed to them desirable. If, for example, we analyse the matrimonial arrangements of the Bhars of Manbhum, many of whom are the hereditary personal servants of the pseudo-Rajput Raja of Pachete, we find the foregoing conjecture borne out by the fact that two out of the seven sections which they recognize are called after the peacock and the bel fruit, while the rest are eponymous. But this is an exceptionally clear case of survival, and I fear it is hardly possible to simplify the diagnosis of non-Aryan castes by laying down a general rule, that all castes with a section bearing the name Kásyapa, who have not demonstrably

---

* Muir, Sanskrit Texts, iv, p. 372. borrowed that appellation from the Brahmans, are probably offshoots from some non-Aryan tribe.

Among all the castes noticed above, the exogamous rule is one-sided in its operation. In no case may a man marry into his own section, but the name of the section goes by the male side, and consequently, so far as the rule of exogamy is concerned, there is nothing to prevent him from marrying his sister's daughter, his maternal aunt, or even his maternal grandmother. To bar alliances of this kind, a separate set of rules is required, which usually overlap the exogamous rule to some extent. Marriage with any person descended in a direct line from the same parents is universally forbidden. To simplify the calculation of collateral relationship—a complicated business which severely taxes the rural intellect—the following formula is in use throughout Behar:—"Chacherd, mmerd, phupherd, maserd ye ch dr n r bch k sh d hot hai" ("The line of paternal uncle, maternal uncle, paternal aunt, maternal aunt—these four relationships are to be avoided in marriage"). The first point to notice in this is, that in the first generation the whole of the paternal uncle's descendants, both male and female, would be excluded by the rule prohibiting marriage within the section. In the second and subsequent generations, agnates would be barred, but descendants through females would not. For the paternal uncle's daughters having necessarily married out of the section, their children would belong to some other section, and thus second cousins would be able to marry. Another point is that the formula does not state the number of generations to which the prohibition extends, and that different castes supply this omission in different ways. Non-Aryan races generally incline to laxity. The Santals, for example, in the Santal Parganas, are said to make up for their sweeping prohibition on the father's side by allowing very near alliance on the mother's side—a fact pointedly exemplified in their proverb 'No man heeds a cow-track, or regards his mother's sept.' Many castes, again, exclude a smaller number of generations on the female side, while others profess to prohibit intermarriage so long as any relationship, however remote, can be traced between the parties.

In the foregoing paragraphs I have attempted to follow the totemistic system of exogamy upwards from the well-defined non-Aryan tribes of Western Bengal, through a series of castes formed from the detritus of the tribe, and now undergoing a process of gradual stratification and upheaval into the Hindu system, to the highly respectable Kumbhārs of priest-ridden Orissa. A fresh starting point may now be taken at the top of Hindu society. Here we find the Brahmans, and the large body of castes which ape Brahmanical customs, divided into exogamous sections (gotras), the members of which profess to be descended from the mythical rishi or inspired saint whose name the gotra bears. So a man belonging to the Bharadvāj gotra may not marry a woman of the same gotra, as both are supposed to be descended from the rishi Bharadvāja. Exogamous sections of this kind may conveniently be styled eponymous. Within the main class of eponymous sections we may further distinguish two sub-classes—one tracing its descent to a wholly mythical eponym, and the other deriving its name from a historic or semi-historic personage who is believed to have been the chief or founder of the clan. Many, if not most, of the Rajput septs are of the latter type, and were the materials for the history of India more abundant than they are, there would probably be no great difficulty in identifying the eponyms. As it is, we can trace some of them in books like Tod's Rājasthān and in local traditions of various kinds. In any case, the theoretical distinction between the two sub-classes is clear. I do not propose to discuss the Brahmanical marriage system at length. Its leading features are well known, and have been described in several standard text-books on Hindu law. It deserves notice that in the eponymous as in the totemistic type of section the exogamous rule is often, though not invariably, one-sided, and that intermarriage with the mother's relations is guarded against by what Sir Henry Maine calls "a most extensive table of prohibited degrees."

Strictly speaking, as the eponyms of the Brahmanical gotras were necessarily Brahmans themselves, the Kshatryas and Vaisyas could have no gotras of their own. By a sort of authorised fiction, however, these castes were permitted to adopt the gotras of the family priests of their ancestors, and this practice has now spread by imitation to other castes in Bengal. Thus the physician and writer-castes (Baidyas and Káyasthas), the Naba-Sákha or nine castes (actually now thirteen) from whose hands a Brahman may take water, and many castes ranking even lower than these in the social scale, have exogamous sections bearing the same name as the Brahmanical gotras, and based upon similar traditions. The wide diffusion of these names is doubtless due in great measure to the influence of the Patit (fallen) or Varna Brahmans, who act as family priests to the lower castes, and gradually raise their standard of ceremonial purity. How clumsily these reforms are introduced, and how little their theoretical object is understood by the reformers or their clients, may be gathered from the fact that the Rájbansi, a very numerous Dravidian caste of Rungpore and Kuch or Kochh Behar, the Kámárs of Bengal, and several other castes, have only one eponymous section which includes the entire caste; and thus while professing to practise exogamy of the Brahmanical type, necessarily and habitually transgress the exogamous rule which forms the essence of the gotra system.

Among several other castes, the exogamous sections belong to a different type. Their names denote neither mythical eponyms, nor historic founders of clans, but appear to refer to the original habitation of the members.
or of some leader under whom they branched off from their parent tribe. Instances of this, which may perhaps be called the territorial class of names, are the Sesodia and Bhadauria septs of the Rajputs of Upper India, the Banodhia and Ujjaini sections of the Rajputs of Behar, and perhaps the Agarwálá and Agrahri Baniyas. It is rarely, however, that the members of a section can give an intelligible account of the meaning of its name, or can quote any tradition distinct enough to enable a particular place to be identified. All one can say is that a particular name is certainly not the name of a man, and is therefore probably the name of a place. Moreover, the names preserved in these section-titles are as often as not compressed and mangled renderings of the names of obscure or abandoned villages, or of those colloquial rustic names of particular tracts of country which are shown on no map, and can only be picked up, mostly by accident, from the people themselves. Until some scholar who knows both books and people as Mr. Beames knows them finds time to reconstruct the tribal geography of India on the basis of an etymological and antiquarian analysis of these territorial names, we can hardly expect to get much beyond conjecture as to the manner in which the castes arose among whom such names are found. Among the higher castes territorial names for exogamous sections or septs are curiously mixed up with names preserving the memory of a chief who founded or led the sept within historic times, and with the mythical eponyms of the Brahmans. This is the case with the Rajputs and Babhans of Behar, both of whom prohibit marriage within the section of either father or mother, and thus practise what might be called bi-lateral exogamy. In connexion with this rule, a curious case has recently come to my notice illustrating the way in which a tribal series of sections—territorial or eponymous—comes to be overlaid by the Brahmanical system of gotras. Bábu Ajodhiá Singh, of Hájipur in Tirhut, being himself a Sulank Rajput, married a wife from the Chandel section, and his son, Bābu Bājnāth Singh, has married into the same section. At the time of the latter's betrothal a question was raised as to the correctness of the procedure, and the Brahmans held that as the son's betrothed, though of the same tribal sept as his mother, belonged to a different Purānic gotra, the rule of exogamy would not be infringed by the marriage. The formula of prohibited degrees previously quoted is also recognized by the Tirhut Rajputs, who in theory consider it binding down to seven generations on the father's and five on the mother's side.

It would seem, then, from the facts sketched above, that we may trace in Bengal at the present time three district classes of exogamous septs or sections—(1) Totemistic; (2) Eponymous; (3) Territorial. The number may be raised to four if we choose to distinguish the mythical eponym of the Brahmanical or Purānic gotra from the more or less historic eponym of the Rajput sept. All three classes are based upon a fiction far removed from fact, and have certain characteristics in common which mark them off from other exogamous groups which I have still to describe. In the first place, the circle of affinity which each section encloses is an absurdly wide one, including persons between whom there exists no relationship whatever in the ordinary sense of the word, who live hundreds of miles apart, and have no personal acquaintance with each other. Secondly, the centre from which the circle is drawn—be it totem, eponym, or birth-place—is lost in a period of remote antiquity, and cannot be identified by any process of genealogical or historical research. You could as soon bring back the Mastodon as the Murmu, and the most ingenious Euhemerist would be baffled by figures such as Bharadwāja and Kāsyapa. Thirdly, the vitality of these groups is remarkable, while their number is small in relation to the tribes and castes whose marriages they control. Three years ago I came across a small colony of seventeen families of Oraons in the east of Rungpore who regulate their marriages by the totem-istic septs already described. These people had long ago settled down as Bunas or clearers of jungle, and had no intention of returning to Chota Nagpore. Their neighbours in their new home were non-Aryan Mahomedans and Rájban-sis, both of whom know nothing of exogamy, and rarely marry beyond the narrow circle of their own village and its immediate vicinity. For all this the Oraons showed no signs of relaxing their strictness, and three families of Christians among them, while free from prejudice in the matter of food and drink, still observed the totemistic rules of intermarriage which govern the main body of the tribe on the distant plateau of Chota Nagpore. Fourthly, the distribution of the groups has nothing to do with locality. In none of the castes or tribes hitherto mentioned do we find the members of a particular section dwelling in a particular village or tract of country: on the contrary, representatives of the various sections are scattered about through all the villages where the tribe or caste is found.

There seem to be indications in the history of the Rajputs that in former times a Rajput sept occupied a distinct area of country from which its members emerged on predatory excursions to capture wives and lift cattle. In Rájputana, however, this state of things has long passed away, and with it has passed the opportunity of enquiring more closely into an organization which has been believed by several authorities to be the primitive unit of human society. The local sept dwelling together as a group of blood relations in its own territory has everywhere been so completely broken up and scattered that critics of Mr. McLennan’s theory of primitive society have questioned whether it ever existed, and Mr. McLennan himself was driven to account for the dispersion of these groups and their diffusion among a number of local tribes by assuming the universal prevalence of female kinship.
A fortunate combination of circumstances has preserved for us in the Kandhs of the secluded tract, known as the Kandhmals in Orissa, a singularly perfect specimen of a tribe divided into local septs, each inhabiting the area from which it derives its name. The Kandhs are divided into fifty gochis or exogamous septs, each of which traces its descent from a common ancestor, and takes its name from the muta or circle of villages in which its members live. A man may not marry a woman of his own gochi or muta—the two words denoting the same set of facts regarded from different points of view. Until comparatively recent times the Kandhs of the Kandhmals dwelled apart in that state of nature which Hobbes teaches us to regard as a state of war. Contiguous septs were always at war with each other; wives were captured, female infants were slain, and all the incidents of primitive society as sketched by Mr. McLennan were in full force. The gochi or exogamous sept is regarded by the Kandhs themselves as one of their most ancient and treasured institutions. Its members claim to be descended from a common parent, but the names of these ancestors have not been preserved, and the name of the muta or group of villages in which the members of the gochi actually reside takes the place of the eponym in use among the higher Aryan castes. Every gochi again is divided into a number of sub-septs or klambus, each of which is called after one of the villages included in the muta, and the members of which profess to trace their descent from an ancestor of much more recent date than the progenitor of the gochi, who is supposed to have founded the village from which the klambu takes its name. The gochi name descends in the male line, and there are no indications of the tribe having at any time been acquainted with the practice of reckoning kinship through females. As a man may not marry in his own gochi, still less may he marry within the limits of the klambu. The latter, however, is by no means a useless or ornamental appendage, nor, on the other hand, does it take the place of the gochi, as is the case among many castes which have found their original exogamous groupings inconveniently large. It serves a distinct purpose, and seems to have been consciously adopted in comparatively recent times to supplement the defects of simple exogamy by providing against consanguineous marriages on the mother's side. Not only is a man forbidden to marry within his mother's klambu, but this prohibition is observed always for four and often for five generations in the descending line. It may fairly be inferred from these facts that the Kandh tribe has been organized from the earliest times on the sole basis of male kinship, and has only recently begun to recognize the idea of relationship on the mother's side. A similar arrangement exists among the Santáls, with whom the khunt or sub-sept serves the same purpose as the klambu among the Kandhs. The prohibition of intermarriage is not, however, observed for so many generations, nor are the septs and sub-septs localised as with the Kandhs.

Among the numerous castes whose marriage system is not regulated by the large sections already described, we find what may be called family and local sections of a much more fluid and variable type. Instances of the former are the thar of the Darjiling hills, and the kul, múl or párich of Behar. All these terms express a circle of agnatic descent, but the ancestor from whom the members of the kul are supposed to be descended is much less remote in point of time than the mythic progenitor of the Brahmanical gotra, or the semi-historic eponym of the Rajput clan. They are, in fact, very much what a Hindu joint family or a South Slavonic House community would be if it cast off the bond of community of goods and dwelling, and were held together by no stronger link than the rule of exogamy. Thus the Sribástab sub-caste of the Káyasths of Patna is divided for marriage purposes into a number of kuls, one of which—the Akhauri—can be traced to the village of Churámanpur in Sháhabád, where the family, which has now expanded into the Akhauri kul, is said to have been settled a few centuries ago. Similar groups exist under the name of miś among the Báis, a cultivating caste of North Bhágalpur, who claim to be the descendants of the Vaisyas of early Aryan tradition. These groups are small and very numerous in relation to the size of the caste. A panjiár or marriage referee of the Báis, who claims to have in his possession registers recording the alliances of three hundred families for the last hundred years, informs me that in applying the rule of exogamy regard is had to the following considerations: First, a man may not marry a woman who belongs to the same miś as himself, his mother, or his paternal grandmother. Secondly, he may not marry a woman whose mother or maternal grandmother belonged to any of the miś prohibited to him. For instance (vide table below), the question is whether Propositus may marry Proposita. The capital letters show the miś. Proposita herself does not belong to any of the three miś A, B, D, which are barred on the man's side. But her maternal grandmother belonged to D miś, which is barred for Propositus; consequently the marriage cannot take place. The miś of Proposita's maternal grandfather is not taken into account.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Paternal Grandfather = Grandmother</th>
<th>Paternal Grandfather = Grandmother</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Father = Mother</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A</td>
<td>D</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Propositus</td>
<td>E</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The local type of exogamous section, usually called dih, seems to be based on the assumption that all the members of a caste residing in the same village must be more or less related, and that therefore intermarriages between them should be prohibited. In some cases these prohibitions are singly cumbrous and intricate. The Bargwár Godás in Bhágalpur exclude seven diḥs on each side; that is to say, if the proposed bride's diḥ is found within seven degrees of the bridegroom, or vice versa, no marriage can take place between the parties. Still more curious are the prohibitions on intermarriage arising from mith, friendship, or fictitious brotherhood, among the Murmi, Mangar, Gurung, Limbu, Lepcha, and other hill races in Darjiling. Two men contract friendship by a special ritual, at which a Brahman, or, when the parties are Buddhists, a Lama, officiates, and reads mantras or mystic formulæ, while the two friends exchange rupees, handkerchiefs, or scarves, and bedaub each other between the eyebrows with the paste made of rice and curds which is used in the marriage ceremony. The effect of the union is that the friends are reckoned as brothers, and not only is intermarriage between the two families prohibited for several generations, but the members of each family may not marry with the thar or exogamous section to which the other belongs. Any breach of the rule is punished in British territory by exclusion from caste. In Nepal, I am informed, more severe punishments, such as death or slavery, are inflicted. It is difficult to test the accuracy of a statement of this kind; but the fact that it was made to me in perfect good faith by a number of Murmis living in British territory is of itself enough to show how thoroughly the fictitious kinship arising from mith was identified by my informants with the real kinship which it imitates.

A fifth class of sept-names is found among the Tibetans and Limbus of the Darjiling hills and the Chakmas of the Chittagong Hill Tracts. These names are neither the personal names of the supposed ancestors of the group, nor the names of the village where he lived or the territory which he conquered. They are a sort of nicknames, having

* Compare the Slavonian confraternity mentioned by Sir Henry Maine at p. 258 of Early Law and Custom. reference to some personal adventure or individual peculiarity of the ancestor himself, which now serves as the designation of the group of kindred who trace their descent from him. Many of them are of unflattering and indelicate character. Thus among the Limbus we find Lechenche, the dissolute one; Serling, the thief; Yungám, the idler; Inglamphe, the liar; Lekhogma, the man with swollen testicles; Thobukya, the man with skin disease; and among the Chakmas, Ichapocha, the man who ate rotten shrimps; Pirábhanga, the fat man who broke the stool; Aruyá, the skeleton; Kurjya, the lazy one, and so forth. It is important to observe that side by side with these singular names, concerning the origin of which members of the tribe will often tell long and elaborate stories, there are also found names of the totemistic type. Thus the Limbus have Khema, the pheasant, as the name of one of their groups, and explain that the ancestor who bore this name went out to shoot pheasants in a fir copse, but found none, or missed what he found, and vowed on his return home never to eat a pheasant again. A similar story is told of the Sangma or buffalo sept of the same tribe. Among the Chakmas the plantain tree and several rivers appear as sept-names. In this class may also be included certain exogamous groups which bear the names of village or communal officials, such as Mánjhi, village headman; Naiya or Láyá, village priest; Mánki, head of a group of villages, and the like. These names are commonly found in castes in a state of transition from animism to Hinduism, which have, as Mr. Andrew Lang expresses it, 'sloughed off the totem,' but have not yet adopted the full-blown eponym characteristic of those castes which are organized on a Brahmanical model. The theory of course is that the original progenitor of the septs held the office of which the sept bears the name, but I have never succeeded in verifying this in a particular case, and I believe the names to have been for the most part adopted at random. In the case of the nickname septs of the Limbus and Tibetans, there are grounds for believing that the account given of the origin of the names is in the main true.

As distinguished from the larger exogamous groups, the sections known as thar, mul, kul, or dih, enclose a much narrower circle of relations, and, as has been remarked above, seem to be little more than somewhat expanded joint families, kept together solely for the purpose of controlling matrimonial relations, and having no common interests in respect of property. Most of them are comparatively modern, and their origin can in many cases be ascertained. To complete the contrast with the larger groups it should be added that the thars are much more numerous in relation to the strength of the caste, and that their number admits of being added to. The hill Brahmanas, for instance, by no means a very large caste, are said to have more than 1,400 thars. Similar statistics could, I believe, be procured for many of the lower castes, were it not for the extreme ignorance of the people themselves.

Summing up the facts sketched, we find the following types of exogamous groups existing in Bengal:—

I. Totemistic. Confined for the most part to tribes and castes of Dravidian descent.

II. Eponymous, the eponym being either a Vedic saint (as with the Brahmanas and the castes who imitate them), or a chief of comparatively modern date, as with the Rajputs and others.

III. Territorial, referring either to some very early settlement of a section or to the birthplace of its founder: prevalent among the Rajputs and the trading castes supposed to be allied with them and found also among the Kandhs of Orissa in a very primitive form, the sept there residing in the local area whose name it bears.

IV. Local, communal, or family sections of small size and comparatively recent origin.
V. Titular, or nickname groups referring to some personal adventure of the founder of the sept or to some office which he is supposed to have held.

Besides these we also find castes which have no sections of any kind, or, which comes to the same thing, have only one section and habitually marry within it, and simply reckon up prohibited degrees in much the same way as we do ourselves. Castes of this type are more numerous in Bengal Proper, particularly in Eastern and Northern Bengal than in Behar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpore. For this there seem to be two reasons. On the one hand, the tendency to imitate Brahmanical institutions has been stronger in the former area, so that people have adopted one or two of the standard gotras, and abandoned their original section names; while on the other hand the influence of Islam in districts where a large proportion of the population has recently become Mahomedan, and social intercourse goes on freely between votaries of the rival creeds, may be expected to lead to sept-names dropping out of use even among non-Mahomedan groups.

On the question of the origin of exogamy itself I may be allowed to make a few general remarks. The first point to notice in the custom of exogamy is that in some form or other it is practically universal: it is observed semper ubique et ab omnibus. Any cause therefore that is adequately to account for it must be also of universal operation. This disposes of a theory derived from the Aryan advance into India which I put forward in the Asiatic Quarterly Review for July 1886, and which was discussed in the Academy shortly afterwards by Mr. Andrew Lang. Mr. Lang's own view has since been briefly stated in a note to one of the early chapters of Myth Ritual and Religion. He there explains exogamy as being an application to marriage of the principle of taboo of the totem. A man may not use his totem for food and so forth, and he may not use (in the Greek sense of χρήσθαι γίνεσθαι) a woman who bears the totem name. But granting that this is the form which the prohibition ultimately assumes, we may fairly ask how it got started. The analogy of the animal world, of which savages are keen observers, and which they regard as closely akin to themselves, so far from suggesting objections to the marriage of a Swan man with a Swan woman, would rather encourage such intercourse. From the animal point of view, the union of a swan with a mongoose, or of either with a snake, would appear to be unnatural and illicit. We must look therefore for some wider cause, and it seems worth while to consider whether the habit of exogamy may not have arisen at a stage of social development antecedent to, and incapable of anything like, the conscious adaptation of means to ends and quite apart from the action of any influence save that of natural selection.

Exogamy and natural selection.

We know that changes of habits often occur in certain individuals or in whole species, and that useful variations, or those which are beneficial to the organism or species under the conditions to which it is exposed, tend to be preserved. Finally, the hereditary transmission of such variations leads, as Mr. Wallace expresses it in his recent work on Darwinism, "to the preservation of favoured races in the struggle for life." Now let us take a community, such as the local sept or gochi of the Kandh tribe, in a very rudimentary stage of evolution, when the proceedings of individuals are determined, not by deliberate calculation, but by so-called instinct—when, in other words, they are comparatively simple reflex acts. Suppose that in such a community certain individuals, as the result of the inherent tendency to vary present in all organisms, varied physiologically so as to find the women of other communities more attractive than their own. They would naturally tend to marry according to their instinctive attractions, and the community would thus come to consist of an aggregate composed of families derived from one stock and of families derived from the crossing of two stocks. Next suppose—which we have certainly some good ground to do—that the individuals belonging to the crossed families were at an advantage in the struggle for existence as compared with those of the pure families. As a result of the survival of the fittest they would tend more and more to replace the latter, and would at the same time tend to become more and more exogamic in habits, simply as the result of the cumulative hereditary strengthening of the original instinct. It would further appear that the element of sexual selection might also be brought into play, as an exogamous family or group would have a larger range of selection than an endogamous one, and would thus get better women, who again, in the course of the primitive struggle for wives, would be appropriated by the strongest and most warlike men.

It will of course be objected to this hypothesis that inter-breeding is not necessarily injurious. To this I would reply, first, that the question is one of degree. Savages would probably inter-breed very closely and freely, and we are not in a position to argue, from the comparatively limited amount of inter-breeding observed among civilized races in modern times, what might have been the practice of an earlier generation of mankind. We can say that a limited amount of inter-breeding is not necessarily injurious, but our instances are only occasional, and their influence is continually being counteracted by the effect of recurring crosses. Secondly, it may be answered that the question is one of conditions. The amount of inter-breeding that is innocuous, or apparently innocuous, in civilized life might have been fatal in savage life, where the struggle for existence is infinitely greater, and where talents and brain power generally do less to mitigate the effects of congenital weakness.

This attempt to bring the phenomena of exogamy within the operation of a known general law is, I need hardly say, put forward with the utmost diffidence, and I am entirely conscious of the difficulties which surround the subject. But it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that here and there some half-accidental circumstance, such as the transmission of a physical defect or an hereditary disease, might have given primitive man a sort of warning, and thus have induced the particular kind of variation we want, or at any rate have stimulated the general tendency to variation of habit which we are justified in assuming. We are also, it would seem, entitled to contrast the remarkable stability of the habit of exogamy with the known instability of non-adaptive characters, and to conclude from this that exogamy is to be regarded as an adaptive character. Lastly, it may be claimed for this hypothesis that it excludes the element of deliberate calculation on the part of the members of the exogamous aggregate, thus escaping the criticism which has assailed those theories which impute to primitive man a power of foretelling remote possibilities out of all proportion to his known improvidence. So far from doing this, the theory now presented goes rather into the opposite extreme, and places primitive man on much the same level as orchids and many other plants having most elaborate exogamic arrangements which no one dreams of ascribing to calculation. If, then, an elaborate system of exogamy has been evolved in plants by the action of natural selection, there can be nothing to prevent its having arisen in the earliest stages of human society by the same means.

One more objection may be noticed. It will be said, with truth, that the earlier forms of exogamy are always unilateral; that is to say, that the totem or class name goes either by the male side only or by the female side only, and that the system as known to savages makes no attempt to deal with both paternal and maternal relations. Here I would reply that, though unilateral exogamy is not a complete escape from the objections to consanguineous unions, it represents at any rate a considerable advance on promiscuity which in very small communities would probably have disastrous cumulative results. The idea that parentage can be reckoned on the side of both parents is one of comparatively late development. Even the Athenians of the time of Aeschylus seem to have been hazy—witness the famous trial in the Eumenides—on this point. But certainly an imperfect check on promiscuity must have been better than none.

Finally, the hypothesis set forth above would tend to clear up one of the vexed questions of ethnology—the question of female infanticide and its relation to the custom of exogamy. Mr. J. F. McLennan saw that the two usages often existed side by side, and in the theory of exogamy put forward in his essay on Primitive Marriage, he argued that female infanticide as practised by savages disturbed the balance of the sexes and drove men to capture their wives from other tribes—a practice which in course of time resolved itself into the systematic observance of exogamy.

This view was open to the obvious rejoinder that if all tribes killed their female infants at an equal rate, there would soon be no women to capture, and the race would die out. Even without pressing this point, it was difficult to see why primitive man should prefer the dangerous and inconvenient process of capturing a wife from a hostile tribe to the simpler method of marrying a girl belonging to his own local community. Given, however, an adequate cause inducing people to practise exogamy—a force as effective as the influence of natural selection would unquestionably be—and it is easy to understand that in certain states of society a tendency to female infanticide would be a natural consequence—not as McLennan supposed a cause—of the custom of exogamy. For if men were restrained by inexorable usage from marrying the girls born in the sept or local group of blood kindred, which we may assume to be the unit of early society, the temptation to kill these bouches inutiles would probably be very strong. Not only would... girls be useless to the men of the tribe as wives, but the more of them there were, the more would the tribe be preyed upon by neighbours in quest of wives. As a matter of fact, this was very much the view that the Kandhs took of the question. In 1842 they told Major Macpherson in so many words that it was better to destroy girls in their infancy than to allow them to grow up and become causes of strife afterwards. I am indebted to Sir John Edgar for a parallel instance from the Nága tribe. It seems that on a tour through the Nága country, Colonel McCulloch, Political Agent for Manipur, came across a village which struck him as singularly destitute of female children. On making inquiries he found that there was not a single girl in the place, for the simple reason that the people killed all that were born in order to save themselves from the annoyance of being harried by wife-hunting parties from a stronger tribe. Colonel McCulloch got hold of the mothers and managed to induce them to promise to spare their girls in future on the understanding that their neighbours should stop raiding and adopt a more peaceable method of wooing. By a judicious mixture of threats and persuasion, the other tribe was led to agree to the arrangement, and many years after, while staying in Manipur, Sir John Edgar was present when a troop of Nága girls from the weaker tribe paid a visit of ceremony to Colonel McCulloch, bearing presents of cloth of their own weaving in token of their gratitude to the man who had saved their lives.

Instances of this sort, vouched for by competent observers, and drawn from tribes dwelling so far apart and belonging to such widely different stocks as the Dravidian Kandhs of Orissa and the Mongoloid Nágas of Assam, may be regarded as crucial in their bearing on the question of the relation of female infanticide to the custom of exogamy. They seem to show that the practice of killing female infants is a consequence, not a cause—and assuredly not the cause—of the rule that a man may not marry a woman of his own tribe.
This consequence, moreover, ensues only so long as society is in a savage state, and tends to die out, as it has died out among both Kandhs and Nágas, directly a régime of violence is succeeded by a régime of law. As soon as this change has been effected, the value of women tends to rise. They become a saleable commodity, which neighbouring tribes will buy with a price, and the inducement to kill them in infancy ceases to exist: in other words, savage infanticide is an incident of the primitive struggle for bare existence which disappears when the severity of the struggle is alleviated by peace. There is, however, another form of infanticide which arises from wholly different causes and requires to be carefully distinguished from the savage type. Given a tribe like the Rajputs of Northern India, divided into a number of exogamous septs, and strongly impressed with the ideas of purity of blood and the importance of correct ceremonial observances, it follows of necessity that in course of time some septs will drop behind the others and will come to be regarded as socially inferior to the rest. Members of such septs will find difficulty in marrying their daughters, and will be obliged to buy husbands for them. This custom will spread, and the bridegroom price will tend to rise until it presses severely on the means of families unfortunate enough to have several daughters to marry. Family pride and the necessity of avoiding scandals render it impossible to let girls grow up with the prospect of remaining old maids; convents and sisterhoods are unknown; and the only way out of the difficulty, as it presents itself to the Rajput father, is to permit no more girls to arrive at maturity than can certainly be provided with husbands. The ultimate result no doubt is much the same as is witnessed among savage people like Nágas and Kandhs, but it is arrived at in a different way and springs from a different principle. It may be added that this refined form of infanticide is far more difficult to suppress than the savage form. The one dies out of itself as the forcible capture of wives falls into disuse, and life generally becomes easier; the other tends to spread with the growth of family pride and personal luxury, and may even offer substantial resistance to attempts made to stamp it out by penal legislation.

The two kinds of infanticide.

In the closing paragraphs of his work on totemism, Mr. J. G. Frazer observes: — "No satisfactory explanation of the origin of totemism has yet been given. Mr. Herbert Spencer finds the origin of totemism in a 'misinterpretation of nicknames.' Savages first named themselves after natural objects, and then, confusing these objects with their ancestors of the same names, revered them as they already reverenced their ancestors. The objection to this view is that it attributes to verbal misunderstandings far more influence than, in spite of the so-called comparative mythology, they ever seem to have exercised. Sir John Lubbock also thinks that totemism arose from the habit of naming persons and families after animals; but in dropping the intermediate links of ancestor worship and verbal misunderstanding, he has stripped the theory of all that lent it even an air of plausibility." In the face of this finding by so high an authority, it would be almost presumptuous for me to approach the subject at all, were it not that the novel facts elicited by the Bengal inquiry seem to throw some fresh light upon the question. In all the discussions that have hitherto taken place, it has been assumed that the totem is a thing sui generis, an isolated survival which stands by itself and cannot be compared with similar institutions for the sufficient reason that no similar institutions exist. This is not the view which an examination of the Indian evidence seems to suggest. The totem comes before us in India as only one class out of a number of different classes or types of sept-names, all of which serve the same purpose, that of providing the machinery for giving effect to the rule of exogamy. None of the denominations are now used as personal names, and but for the fact of their discharging special functions in respect of marriage, they would doubtless have fallen long ago into disuse. All of them are, in fact, survivals which do for the people who use them precisely what is done for ourselves by the table of prohibited degrees at the end of the Book of Common Prayer. Now among these various classes of sept-names we find the Tibetans and Limbus of the Eastern Himalayas and the people of the Hill Tracts of Chittagong using names which profess to be, and in fact are, nothing more nor less than nicknames of the original ancestors of septs. Other castes use names which are the names of certain village or communal offices which the ancestor of the sept is supposed to have held. Others, again, use names of villages, groups of villages, or tracts of country which are similarly explained to be the names of settlements founded by the common progenitor. What can be simpler than to apply the same principle to the animal-names which are also used to regulate exogamy, and to assume that these also are the names of founders of septs? This, in fact, is the explanation which the Limbus do give of the names of this type which are used by them along with the unmistakeable nicknames instanced above. I can see no reason for doubting its correctness, and I think we are justified in defining the totem as we find it in India as an ancient nickname, usually derived from some animal, of the supposed founder of an exogamous sept, now stripped of its personal associations and remembered solely in virtue of the part which it plays in giving effect to the rule of exogamy. To any one who deems it incredible that men should be called after animals, I would reply that if savages are capable of believing, as we know they are, that men can transform themselves into animals at will, or can be so transformed by the agency of witchcraft, nothing would seem to them more natural and reasonable than to call a man by the name of an animal to which he bears some fancied resemblance. If the man so named were the head of a sept, the name would be perpetuated by its use in connexion with the rule of exogamy long after the man who originally bore it had been forgotten; and in a large tribe where new septs are continually being formed, the practice of naming them after animals would be kept alive by fiction and the force of habit after the fashion of giving such names to individuals had died out. Moreover, when sept names came to be adopted without reference to any particular individual, but merely as symbols marking off a particular group for the purpose of the rule of exogamy, any sort of distinctive designation would do as well as the name of an animal. This would account for the number of queer totems found among the Mundas, with regard to some of which it is difficult to see how, from any point of view, they can ever have been looked upon as appropriate personal names.

1 Spencer, Principles of Sociology, i, 367.

This hypothesis, it seems to me, explains in a simple and intelligible fashion all that needs explanation in the phenomena of totemism. It puts the totem on the same footing as the nicknames we find among the Mongoloid races, the eponyms of the Brahmanical system, and the territorial and local sept-names of the Rajputs and Kandhs, and it accounts for all of these on the well-known principle of survival. Upon the religious aspects of totemism I do not propose to enter here. They are not very prominent in India, and the data requisite for full treatment of the subject are not yet available. But if the view put forward above is accepted, it would clearly account for the reverence with which the totem is regarded, and would explain why on occasion it receives divine honours. A man who is looked upon as a tiger during life clearly stands a fair chance of being worshipped as a tiger after he is dead. Some tribes, indeed, regard the sacrifices offered to ancestors as a sort of blackmail paid to the spirits of the dead for fear lest, if left unappeased, they should enter into the bodies of wild beasts and in that form make themselves unpleasant to the living.

Reference has been made above to the influence of fiction in bringing about within the limits of the caste system the formation of endogamous aggregates, each of which is regarded by its members as in some sense a collection of relatives, although in fact no relationship may be traceable. Such groups are extremely numerous, and fresh ones are continually being formed, so that it seems worth while to attempt to classify them with reference to the principles upon which they are based. The following are the main classes which may be distinguished:

I. Ethnic groups, composed of the higher grades of Aryans or of non-Aryan tribes, like the Rajbansi-Kocch, who have adopted Hinduism, and transformed themselves into a caste. In the case of the latter the assumption of a common origin is borne out by what is known of the history and affinities of the tribe, but after having become a caste, its members set to work to strip themselves of all customs likely to betray their true descent. At the same time the substantial landholders, if there are any among the tribe, usually break off from the rest and convert themselves into Rajputs.

II. Linguistic or Provincial groups, such as Bengali, Uriya, and Pachimā, or Behāri Brahmans, Kāyastha, Kumhārs, etc. These classes are very large, and include whole castes, which in their turn are broken up into endogamous sub-castes. These groups arise partly from the fiction which assumes that men who live in a different part of the country and speak a different language must be of a different race, and probably also in some measure to the inclusion of different stocks under a single caste-name.

III. Territorial or local groups, not corresponding to any distinction of language, such as the Rārhī and Barendra Brahmans, the Uttariya and Dakshini (north and south of the Ganges) Doms of Behar, Tamāria and Sikharbhumi Bhumij. of Mánbhum, and numerous others. It is curious to observe that in some cases these groups are called after ancient territorial divisions, such as Rárh, Bárendra, Sikharbhum, etc., which appear on no map, and the names of which may possibly throw some light upon the early history of Bengal.

IV. Functional or occupational groups, such as the Mecho and Helo sub-castes of Kaibarttas, of whom the former sell fish, while the latter confine themselves to cultivation; the Dulia, Máchhuá, and Mátiál sub-castes of Bágdi who are distinguished by carrying palanquins, fishing, and labouring as tank-diggers and earth-workers generally.

V. Sectarian groups like the Kherwár or Safáhor revivalists among the Santáls, and the Vaishnava divisions of some of the Orissa castes. It is doubtful, however, whether any groups based upon religious differences within the range of Hinduism are really endogamous.

VI. Social groups marked off by abstaining from or practising some particular social or ceremonial usage. Thus the Sagáhut sub-caste of Sunris (traders and liquor-sellers) of Behar allow their widows to remarry by the maimed rite of ságai, while another sub-caste of Sunris forbid widow marriage, and designate themselves Biyáhut, “the married ones,” from biyáh, the full-blown wedding ceremony which no woman can go through twice.

Illustrations of these groupings might be multiplied almost indefinitely, and it might be shown how the fact of such separations having taken place has given rise to a variety of curious legends and traditions which seek to furnish a mythological explanation of existing facts. Thus in the district of Bankura, where the original structure of the caste seems to have been singularly well-preserved, we find the Bágdis divided into the following endogamous sub-castes:—(1) Tentulía, called after the tamarind tree; (2) Kasaikulía, named from the Kasai river. These two groups work as masons, and also prepare the lime which is mixed with the betel leaves and areca nut chewed by all classes of natives of India. (3) Duliá Bágdís carry palanquins or dulís, and in common with the other sub-castes, earn their livelihood by fishing, making gunny-bags, weaving cotton, and preparing the red powder (abir) used in the Holi festival. The Bágdí fisherman uses the ordinary circular cast-net, but swings the net round his head before casting it, a practice which is supposed by the regular fishing castes of Bengal—Tiyar, Mál and Kaibartta—to be peculiarly dishonourable. Of the other sub-castes—there are fourteen in all—the Máchhuá derive their name from fishing, the Mátiál from earth-working, the Kusmeteá are called after the Kusa grass; the Ojha are, or are supposed to have been, the priests of the tribe. Among the Bágdís of Orissa the grotesque tale is told how, once upon a time, the gods being assembled in council, a goddess suddenly gave birth to three sons, and feeling embarrassed by the situation, hid the first under a heap of tamarind (tentul) pods, the second in an iron pan, and the third under a hermit's staff. From these vicissitudes of their infancy the children got the names—Tentulia, Guli-mánjhi and Danda-mánjhi—which the sub-castes descended from them still bear. To us this apparently foolish story is of interest as marking the transition from the tribe to the caste. It can only have arisen when the Bágdís had in some measure cast in their lot with Hinduism, and had begun to feel the want of a mythical pedigree of the orthodox type. The mention of the tamarind pods in particular furnishes an excellent example of a myth devised for the purpose of giving a respectable explanation of the totemistic name Tentulia.

But of all the factors which have contributed to shape the internal structure of tribes and castes in Bengal, none has exercised so searching an effect as the custom prohibiting the second marriage of widows and the parallel usage enjoining the marriage of a daughter before she attains physical maturity. Both customs appear to have been developed in the form which they now assume at a comparatively recent date under the pressure of peculiar social conditions. Both, again, are looked upon by the people who observe them as badges of social distinction, and to the fact that they are regarded in this light is mainly due their rapid extension within the last two or three generations. No excuse therefore is needed for examining their prevalence and its causes in some detail.

For the ultimate origin of the prohibition of widow marriage among the higher castes we must look back, far beyond the comparative civilization of the Vedas, to the really primitive belief that the dead chief or head of the family will need human companionship and service in that other world which savage fancy pictures as a shadowy copy of this. To this belief is due the practice of burning the widow on the funeral pile of her dead husband, which is referred to as an "ancient custom" (dharma purâna) in the "Atharva Veda."* The directions given in the Rig Veda for placing the widow on the pile with her husband's corpse, and then calling her back to the world of life, appear, as Tylor† has pointed out, to represent "a reform and a reaction against a yet more ancient savage rite of widow sacrifice, which they prohibited in fact, but yet kept up in symbol." The bow of the warrior and the sacrificial instruments of the priests were thrown back upon the pile to be consumed; the wife, after passing through the mere form of sacrifice, was held to have fulfilled her duties to her husband, and was free to marry again. A passage in the Rig Veda quoted by Zimmer‡ shows that in some cases, at any rate, the widow married her husband's younger brother (devat); and it is not unreasonable to suppose that her obligations in this respect were very much what we now find among the castes which permit widow marriage.

---

† Primitive Culture, i, 466.
‡ Altindisches Leben, p. 339.
At this point the historical record, such as it is, breaks off, and conjecture alone can divine the precise motives which induced the Brahmans of a later age to revive that custom of primitive savagery which their ancestors had expressly condemned.

Closer contact with more barbarous races, the growth of the sacerdotal spirit, the desire, as Sir Henry Maine has suggested, to get rid of the inconvenient lien which the widow held over her husband’s property, may all have contributed to this result. But when widow sacrifice had been thus reintroduced, it is prima facie unlikely that it should have been enforced with that rigid consistency which distinguishes the true savage; and, in fact, the texts prescribe for the widow the milder alternative of a life of ascetic self-denial and patient waiting to join the husband who has gone before. According to some authorities, they also recognize, though as a less excellent path than the two former, the alternative of remarriage.

I will not attempt to enter upon the controversy as to the precise meaning of the passage in Paráṣara’s Institutes, on which the modern advocates of widow marriage rely, still less to discuss its applicability to the present age of the world. It seems more profitable to state the causes which, irrespective of isolated texts, would in any case have favoured the growth of the modern custom which forbids the widows of the highest castes to marry again, and which shows signs of extending itself far beyond its present limits, and finally of suppressing widow marriage throughout the entire Hindu community of Bengal. Some, at any rate, of these causes are not far to seek. In the first place, the anxiety of the early Hindu law-givers to circumscribe a woman’s rights to property would unquestionably tend to forbid her to join her lot to a man whose interest it would be to assert and extend those rights as against the members of her husband’s family. At the same time the growth of the doctrine of spiritual benefit would require her to devote her life to the annual performance of her husband's sraddh. Technical obstacles to her remarriage also arise from the Brahmanical theory of marriage itself. That ceremony being regarded as a sacrament ordained for the purification of women, and its essential portion being the gift of the woman by her father to her husband, the effect of the gift is to transfer her from her own gotra or exogamous group into that of her husband's. The bearing of this transfer on the question of her remarriage is thus stated by an orthodox Hindoo at pp. 276-77 of the Papers relating to Infant Marriage and Enforced Widowhood published by the Government of India:—

"Her father being thus out of the question, it may be said that she may give herself in marriage. But this she cannot do, because she never had anything like disposal of herself. When young she was given away, so the ownership over her (if I may be permitted to use the phrase), vested then in the father, was transferred by a solemn religious act to the husband, and he being no more, there is no one to give her away; and since Hindu marriage must take the form of a religious gift, her marriage becomes impossible."

A powerful influence must also have been exerted by a cause which, so far as I am aware, has not hitherto been noticed in this connection. This is the custom which Mr. Ibbetson has called "hypergamy, or the law of superior marriage"—the rule which compels a man to wed his daughter with a member of a group which shall be equal or superior in rank to his own, while he himself may take his wife, or at any rate his second wife, from a group of inferior standing. The Kulinism of Bengal is perhaps the best known illustration of this law; but instances of its working are found all over India, and it clearly may have arisen wherever great pride of blood co-existed with a mode of life demanding the continual maintenance of a high standard of ceremonial purity. In a society so organized it must needs be that offences come, and that they affect the matrimonial status of the family by whom they come. The tribe or caste would then be broken up, like the Jews in modern Germany, into divisions of varying social position and purity of lineage, and intermarriage between these would in India be regulated by the law stated above, which appears to owe its form to the passages in the early texts which admit of the marriage of a man of a higher caste to a woman of a lower caste, but condemn the converse practice in the strongest terms. The first consequence of this restriction would be a surplus of marriageable women in the superior groups; for the men of a given superior group might, and presumably in some instances would, marry women of an inferior group, while men of this group would be barred for the women of the superior group. Competition for husbands would follow; the bride-price of early usage would disappear, and would be replaced by the bridegroom-price now paid among most of the higher castes in India; and in extreme cases female infanticide would be resorted to. Widows certainly would be the first to be excluded from the marriage market, for in their case the interests of the individual families would be identical with those of the group. The family would already have paid a bridegroom-price to get their daughter or sister married, and would naturally be indisposed to pay a second, and probably higher, price to get her married again. The group, in its turn, would be equally adverse to an arrangement which tended to increase the number of marriageable women. Members of the higher castes, indeed, have frequently told me that these reasons of themselves were sufficient to make them regard with disfavour the... modern movement in favour of widow marriage. For, they said, we find it hard enough already to get our daughters married into families of our own rank, and things will be worse still if widows enter the competition with all the advantages they derive from having got over their first shyness, and acquired some experience of the ways of men. The sentiments of Mr. Weller sounded strange in the mouth of a Kulin Brahman, but the argument was used in entire good faith, and was backed up by much lamentation over the speaker's ill-luck in being the father of four daughters, all unmarried.

* Tagore Law Lectures, 1879, pp. 187, 188.
† Panjáb Census Report, p. 386. Mr. Ibbetson adds in a note:—"I am indebted to Mr. Coldstream for these two words [hypergamy and isogamy]." Hypergamy, indeed, would appear rather to mean "too much marriage" than "marriage in a higher rank," but the highest classical authority in India prefers it to anoterogamy, the only alternative which suggested itself.

The considerations stated above are entitled to whatever support they may derive from the fact that the castes which permit widows to remarry know nothing of the custom of hypergamy, and as a rule pay for brides, not for bridegrooms. Among these groups the normal proportion of the sexes, whatever that may be, at the age of marriage has not been affected by any artificial divisions, and there is every reason to believe that widows who are in other respects eligible have no particular difficulty in finding husbands. Polygamy prevails on a limited scale, and a large proportion of the men have two wives, the second wife being often a young widow chosen by the man himself for her personal attractions, after the first wife, whom his parents selected for him, has lost her looks and become little more than a household drudge. Another point is that the lower castes seem to have a greater capacity than the higher for throwing off sub-castes. Deviations from caste usage, trivial changes of occupation, settlement outside the traditional habitat of the caste, and a variety of similar causes which in the higher castes would, as a rule, merely affect the standing of certain families in the scale of hypergamy, tend in the lower castes to form endogamous groups, the members of which intermarry only among themselves. The difference is important, as the latter process does not disturb the balance of the sexes, and the former does.
Let me now state as concisely as possible the actual practice which rules in respect of widow marriage in the four great Provinces—Behar, Bengal Proper, Orissa, and Chota Nagpore—which make up the Lieutenant-Governorship of Bengal. In Behar a fairly liberal tendency seems to prevail. All castes except Brahmans, Rajputs, Bābhus, Kāyasths, and certain castes belonging to the Baniyā class, which are not properly native to Behar, permit widows to marry again by the form known as sagai. The etymology of the word sagai is obscure. It has been supposed to be a corruption of sa-gotra or sva-gotra; the idea being that as a woman passes by marriage into her husband's gotra or exogamous group, if she marries again within that gotra (as she usually does), she constitutes an exception to the ordinary rule of exogamy. The Bengal term (sanga or senga) does not, however, bear out this view, and it seems probable that the word simply denotes cohabitation (sanga), and has reference to the fact that a widow marriage is established by the parties living together, and is accompanied by a very meagre ceremony, or none at all. The phera or pacing round the sacred fire is never practised on such occasions: the husband merely smears some vermilion on the woman's forehead and takes her to live with him.

Widow marriages in Behar are usually brought about by the relatives of the widow. In some cases she may herself take the initiative, "but," as one of my Behar correspondents writes to me, "public opinion is against love marriages." The sardár or head of the caste council (pancháyat) has also to be consulted, but this is mostly a matter of form, as he rarely withholds his consent. Although by marriage every woman is supposed to pass into her husband's gotra, no regard is paid to that gotra in arranging for the remarriage of a widow. Whether her husband's death is supposed to dissolve the gotra tie or not is a point I am unable to clear up. Certain it is that the persons whom she may not marry as a widow are the persons who would have been barred for her as a maiden. She may marry her late husband's younger brother, or younger cousin, and in some castes she is under a sort of obligation to do so. Marriage, however, with her late husband's elder brother or elder cousin, or with any of his direct or collateral ascendants, is strictly prohibited. To this extent her table of prohibited degrees is enlarged.

The ceremony varies in certain respects according as the bridegroom is himself a widower or a bachelor. If he is a widower, he goes at nightfall to the bride's house in his ordinary dress with a few of his friends. There they are feasted during the night. Towards daybreak the bridegroom, dressed in a new suit of clothes presented by the bride's relations, meets the bride, who wears a new cloth (sari) given her by the bridegroom, in one of the inner rooms of the house. There in the presence of her female relations he smears powdered vermilion (sindur) on her forehead and the parting of her hair. This completes the ceremony. Some castes add to it the form of throwing a sheet (chadur) over both parties, and under this sheet the smearing of vermilion is gone through. Brahmans take no part in the ritual, nor are any calculations entered into to find out an auspicious day. Early next morning the married couple go home to the husband's house without the final ceremony (rukhsati) which is used in bringing home a virgin bride. Even in the case of a virgin widow no rukhsati is performed; but as a child-widow is never married again until she has attained puberty, there is no necessity for a ceremony designed to celebrate that event.

When a bachelor marries a widow, the ritual is more elaborate. Astrologers are called in to fix a lucky day; a bridal canopy (marwa) is erected in the bridegroom's house, and his ancestors are solemnly propitiated by Brahmans. In none of these ceremonies, however, does the bride take part, nor does she approach the marwa. She is brought to the house by night, and towards daybreak is conducted to an inner room, where the bridegroom puts vermilion on her forehead in the presence of the females of the family.

Such marriages are not considered disreputable. The sagai bride has all the rights and position of a wife married by the full-blown Brahmanical ceremony. Her children by her second husband inherit equally with any children whom he may have had by a former virgin bride; they offer sacrifices to their father and his ancestors; they are received as members of his gotra, and they marry among the women of the caste. In these respects their position differs materially from that of the widow's children by her late husband, who properly belong to his family and are usually taken care of by his relations. Should they decline the charge, the children follow the widow; but they are not deemed members of the family into which she has married, and they are not allowed to join in the domestic worship or to share in the inheritance.

So far, it may be said, the question of widow marriage in Behar seems to rest upon a reasonable footing. Symptoms of a tendency in the opposite direction are, however, not wanting. The Kurmis are a case in point. Some months ago I had a large body of them before me, and was asking "what sort of Kurmis" they were. One group answered promptly, "We are Ayodhya Kurmis: we do not allow widows to marry again." Another group, of Jeswar Kurmis, admitted with considerable reluctance that their widows did remarry. In fact, the tone in which both sets spoke on the subject made it clear that the Ayodhya had adopted this restriction in comparatively recent times, and were very proud of the distinction. The Jeswars, on the other hand, were rather ashamed of themselves, and were particularly anxious to explain that they did not allow the widow to marry any one she chose, but expected her to marry her deceased husband's younger brother. If she married an outsider, she forfeited all claim not only to her husband's property, but also to the custody of her children. It is possible that remarriage restricted by these conditions may represent an advance from the promiscuous remarriage practised by the lower castes towards the total prohibition in vogue among the higher castes. It should be mentioned that the Kurmis of Behar are a perfectly distinct race from the aboriginal Kurmis of Chota Nagpore and parts of Orissa, whose totemistic usages have been referred to above. Both Jeswar and Ayodhya Kurmis approach closely to the Aryan type of feature, and some of them are very fine-looking men.

Other Behar castes in a state of transition as regards widow marriage are the Sonars, Sunris, Koiris, and Telis. Among the Sonar, the Bhojpuria and Kanaujia allow widows to remarry, while the Kamarkalla, Mairh and Ayodhiabasi do not. All five sub-castes are endogamous, and are subdivided into smaller exogamous sections, called muls. In Durbhunga, the Biyahut Sunris prohibit widow marriage; the Saghut and Darchua allow it. In Gya, the Koiris belong for the most part to three sub-castes—the Barkidangi, Chutki-dangi, and Jaruhar, of whom the last-mentioned practise widow remarriage; the former do not. So also the Telis of Saran have five sub-castes, four permitting widow remarriage, and one, the Behuta (corruption of Biyahu, "the married ones") forbidding it.

In Chota Nagpore the castes which are, or pretend to be, of Behar origin follow the Behar rules in the matter of widow marriage. The aboriginal tribes—Santals, Bhumij, Mundas, Oraons, and Hos—permit widows to marry again without imposing any restrictions on their selection of a second husband, except that the prohibited degrees must be avoided. They also sanction considerable liberty of divorce at the instance of either husband or wife, and permit divorced wives to marry again. A step higher in the social scale, the transition to orthodox habits is well marked by the Koiris of Mánbhum. These people, while retaining exogamous groups which stamp them as of aboriginal descent, forbid, at least in theory, the remarriage of widows, though they allow them to live in a sort of licensed concubinage not preceded by any kind of ceremony. Even this concession is unknown to the Lohars and Dhobis, who though occupying a very low social position in relation to the higher castes, have completely thrown off a practice which they regard as a badge of social degradation. They absolutely prohibit the remarriage of widows and divorced wives.

The tendency to imitate the usages of the higher castes, which has been remarked in Behar and Chota Nagpore, operates much more strongly in Bengal Proper and Orissa. In Orissa, for instance, the Goalás take a higher position than in Behar, and rigorously prohibit widow remarriage. Throughout Bengal the Kaibarttas, though ranking below the Nabasakha or group of thirteen (formerly nine) castes from whose hands an orthodox Brahman can take water, marry their daughters as infants, and forbid their widows to remarry. In Dacca the gunny-weaving and mat-making Kapalis, and the Chandals, spoken of in Manu as 'the vilest of mankind,' have given up widow remarriage, and the practice appears to be confined to the Gheri, Rishi, Koch-Mandai, and other aboriginal and semi-aboriginal castes. Similar evidence of the gradual spread of practices prevalent among the higher castes comes to us from Northern Bengal. The Rájbangsis of Rungpore, people of distinctly non-Aryan type, who have abandoned their tribal name of Koch in quite recent times, now pose as high-caste Hindus, and affect great indignation if asked whether their widows can remarry. The Paliyas of Dinagepore, also demonstrably Koch, fall into two sections—Rájbangsi Paliyas and Byabahári, or 'common' Paliyas. The latter practise widow marriage, but are beginning to be ashamed of it, and in this and other matters show signs of a leaning towards orthodox usage. The former are as strict as the extreme ignorance of the 'fallen' Brahmans who act as their family priests admits; and as education spreads among them, they will go on continually raising their standard of ceremonial purity.

The present attitude of the Hindu community towards the recent proposals to recognize and extend the practice of widow marriage may, I think, be briefly stated somewhat to the following effect:—The most advanced class of educated men sympathise in a general way with the movement, but their sympathy is clouded by the apprehension that any considerable addition to the number of marriageable women would add to the existing difficulty and expense of getting their daughters married. Below these we find a very numerous class of men who are educated enough to appreciate the prohibition of widow marriage supposed to be contained in certain texts, and who have no desire to go behind that or any similar injunction in support of which tolerably ancient authority can be quoted. Then come the great mass of the uneducated working classes, with rather vague notions as to the Shastras, but strong in their reverence for Brahmans and keen to appreciate points of social precedence. To them widow marriage is a badge of social degradation, a link which connects those who practise it with Doms, Boonas, Bagdis and 'low people' of various kinds. Lastly, at the bottom of society, as understood by the average Hindu, we find a large group of castes and tribes of which the lower section is represented by pure aborigines practising adult marriage and widow remarriage, while the upper section consists of castes of doubtful origin, most of whom, retaining widow marriage, have taken to infant marriage, while some have got so far as to throw off sub-castes distinguished by their abstention from widow marriage.

It is not suggested that the groups indicated above can be marked off with absolute accuracy. But without insisting upon this, it is clear that the tendency of the lower strata of Hindu society is continually towards closer and closer conformity with the usages of the higher castes. These alone present a definite pattern which admits, up to a certain point, of ready imitation, and the whole Brahmanical system works in this direction. Of late years, moreover, the strength of the Hinduising movement has been greatly augmented by the improvement of communications. People travel more, pilgrimages can be more easily made, and the influence of the orthodox section of society is thus much more widely diffused. The case of the Rajbansis—the fourth largest caste in Bengal—is an excellent illustration of the scale on which this force does its work.

The practice of infant marriage has spread much further and taken root more deeply among the lower castes than its social complement, the prohibition of widow marriage. Both customs, the positive as well as the negative, have been borrowed from the higher castes, and are now regarded as paths leading towards social distinction. But the one is much easier to follow than the other. A man must get his daughter married at latest when she is fourteen or fifteen years old. To marry her five or six years earlier causes him no particular inconvenience, and confers on him whatever consideration may attach to religious orthodoxy and social propriety. On the other hand, to stop the remarriage of widows, in castes where the balance of the sexes has not been disturbed by hypergamy, must at starting cause some practical inconvenience. Among the lower castes women are much more of a power than they are among the higher; they assert themselves freely on a variety of public occasions, and in many cases they have secured for themselves the right to initiate proceedings for divorce. One can hardly doubt that their influence would be exercised in favour of widow marriage, and that it would tend on the whole towards keeping that institution alive. Some allowance must also be made for the fact that the lower castes do not keep their women in seclusion. A good-looking widow shut up in the family zenana can be more easily sacrificed to notions of social propriety than a woman who goes out and meets possible suitors every day of her life. To whatever cause the difference may be due, it is certain that of two customs, both adopted under pressure of the same motives, the one—infant marriage—is almost universal, while the other——the prohibition of widow marriage—has only the comparatively limited currency already explained. Infant marriage in fact is now so widely diffused as to have almost entirely displaced adult marriage within the limits of the caste system proper. The aboriginal races of Chota Nagpore and the Orissa hills, the semi-Mongolian tribes of the Himalayan region and the Indo-Chinese people of the Chittagong Hill Tracts still maintain a system of courtship and marriage between full-grown youths and maidens which has been minutely described by several sympathetic observers. Directly we leave these tolerably compact tribes, and pass on to the less definite groups which form a debateable land between the tribe and the caste, we find either infant marriage in undisputed possession, or a mixed system which tolerates adult marriage as a resource open to those who cannot afford to do anything better for their children, but at the same time enjoins the more respectable custom of infant marriage for all parents whose circumstances admit of it.

In the case of the lower castes there is little room for doubt but that the custom of infant marriage has been consciously borrowed from the higher castes in obedience to that tendency to imitation which we may almost describe as an ultimate law of the caste system. But how did the higher castes come by a custom which is without a parallel (at any rate on so large a scale) elsewhere in the world, and which cannot be referred to any of those primitive instincts which have usually determined the relations of the sexes? Neither sexual passion nor the desire for companionship and service can be called in to account for a man marrying a girl at an age when she is physically incapable of fulfilling any of the duties of a wife.

Primitive man knows nothing of infant marriage, nor is it easy to conceive how such an institution could have arisen in the struggle for existence out of which society has been evolved. The modern savage woos in a summary and not over delicate fashion a sturdy young woman who can cook his food, carry his baggage, collect edible grubs, and make herself generally useful. To his untutored mind the Hindu child-bride would seem about as suitable a helpmate as an American professional beauty. If, then, infant marriage is in no way a normal product of social evolution, and in fact is met with only in India, to what causes shall we look for its origin? The standard Brahmanical explanation is palpably inadequate. It represents marriage as a sort of sacrament, of which every maiden must partake in order that she may cleanse her own being from the taint of original sin, that she may accomplish the salvation of her father and his ancestors, and that she may bring forth a son to carry on the domestic worship (sacra privata) of her husband's family. So far as marriage itself goes, all this is intelligible enough as a highly specialised development of certain well-known ancient ideas. But it does not touch the question of age. Granted that the begetting of a son is essential for the continuance of the sacra privata, as Greek and Roman examples teach us, why should the householder, on whom this solemn duty devolves, go out of his way to defer its fulfilment by marrying a girl who has not yet attained the age of child-bearing? The Brahmans reply that the earlier in a girl's life she accomplishes her mystical functions, the better. But this clearly belongs to the large class of ex post facto explanations of which sacerdotal and legal literature is in all ages and countries so full. The priests and lawyers who compile the text-books find certain customs in force, and feel bound to invent reasons for their existence. Being unfettered by the historical sense, and disposed to give free play to their inner consciousness, it is hardly surprising that their reasons should be as often false as true. An ingenious explanation of a more scientific character has been given by Mr. John Nesfield in an article* on the Tharus and Bogshas of Upper India. Mr. Nesfield says:

"In the oldest type of society a woman was exposed to a double evil—the stain of communism within her own clan so long as she remained there, and the risk of forcible abduction into an alien clan, where she became the wife-slave of the man who captured her. And herein, I think, lies the secret of the seemingly irrational and certainly unnatural customs of Hindus, by which a girl is betrothed at six or eight and married at ten or eleven. The betrothal ceremony is considered by all classes of the Hindu community to be of immense importance. The force of public opinion has made it as binding as marriage itself. If the boy dies before the marriage is performed, the child who has been betrothed remains a widow for life. A father is publicly disgraced in the eyes of his countrymen if he neglects to get his daughter finally married before she has completed the age of twelve. There are few points in which the social customs of the Hindus have been more severely condemned. But though it may be granted that the time has long passed when any good could be gained from their retention, it may yet be contended that they have been of some use in their day, and that customs so opposed to the plain dictates of nature could not have been accepted by a rational people without some rational purpose. It must be remembered that the natives of Hindustan, at the time when they first appear in history as antagonists to the invading Aryans, were in the savage stage, and that they have owed their subsequent reclamation, imperfect as it is, to the subtle and ever-widening influence of Hinduism—a composite and very elastic creed, made up of the fusion of Aryan with native or aboriginal elements.

*Calcutta Review, January 1886.
I conceive, then, that the customs, to which so much exception has been taken, were the restraints imposed by this creed upon the rough matrimonial usages of the races amongst whom its lot was cast, some of which usages were formerly countenanced even by Hinduism itself as a concession to the prevailing savagery. Marriage by stealth, marriage by capture, and marriage by the simple act of voluntary reciprocal intercourse, were all recognized by the ancient Hindu lawgivers as permissible to certain castes; and even Brahmans, the holy priests, and teachers of Hinduism were allowed to indulge in the kind last named. It is no wonder, then, that a religion which was forced to concede so much to existing custom should have sought to provide safeguards for the protection of the weaker sex through some counter-teaching of its own. By ruling, as it did, that a girl must be betrothed and married at a tender age to a youth of some outside clan, and by making this rule binding for life on pain of the severest penalties, it protected her both from the stain of communism within her own clan, and from the risk of forcible abduction into another. This explains, too, how it has come to pass that amongst Hindus, and Hindus only, the larger price is paid for the youth, and the smaller one for the maid—an exact inversion of the rule which prevails everywhere else. The Hindi word for betrothal is mangni, that is, 'begging' for a boy, for until the boy had been secured, the girl was not safe."

I have quoted Mr. Nesfield's views at length in order to guard against the danger of misstating an argument which I think inapplicable to the particular society with which we are concerned. The motives to which his theory appeals are no doubt highly intelligible, and in certain states of society would possibly be sufficient to account for the institution of infant marriage. It seems to me, however, that the society depicted in the Rig and Atharva Vedas must have got far beyond, if indeed they ever passed through, the stage of communal marriage and forcible abduction of wives. Courtship of a very modern type was fully recognized, and the consent of the girl's father or brother was sought only after the young people had themselves come to an understanding. As an additional and conclusive indication that the kind of marriage contemplated by the Vedas was the individual marriage of comparatively advanced civilization, I may refer to a remarkable custom, traces of which have survived in modern Italy—the lustration of the bride's night-dress after the wedding night.* This custom is clearly incompatible with communal marriage, and could only have arisen in a society which set a high value on female chastity and had left primitive communism ages behind.

"

For these reasons I prefer to seek the origin of infant marriage in the custom of hypergamy described above. In further illustration of the working of that custom, I invite reference to the following diagram:

```
+---------+    +---------+    +---------+
|         |    |         |    |         |
|  A      |    |  B      |    |  C      |
|         |    |         |    |         |
|         |    |         |    |         |
|         |    |         |    |         |
+---------+    +---------+    +---------+
  X     a  b  e
```

Let X represent a caste divided into the three hypergamous groups A, B, and C. Within each group the capital letters stand for the marriageable men, and the small letters for the marriageable women of the group. The horizontal and diagonal lines connecting the capitals with the small letters show what classes of men and women can intermarry. It will be seen that a man of the A group can marry a woman of his own or of the two lower groups; a man of B can marry into B or C, while a man of C is confined to his own class, and cannot marry a woman from either of the classes above him. Conversely, a woman of the C class can get a husband from A, B, or C, and a woman of the B class from A or B; but a woman of the A class cannot find a husband outside of her own group. Excluding polygamy or polyandry, and supposing the women of each group to be evenly distributed among the groups they are entitled to marry into, the result of the first series of marriages would be to leave two-thirds of the women in the A group without husbands, and two-thirds of the men in the C group without wives. The women of all the groups, and especially those of A, will compete for husbands, and the men of C group for wives. But the fact that the social status of a family is determined not so much by the class from which it takes its wives as by the class from which it gets its husbands, would put the men of the lowest class and the women of the highest at a great comparative disadvantage, and would thus tend to produce infant marriage; for the number of possible husbands being limited, the natural tendency is to endeavour to secure them as soon as possible. That this motive operates strongly at the present day is plainly stated by one of the writers in the official publication already referred to,* who says:—

"Under these circumstances, when, in the case of a daughter, parents see that, unless they marry her at once, the one or two bride-grooms that there are open for their selection would be availed of by others, and that they would be disabled from marrying her before the eleventh year, and that they would thereby incur a religious sin and social degradation as regards the caste, they would seize that opportunity to marry their daughter, quite disregardful of the evil effects of infant marriages."

Again, when the custom of infant marriage had once been started, under pressure of social necessity, by the families of the highest group, who had the largest surplus of marriageable daughters, a sort of fashion would have been set and would be blindly followed through all the grades.

Two forces are thus at work in the same direction, both tending to disturb the balance of the sexes and to produce abnormal matrimonial relations between the members of different social groups. Enforced competition for husbands on the part of the higher groups, and the desire to imitate their superiors which animates the lower groups, combine to run up the price of husbands in the upper classes; while the demand for wives by the men of the lowest class, which ought by rights to produce equilibrium, is artificially restricted in its operation by the rule that they can under no circumstances marry a woman of the classes above their own. These men, therefore, are left very much out in the cold, and often do not get wives until late in life. An unmarried son does not disgrace the family, but there is no greater reproach than to have a daughter unmarried at the age of puberty. Husbands are bought for the girls, and the family gets its money's worth in social estimation. Bargains, however, must be taken when they are to be had; and no father dares run the risk of waiting till his daughter is physically mature. He is bound to be on the safe side, and therefore he marries her, child as she may be, whenever a good match offers.

---

* Papers relating to Infant Marriage and Enforced Widowhood in India, p. 178.

Many hard things have been said of infant marriage, and the modern tendency is to assume that a population which countenances such a practice must be in a fair way towards great moral degradation, if not to ultimate extinction. Much of this criticism seems to me to be greatly exaggerated, and to be founded on considerable ignorance of the present conditions and future possibilities of Oriental life. In truth, excluding the poetical view, that marriages are made in heaven, two working theories of the institution are at present in existence—one which leaves marriages to make themselves by the process of unrestricted courtship, and another which requires them to be made by the parents or guardians of the persons who are to be married. The first, which we may perhaps call the method of natural selection, is accepted and more or less acted up to by all Western nations, except those who follow the French custom of mariages de convenance. The second, a system of avowedly artificial selection, is in force, with few exceptions, throughout the East. For all Hindus, except the handful of déclassés who have adopted more or less completely European ideas on the subject of marriage, and seem now to be on the high road to form a new caste, the bare idea that a girl can have any voice in the selection of her husband is excluded by the operation of three inexorable sanctions—by the ordinances of the Hindu religion, by the internal structure of the caste system, and by the general tone and conditions of social life in India. Religion prescribes that, like the Roman bride of early days, a Hindu girl shall be given (tradita in manum) by her father into the power of her husband; caste complications demand that the ceremonial portion of the transfer shall be effected while she is still a child; while the character of society, the moral tone of the men, the seclusion of the women, the immemorial taboos and conventions of family etiquette, render it impossible that she should be wooed and won like her European sister. To persons of a romantic turn of mind the admission that infant marriage in some shape must be accepted as an ultimate fact of the Hindu social system will sound like a final abandonment of all hope of reform. But there is more to be said for the custom than appears at first sight. A moment's dispassionate consideration will show that if any sort of controlling authority is to make people's marriages for them, the earlier it commences and completes its operations, the better. Where the choice of a husband must in any case be undertaken by the parents, it is clearly tempting Providence for them to defer it until their daughter has grown up, and may have formed an embarrassing attachment on her own account. As for love, that may come—and, from all one hears of Hindu unions, usually does come—as readily after marriage as before, provided that opportunities for falling in love with the wrong man are judiciously withheld. This may seem a cynical way of handling the matter, but it is the only way that accords with the lines of oriental life as at present ordered, and it were folly to dream of making all things new.
Abadhut, one who has ‘shaken off’ the infirmities of humanity, the title used among themselves by a sect of Saiva ascetics, which is divided into four classes—Brahma, Saiba, Bhakta, and Hānṣa or Turiyā—of which the first three may be either householders or mendicants, while the fourth lead a pure ascetic life. Abadhuts are said to be distinguished from Dandis by not observing the practice, strictly enjoined by the latter, of shaving the head on the day of new moon.

Abadhutāni, Abadhuti, a member of a sect of female ascetics said to have been founded by a woman named Gangāgiri: hence in Upper India the term Abadhuti is commonly applied to all female religious mendicants. Abadhutānis smear themselves with the ashes of burnt cowdung and wander about begging their way on the great pilgrim routes. With few exceptions, they lead an immoral life. It should be observed, however, that they are excluded from the pangaṭā or societies of the male Abadhuts, and that an Abadhutāni can only be initiated by a woman.

Abar, a sub-sept of the Kisku sept of Santals.

Abasakti, a title of Bangaja Kayasths.

Abbaye, a village or communal headman among the Kandh (Khond) tribe in Orissa.

Abdál, a group of low Mahomedans, believed to have been originally a subdivision of the Bediyan, whom the orthodox do not recognize as members of the brotherhood of Islam. For this reason the Abdal marry among themselves, and the community is virtually a caste. The characteristic occupation of the men is to castrate bullocks, and their females act as midwives.

Abdár, a servant whose office it is to prepare water for domestic use or for drinking, a title occasionally used by Kahárs and other castes of similar social standing who belong to the jatācharami group, from whose hands a Brahman may take water.

Abhepur, a mul or section of the Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

A'bhir, a synonym for Goálá.

Abhirám, a sub-caste of Telis in Orissa.

Abhyágat, a sect of devotees who live alone, and subsist by begging. They are sometimes found dwelling together in small communities, somewhat resembling the minor monastic associations of mediaeval Europe.

Abkahlá, a mul or section of the Kesarwáni Banías in Behar; a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwár in Behar.

Abkahon, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Abkár, a manufacturer or retailer of spirituous liquors, a title of Kalwár in Behar.
Abya, a section of Brahmans.

Achal, a hypergamous group of the Bangaja Kayasths.

Achambitá, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Achámi, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Achárj, Achári, Achárya, a religious teacher; properly, the Brahman who instructs the religious student of the two next castes—the Kshatriya and the Vaisya—as well as the Brahmans, in the Vedas. In modern use it is applied to any religious instructor, or to any Brahman or religious mendicant professing to be qualified to give spiritual instruction or to supervise and direct religious ceremonies. The term has thus come to be a title or family name of high-caste Smriti Brahmans in Bengal. In the North-West Provinces it has been selected by the Educational Department as the title to be given to those students who pass the most difficult examination in the Benares Sanskrit College. A title signifying an instructor, given by the Gayawals of Gya to Brahmans employed to lead the pilgrims in their devotions. It is to be carefully distinguished from Achárjí, the designation of the despised sub-caste of astrologers.

Achárjí, “the teacher,” ironical designation of a sub-caste of Brahmans in Bengal; also known as Lagan-Achárjí, Ganak, Daivajna, and in Purneah as Upádhyáya. The members of this sub-caste prepare and decipher horoscopes, draw up almanacs, tell fortunes by palmistry and by astrological methods, draw pictures of Hindu deities, make idols, manufacture sold or pith, and decorate houses by painting rough designs of flowers and animals on the walls. They also attend at annapráshan and upaváyan ceremonies of the higher castes. According to some authorities they rank socially below the Agradáni Brahmans, from whom they will receive alms. On the other hand, Patit or Sudra Brahmans will eat with the Achárjí, but not with the Agradáni.

Achárwálá, a maker or vendor of pickles, preserves, etc., usually a Mahomedan.

Achárya, a group of the Sroti sub-caste of Uttal Brahmans in Orissa; a thar of the Kaundin gotra of Nepáli Brahmans; a title of Brahmans.

Acháryasekharí, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Achut, a sept of Bairágis.

Adaki, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Adampur, a section of the Ariásub-caste of Bais Baniyas in Behar.

Adarki, a sub-caste of Baniyas in Behar, most of whom make their living by selling vegetables; others trade in grain, and some cultivate land. They permit widows to marry again, and eat flesh—practices condemned by the more orthodox members of the trading group of castes. They abstain, however, from wine, and in other respects conform to the standard rules of Hinduism.
Addádár, the owner of a stand or station (addá) where porters, bearers, carters, and the like wait to be hired, paying the proprietor a percentage on their earnings for the accommodation.

Adéb, a sept of the Santál tribe in Western Bengal.

Adharna, a sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.

Adhárpur, a section of the Pachainya sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Adhíá, a section of Kurmis; a title of Nápita in Maldah.

AdhíáDar, (i) a cultivator who holds land on a sort of metayer tenure, paying his landlord half the produce as rent; (ii) a cultivator who spends half his time in one village, half in another, cultivating lands in both.

Adhikári, (i) a title of Brahmanas, Jugis, and Vaishnabs who officiate at religious ceremonies, serve as priests and spiritual guides of Vaishnabs and lower castes, and deal in charms, especially in use among Vaishnavas; (ii) a title of Sadgope, of Rajbansis in Jalpaiguri, and of Paliyás in DinaJPur; (iii) a manager of theatrical performances; (iv) a thar of the Kasya gotra of Nepáli Brahmanas.

Adhkúrmi or Madhyam Kurmi, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Western Bengal.

Adhíya, a title of Bangaja Káyasths and Subarnabaniks in Bengal.

Adi, a section of Jugis.

Adi Gaurá, a group of Gaura Brahmanas.

Adínupso, a sept of Lepchas in Darjiling.

Adí Sri-Gaurá, a group of the Sri-Gaura sub-caste of Gaura Brahmanas.

Aditi or Aditiya, a mercantile correspondent or agent; the word is probably a corruption of Adat, Arhat, or Arhatiá.

Aditya, a title of Dakshin-Ráhri and Bangaja Káyasths.

Adra, a section of Goráits in Chota Nagpur.

Adrakhiá, a mul or section of the Banodhiá sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar.

Adriá, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmanas in Behar.

Adyá, a gotra or section of the Baidya caste in Bengal.

Adyeb, a section of the Sárák caste in Mánbhum.

Afang, a sept of Tipperahs in the Chittagong Hill Tracts.

Afin-wálá, Afin-farosh, a seller of opium. The Arabic word afin is usually corrupted to afin or afím in the Indian vernaculars.

Aganpuríá, a mul or section of the Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Agariá, a sub-tribe of Asuras in Chota Nagpur; a class of beggars wandering about with tame monkeys, whose antics they exhibit.

Agariá, Anguwar, a cultivating caste found in the Tributary Mahals of Chota Nagpur. They claim to be the descendants of certain Kshatriya immigrants from the neighbourhood of Agra, who put off the sacred thread when they settled in a new country and took to holding the plough. Dalton describes them as tall and well-made, with high Aryan features and tawny complexions. Agariás betroth their daughters as infants, but do not marry them until they are full-grown. They allow widows to marry again. The caste employ Brahmans from the North-West Provinces, and will not accept the services of the Utkal Brahmans, who ordinarily serve as priests in the Southern Tributary Mahals. In one point they depart remarkably from orthodox Hindu practice: they bury their dead, and, after the bones have got dry, dig up the skull and the chief joints and convey them to the Ganges. This may perhaps be thought to suggest a connexion with some religious sect.

In Gangpur, where every one believes in witchcraft, Agariás women are supposed to be the most potent witches in the country.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Agariás in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>1,966</td>
<td>1,146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>1,678</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>7</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>885</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>3,448</td>
<td>6,278</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Agaria-Binjhiá, a sub-tribe of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Agaria-Korwa, a sub-tribe of Korwas.

Agarwál, Agarwálá, a wealthy trading caste of Behar and Upper India, who deal in grain and jewellery, and are also bankers and usurers. Authorities differ regarding their origin and the etymology of the name they bear. Following a tradition communicated to him by the chaudhri or headman of the caste in Benares, Mr. Sherring traces the Agarwáls to the banks of the Godavery, in Madras, and derives their name from one Agar Nath or Agar Sen, who is believed to have preserved the customs of the caste inviolate when all his brethren joined themselves to the Sudras. Agar Sen is supposed to have lived at Agroha, a small town on the borders of the Rájputana desert, where his family expanded into the Agarwál caste.

Another and more common version of the story describes Agar Sen as the Vaisya Raja of Agroha, and adds that the Agarwál caste spread over Hindustan after the taking of their original home by Shaháb-ud-din Ghori in 1195. This is the view favoured by Sir Henry Elliot, who points out that the association of the Agarwáls throughout the North-West Provinces with the worship of Guga Pir, the snake-king of Agroha, bears testimony to the historical accuracy of the tradition. Mr. Nesfield prefers to derive the name, both of this caste and of the cognate caste of Agrahri, from agari or agar (Sansk. aguru), the aromatic wood of the eagle wood tree (Aquilaria agallocha, Roxb.), which is sold as a perfume. There seems, however, to be no evidence to connect either caste with the production or sale of this scent; and the fact that the best kind is extracted from the leguminous tree Alzeylon agallochum, Loureiro, growing in Camboja and South Cochin China, may perhaps be thought to support this view.
The Agarwals of Behar are divided into the following seventeen sections (gotras):

The section-names are said to refer to eighteen sacrifices performed by Rájá Agar Náth in honour of Lakshmi. By these sacrifices, so says the legend current in Behar, he won from the goddess the boon that his descendants by Mádhavi, a daughter of the Nága Rájá Kumud, should bear the name of Agarwal, should never be in want, and should enjoy the protection of Lakshmi so long as they kept the diveèli festival. When the eighteenth sacrifice was half over, the Rájá was struck with horror at the slaughter of animals involved, broke off the ceremony, and enjoined his descendants never to take life. The last, or “half-gotra” Goin, represents this incomplete sacrifice. Another explanation is that some member of the caste by oversight married a woman of his own gotra, and that the gotra in question was divided into two by the heads of the caste in order to cover this breach of the rule of exogamy. There is nothing in the names themselves to throw light on their origin. The first certainly, and possibly the third and fourth, are names of Vedic saints. The second occurs among the Rajputs.

With the Agarwals, as with all castes at the present day, the section-names go by the male side. In other words, a son belongs to the same gotra as his father—not to the same gotra as his mother, and kinship is no longer reckoned through females alone. Traces of an earlier matriarchal system may perhaps be discerned in the legend already referred to, which represented Rájá Agar Náth as successfully contending with Indra for the hand of the daughters of two Nága Rájás, and obtaining from Lakshmi the special favour that his children by one of them should bear their father’s name. The memory of this Nága Princess is still held in honour. “Our mother’s house is of the race of the snake” (ját ká nánthál Nágbansí hai), say the Agarwals of Behar; and for this reason no Agarwal, whether Hindu or Jain, will kill or molest a snake. In Delhi, Vaishnava Agarwals paint pictures of snakes on either side of the outside doors of their houses, and make offerings of fruit and flowers before them. Jain Agarwals do not practise any form of snake-worship.

Read in the light of Bachofen’s researches1 into archaic forms of kinship, the legend and the prohibition arising from it seem to take us back to the prehistoric time when the Nága race still maintained a separate national existence, and had not been absorbed by the conquering Aryans; when Nága women were eagerly sought in marriage by Aryan chiefs; and when the offspring of such unions belonged by Nága custom to their mother’s family. In this view the boon granted by Lakshmi to Rájá Agar Náth, that his children should be called after his name, marks a transition from the system of female kinship, characteristic of the Nāgas, to the new order of male parentage introduced by the Brahmans, while the Behar saying about the Nānīhāl is merely a survival of those matriarchal ideas according to which the snake-totem of the race would necessarily descend in the female line.

1 Antiquarische Briefe, vol. i, pp. 41-92.
AGARWAL.

In the last of the six letters, entitled “Orestes-Astika, Eine Griechisch-Indische Parallelen,” Bachofen has the following remarks on the importance of the part played by the Nāga race in the development of the Brahmanical polity:—

“The connexion of Brahmans with Nāga women is a significant historical fact. Wherever a conquering race allies itself with the women of the land, indigenous manners and customs come to be respected, and their maintenance is deemed the function of the female sex. Countless examples of all ages and countries bear witness to the fact. A long series of traditions corroborate it in connexion with the autochthonous Nāga race. The respect paid to Nāga women, the influence which they exercised, not merely on their own people, but also in no less degree on the rulers of the country, the fame of their beauty, the praise of their wisdom—all this finds manifold expression in the tales of the Kashmir chronicle and in many other legends based upon the facts of real life.”

All the sections are strictly exogamous, but the rule of unilateral exogamy is supplemented by provisions forbidding marriage with certain classes of relations. Thus a man may not marry a woman—(a) belonging to his own gotra; (b) descended from his own paternal or maternal grandfather, great-grandfather, or great-great-grandfather; (c) descended from his own paternal or maternal aunt; (d) belonging to the grand-maternal family (nānīhāl) of his own father or mother. He may marry the younger sister of his deceased wife, but not the elder sister, nor may he marry two sisters at the same time. As is usual in such cases, the classes of relations barred are not mutually exclusive. All the agnatic descendants of a man’s three nearest male ascendants are necessarily members of his own gotra, and therefore come within class (a) as well as class (b). Again, the paternal and maternal aunt and their descendants are included among the descendants of the paternal and maternal grandfathers, while some of the members of the nānīhāl must also come under class (b). The gotra rule is undoubtedly the oldest; and it seems probable that the other prohibited classes may have been added from time to time as expe-enience and the growing sense of the true nature of kinship demonstrated the incompleteness of the primitive rule of exogamy.

It is certainly remarkable that a caste so widely diffused as the Agarwals should not have broken up into endogamous divisions, based upon differences of locality, of the type so common in Bengal.
In the North-West Provinces, indeed, it is stated that the Pachhainya or Western branch of the caste cannot intermarry with the Purbiya or Eastern Agarwals. Members of these groups, however, may eat together, and the prohibition on intermarriage is said to have arisen from a comparatively recent quarrel, which is now likely to be made up. In Behar the tendency is to ignore these distinctions and to represent restrictions on intermarriage between Purbiyas and Pachhainyas as matters of family prejudice rather than of caste custom. This, however, may be due to the fact that most of the Behar Agarwals belong to the Purbiya branch, and are regarded as socially inferior to the Pachhainyas. Both intermarriage and community of food are prohibited to the Dasá sub-caste, who are illegitimate descendants of an Agarwal named Basu, and to the Birádari Rájá, or Bisá, who are said to be descended from one Ratan Chand, who was made a Rájá by the Emperor Farokhsír in the early part of last century.

Agarwals usually marry their daughters after they have reached their ninth year, but if no suitable match offers in infancy, it often happens that a girl is not married until she is grown up. In the latter case she goes to live with her husband at once. When married as an infant, the final ceremony (ruk/zati), by which she is made over to her husband, may take place one year, three years, or five years after the regular marriage ceremony. That is to say, if the husband does not claim his wife at the expiration of one year, he must wait three; and if he does not come forward then, he must wait five years. This custom prevails among most of the higher castes in Northern India, and is believed to rest upon some obscure superstition regarding lucky numbers. Whatever may be the origin of the practice, it contrasts favourably with the custom in force among many families of the higher castes in Lower Bengal, in so far as it tends on the whole to defer child-bearing to years of comparative maturity.

Polygamy is prohibited on pain of expulsion from caste, unless the first wife is barren. The Agarwals of Saháránpur, however, disregard the rule, and are nevertheless admitted to intermarriage with the Jain Agarwals of Delhi. A widower may marry again: a widow may not. Divorce is not recognised. If a woman goes wrong, she is turned out of the caste, and must either join some religious sect of dubious morality or become a regular prostitute.

The bulk of the Agarwals belong to the Vaishnava form of Hinduism, but a large proportion follow the tenets of the Digambara sect of Jains, and are stigmatised by orthodox Hindus as nástik or infidels. A few Saivas and Sáktas are met with among the caste; but in deference to the prejudices of the majority, these depart from their ordinary custom by abstaining from sacrificing animals and partaking of flesh or wine. Owing, perhaps, to this uniformity of practice in matters of diet, these differences of religious belief do not operate as a bar to intermarriage; and when a marriage takes place between persons of different religions, the standard Hindu ritual is used. When husband and wife belong to different sects, the wife is formally admitted into her husband's sect, and must in future have her own food cooked separately when staying in her mother's house.

In matters of ritual the Agarwals do not differ materially from the average orthodox Hindus of Upper India. Their special goddess is Lakshmi, to whose favour they attribute the general prosperity of the caste. Gaur Brahmans act as their priests, and do not forfeit their position by doing so. The dead are burned in the ordinary Hindu fashion, and the ashes thrown into the Ganges. The bodies of children under seven years are buried. Among the Agarwals of Behar it is thought right for a man’s descendants to perform his sraddh at Gya. On such occasions a separate cake, called bikrā kā pind, is presented before the propitiation of the other ancestors begins, for the benefit of those ancestors who may have died a violent death. The spiritual interests of the childless dead are supposed to be cared for by their heirs; but where these are distant relatives or merely members of the same gotra, the obligation comes to be very lightly regarded.

The Agarwals claim to be the modern representatives of the Aryan Vaisyas, and profess to trace their descent from a mythical ancestor, Dhanpal, who was the recognised chief of the Vaisyas, and whose daughter, Mukuta, was married to Yajnavalkya. Their occupations have throughout been in keeping with these traditions. After the dispersion of the caste by Shahāb-ud-din their talent for business brought individual members to the front under the Mohommedan Emperors of Delhi. Two of Akbār’s ministers—Madhu Sáh and Todar Māl—are said to have been Agarwals. To the latter was entrusted the settlement of the land revenue: the former held high financial office, and a variety of pics still bears his name. Among the Agarwals of Behar we find the largest proportion engaged in banking, trade, petty money-lending, and similar pursuits. A few are zamindars and holders of large tenures, but in most cases their connexion with the land may be traced to a profitable mortgage on the estate of an hereditary landholder, so that landholding cannot properly be reckoned among the characteristic pursuits of the caste. The poorer members of the caste find employment as brokers, bookkeepers, touts, workers in gold and silver embroidery, and servants, and take to any respectable pursuit except cultivation.

In the Hindu social system Agarwals stand at the head of the group of castes included in the term Baniya. Colonel Tod classes them among the “eighty-four mercantile tribes, chiefly of Rájput origin,” enumerated by him, and their features and complexion stamp them as of tolerably pure Aryan descent. All Pachhainya and most Purbiya Agarwals wear the sacred thread. In Behar they rank immediately below Brahmans and Káyasthas, and the former can take water and certain kinds of sweetmeats from their hands. According to their own account, they can take cooked food only from Brahmans of the Gaur, Tailanga, Gujráti, and Sanáth sub-castes: water and sweetmeats they can take from any Brahmans, except the degraded classes of Ojha and Mahabrahman, from Rájputs, Bás-Baniyas, and Khattris (usually reckoned as Vaisyas), and from the superior members of the class of so-called mixed castes from whose hands Brahmans will take water. Some Agarwals, however, affect a still higher standard of ceremonial purity in the matter of cooked food, and carry their prejudices to such lengths that a mother-in-law will not eat food prepared by her daughter-in-law. All kinds of animal food are strictly prohibited, and the members of the caste also abstain from javanáda rice, which has been parboiled before husking. Jain Agarwals will not eat after dark for fear of swallowing minute insects. Smoking is governed by the rules in force for water and sweetmeats. It is noticed as remarkable that the purohits of the caste will smoke out of the same hookah as their clients.
AGARWAL

The following table illustrates the distribution of the Agarwals in Bengal in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>2,674</td>
<td>135</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,139</td>
<td>1,714</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>1,069</td>
<td>1,510</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>403</td>
<td>201</td>
<td>Tirhut</td>
<td>965</td>
<td>1,214</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>{ Darbhanga}</td>
<td>1,794</td>
<td>3,247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad #</td>
<td>244</td>
<td>948</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>617</td>
<td>1,094</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>144</td>
<td>Champaner</td>
<td>972</td>
<td>325</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>621</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>1,011</td>
<td>2,847</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>728</td>
<td>2,450</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>447</td>
<td>408</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>3,009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>333</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>97</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahi</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>111</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>721</td>
<td>1,046</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranagpur</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>900</td>
<td>216</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boora</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>320</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>38</td>
<td>660</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>276</td>
<td>1,001</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kush Behar</td>
<td>325</td>
<td></td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>977</td>
<td>1,066</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paturpur</td>
<td>143</td>
<td>75</td>
<td>Singhbhum</td>
<td></td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beharganj</td>
<td>76</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>Manbhund</td>
<td>187</td>
<td>398</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainamthinh</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>148</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>553</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Agarwáni, a small caste, only found in the Supul subdivision of Bhágalpur, whither they are believed to have immigrated from Nepal. They work as sawyers, and also collect the sap of kath (Acacia catechu).

Agasti, a title of Kansujia Brahmans; a gotra or section of Nepáli Brahmaus.

Agastya, a section of Brahmans.

Agastya-Rishi, a section of Tántis in Bengal.

Aggechal, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Agnáriá, one of the six subdivisions of the Lohar caste, who manufacture and smelt iron ore, while the Lohondia manufacture pig-iron from it.

Aghor, a low and despised class of men in the Supul subdivision of Bhágalpur, who are said to have no caste and to eat food cooked by either Hindus or Mahomedans. Their number is small (43 in 1881), and most of them live by begging, though of late years a few have taken to cultivation. It is surmised that they may be Aghorías who have abandoned the distinctive practices of their sect. In support of this view it may be noticed that Aghori ascetics eat the jhutá or leavings of all Hindu castes, and that the practice ascribed to the Aghors of Supul only goes a step further.
Aghori, Aghorapanthi, the lowest class of Saivite religious mendicants, who eat human ordure, bones, and filth of all kinds, and extort alms by threatening to exhibit these practices or to pollute the bystanders. They sometimes carry staves set with human bones, and use the upper half of a skull as a water-pot. In 1881 one of these wretches was caught at Rohtak, in the Panjab, in the act of devouring the body of a newly-buried child, which he had dug out. According to Lassen (Ind. Alt. III, 881, and IV, 629) the Aghoris of the present day are closely related to the Kapalika or Kapālādhārīn sect of the middle ages, who wore crowns and necklaces of skulls and offered human sacrifices to Chāmundā, a horrible form of Devi or Pārvati. In support of this view it is observed that in Bhavabhuti's drama of Mālatī Mādhava, written in the eighth century, the Kapālikā sorcerer, from whom Mālatī is rescued as she is about to be sacrificed to Chāmundā, is euphemistically described as an Aghorakantha, from aghora, 'not terrible.' The Aghoris of the present day represent their filthy habits as merely giving practical expression to the abstract doctrine of the Paramahansa sect of Saivites, that "the whole universe is full of Brahma," and consequently that one thing is as pure as another. The mantra or mystic formula by which Aghoris are initiated is believed by other ascetics to be very powerful, and to be capable of restoring to life the human victims offered to Devi and eaten by the officiating priest. The sect is regarded with disgust by all respectable Hindus, and is believed to be dying out. In 1881 it numbered 565 votaries in Bengal (all but two in Behar), 316 in the Panjab, and 93 in the Central Provinces.

Aghorapanthi, a religious group of Jugis.

Aghráit, a section of the Kāmar sub-caste of Dosáds in Behar.

Agiyári, a pangat or section of Dosáds in Behar.

Aglidin Chaurí, pichhli-rāt jeonári Baniáke put jor le háth, "the day before parched barley, the next night the wedding feast, sons of the Baniyá join your hands"—a formula or shibboleth denoting a mut or section of Kesarwáni Baniyás in Behar. The leading idea of the formula seems to be that people who live frugally enough in ordinary times spend their money freely in the Baniyá's shop when they have a wedding on hand. For chauri and jeonár, see Grierson's Peasant Life in Behar, s.v.

Agni, a section of the Bhar caste in Mánbhum. The term appears to have been borrowed from the Brahmanical system in comparatively recent times, as the caste has also a set of the totemistic sections characteristic of the non-Aryan races.

Agníá, a sub-tribe of Dhímáls in the Darjiling Terai.

Agníá-Mech, a sub-tribe of Mechés in Darjiling and Assam.

Agnibesma, a section of the Páschátya Baidik Brahmans in Bengal; a Kehatra-peta gotra or section of Brahmans; a section of Káyasths in Bengal.
Agni-brahman, a Brahman who officiates as priest at the burning of dead bodies.

Agni-brahman, a Brahman who officiates as priest at the burning of dead bodies.

Agni-brahman, a Brahman who officiates as priest at the burning of dead bodies.

Agni-dhaut, a section of Babhans in Behar.

Agnihotri: according to Wilson a Brahman who maintains a perpetual fire in his house. Sherring interprets the term as denoting "one who possesses the materials for the hom or burnt sacrifice." He adds—"All Brahmans are directed to perform this ceremony; nevertheless, it is usual to employ an Agnihotri, who lives on alms and receives fees and presents." Agnihotri is a title of Brahmans in Behar, and one of the sections of the Babhan caste is called Agnihotra.

Agora, a synonym for Asura, a small caste of wild people in Behar and Upper India, who are probably closely related to the Agarwals. Mr. Nesfield thinks that the two groups must originally have been "sections of one and the same caste, which quarrelled on some trifling question connected with cooking or eating and have remained separate ever since." Agraharis marry their daughters as infants, forbid widows to marry again, and do not recognise divorce. Unlike the Agarwals, they allow polygamy; and on this account, says Mr. Sherring, they are believed to have lost the high position they formerly held. Should this opinion be correct, it may supply the explanation of the divergence of the Agraharis from the Agarwals, whom they closely resemble in physical type. It is curious to observe that the higher mercantile castes, such as Agarwals, Khatris, and Oswals, have a stronger repugnance to polygamy than Brahmans and Rajputs, both of whom incur no social reproach for their polygamous habits. In matters of food, Agraharis follow the regular practice of orthodox Hindus, and spirit-drinking is strictly forbidden. It deserves notice that their women are not secluded, as among the Agarwals, but take part in the business of their husbands by selling rice-flour, etc. In point of social standing the caste, though reckoned among the Vaisyas and wearing the sacred thread, ranks below the Agarwals, and their business is generally on a smaller scale. They are, in fact, tradesmen rather than bankers. The proper home of the caste is in Hindustan, and their numbers in the Lower Provinces of Bengal are comparatively small. The following table shows their distribution in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>323</td>
<td>363</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>186</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>Purniah</td>
<td>176</td>
<td>176</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>1,451</td>
<td>1,944</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maunderpur</td>
<td>1,090</td>
<td>572</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td></td>
<td>541</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sara</td>
<td>668</td>
<td>668</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>2,315</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td></td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>1,113</td>
<td>104</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Agrahari, a synonym for Agrahari.

Agraja, a synonym for Brahman.

Agruri, a cultivating and trading caste, very numerous in Western Bengal. They are popularly believed to be the modern representatives of the Ugra or Ugra Kahatriyas mentioned in Manu, x, 9: “From a Kahatriya by a Sudra girl is born a creature called an Ugra (cruel), which has a nature partaking both of Kahatriya and of Sudra, and finds its pleasure in savage conduct.” In verse 49 of the same chapter their occupation is said to be “catching and killing animals that live in holes.” At the present day the Agruis are divided into seven sub-castes, viz. (1) Bardwaniya, (2) Kasipuriya, (3) Bagha, (4) Satchaki or Satsaikiya, (5) Chagnaya or Changa, (6) Jana, (7) Suta. Each of these is subdivided into Kulins and Mauliks, the former being distinguished by the titles Kesh, Pai, Shyam, and Pal. A Kulin is not positively forbidden to marry a Maulik, but to do so brings a certain amount of discredit on the Kulin bridegroom, and a series of such marriages would reduce the entire family to the rank of Maulik. Intermarriage between members of different sub-castes is prohibited, and the Jana and Suta sub-castes, both of whom profess to be descended from a mythical ancestor named Dakshin Rai, taunt one another with being bastards. The entire caste claims to be twice-born (dwija), but the sacred thread is worn only by members of the Jana sub-caste, who assume it on marriage. Those, however, who work as cultivators and drive the plough with their own hands usually discard the thread. Each sub-caste contains a number of sections, bearing names—Kasyap, Sandilya and Bharadvaja and others—which appear to show that they have been borrowed from the Brahmans. Marriage is forbidden within the section, and the supplementary rules defining the prohibited degrees are substantially the same as among Brahmans and Kayasthas. Agruis marry their daughters as infants, forbid widows to marry again, and do not recognise divorce. A woman of proved unchastity is turned out of the caste, and usually takes refuge... among the Bairági Vaishnavas or some similar religious sect. Polygamy is permitted, but is not practised on a large scale, and it is rare to find men with more than two wives.

In their religious and ceremonial observances Agiris differ little from the higher castes of Hindus in Bengal. They belong for the most part to the Vaishnava and Sákta sects, and there are comparatively few Saivas among them.
Their religious ceremonies are performed by Brahmans, who incur no degradation by serving them. It deserves notice that the first śrāddh is performed by them on the thirtieth day after death, and not, as is the case with Brahmans, on the eleventh day.

The social position of the Agiris differs in different parts of Bengal. The scattered members of the caste found in Eastern Bengal are classed with the hunting and fishing castes—a fact which suggests that there may be an element of historical truth in the functions assigned to them by Manu. In Bardwan and Western Bengal, where Agiris are numerous, they take rank with the Nava-Sákha, and Brahmans will take water and certain kinds of sweetmeats from their hands. Many of them hold estates and tenures of various grades, and the bulk of the caste are fairly prosperous cultivators. If popular rumour may be trusted, they still, as in the days of Manu, “find pleasure in savage conduct,” for they are said to be extraordinarily short-tempered and irascible, and the criminal records of the districts where they are most numerous seem to show that, in proportion to the numbers of the caste, an unusual number of crimes of violence were laid to their charge.

The following table shows the distribution of Agiris in Bengal in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>59,887</td>
<td>51,292</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>9,353</td>
<td>13,126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>2,985</td>
<td>2,517</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>1,085</td>
<td>1,663</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>1,141</td>
<td>2,902</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>1,486</td>
<td>177</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>115</td>
<td>164</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>118</td>
<td>167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>37</td>
<td>154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajahyno</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>84</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bangpur</td>
<td>33</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>21</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>139</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>91</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>51</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Agwá, a village servant, who acts as a guide to travellers.

Ah, a sub-sept of the Kisku sept of Santáls.

Atha, a sub-caste of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Ahdadar, Ahadar, an officer; a functionary, whether military or civil; a title given by the former Rájáš of Rámgarh to some of their servants without distinction of caste, whose duty it was to superintend the expenditure of the household. The title is now borne by one Dambar Ahadar, of Ichak, who is a Bania of the Nichondia sub-caste.

Aheriá, a sportsman, a fowler.

Ahlásariá, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Ahir, Ahiri, Abhir, Abhiri, the cowherd caste of Behar and Upper India. The name also is sometimes used to denote a sub-caste of Goálá. See Goálá.

Ahir, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Ahir-Páiék, a sept of Rájputs in Behar.

Ahitágni, a Brahman householder who maintains a perpetual family-fire, hence a title of Brahmans.

Ahríti, hunters, a sept of the Málé or Mál Paháriá tribe in the Santál Parganas.

Ahttarai, a sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Aialong, a sept of Tipperahs in the Chitragong Hill Tracts.

Aich, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Káyasthas.

Aichá, a group of Bárendra Sunris in Eastern Bengal.

Aichittra, a so-called gotra in which all members of the Ráma-vat sect of religious ascetics are enrolled when initiated. As the Ráma-vat sect professes celibacy, and the gotra includes the entire sect, it differs from the gotras of most Hindu castes in having no bearing upon marriage.

Aidhar, an agricultural day-labourer in Western Bengal, usually paid in kind.

Ailwár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Ainak-sáz, an optician. The ordinary ainak-sáz merely frames glasses, which he procures from bisátils; but in most large cities manufacturers of lenses are found.

Ainá-sáz, a looking-glass maker.

Aind, the eel, a totemistic section or sept of Rautiás, Asuras, Goálá, Santálés, Mundas, Pánés, and Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Aindwár, eel, a totemistic sept of Korwas.

Aindwár, a section of Goráits; of Goálá in Behar.

Ainiá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Air, a section of Ghásis.

Airan, a gotra or section of Agárwás.

Aithána, a sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.

Aiyár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Ajá-ásram, a sub-caste of Mayárás in Central Bengal.

Ajagyač Brahman, a Brahman who does not offer sacrifices or receive presents; a synonym for Bábhan, having reference to the tradition that the Bábhans are merely landholding Brahmans.

Ajaidápáli, a section of the Karan Káyasths in Behar.
AJAITÍA.

Ajaitiá, a kul or section of the Bábhan caste in Behar.

Aján, a mul or section of the Kanaují sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Ajner, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Ajodhyábási, a sub-caste of Kewats, Kumbárs, and Sonárs in Behar.

Ajodháapuri, a sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Ajáni, a section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Akásariá, a section of the Bábhan caste in Behar.

Akásmukhi, a class of ascetics of the Saiva sect, who keep their faces always turned to the sky until the muscles of the neck become rigid and the head is fixed in that position.

Akhanbári, a mul or section of the Tinmulí-Madhesiá, Chhamuliá-Madhesiá, and Bhootpúriá sub-castes of Halwás in Behar.

Akhará, a samáj or local group of the Sándilya gotra of Bázhí Brahmans in Bengal.

Aladí, a samáj or local group of the Basishtha gotra of Paschatya Baidik Brahmans in Bengal.

Aladási, a section of Tántis in Bengal and of Kaibarttas in Mursheddabad.

Alálé, a title of Babhans in Behar.

Akrur-Paramánanda, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in Mursheddabad.

Alakjérídérhué, a mul or section of the Kishnaut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Alamalaka, Almalak, an exogamous section of Baidyas in Bengal.

Alam-rishi, a section of Kámárs in Singbhum and the Santál Parganás; a section of Sutradhars in Bengal.

Alamyán, an eponymous section of Brahmans, Gaudhabaniks, Pods, Bángdis, Kámárs, Káyasthas, Kumbárs, Madhunápitas, Mális, Mayarás, Nápites, and Tántis in Bengal; a section of the Paschim Kuliýa Sadgops; of Sukis in Midnapur; of Sutradhars and Kaibarttas in Murshedabad and Sunris in Maldah.

Alarishi, a section of Jugis in Bengal.

Alchará, a section of the Baranwár sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Alekhiá, a sect of Saiva ascetics having their head-quarters near Gîrînár and Poona, in Western India, whence they visit the chief places of pilgrimage. They collect alms for the purpose of feeding other ascetics, and proclaim their mission by repeating the word alakh (‘awake?’), from which their name is derived. Alekhiás profess profound respect for their alms-bag (jhulî), and are divided into three classes, the members of which dedicate the jhulî to Ganesa, Bhairab, and Káli respectively. Ganesa-Alekhiás beg in the morning, Bhairab-Alekhiás in the afternoon and evening, and Káli-Alekhiás only at midnight. Members of the first class beg from house to house, and may even stay for some time in a house where they are hospitably received; ascetics of the other two classes may not enter a door, and merely walk along the road shouting ‘alakh’ to attract the attention of the pious.

This appears to be the sect referred to by Wilson, s.v. A|akh-námi, from Sanskrit alakshya, ‘undefinable,’ ‘invisible.’

Alemba, hailstones, a totemistic sept of Juángs in Orissa.

Alekpháni, a pathi or hyper-gamous sub-group of the Bárendra sub-caste of Brahmins in Bengal.

Allákhání, a pathi or hyper-gamous sub-group of Bárendra Brahmins in Bengal.

Allíman, Alímán, a section of Báruis, Baurí, Chásádhopás, Báítís, Bhunmalís, Kahárs, of Bárendra Sunris and of Subar-nábaniks and Telis in Bengal, a gotra or section of Káyastes, Nápitas, of Málós in Eastern Bengal, and the group of castes (Náva-Sákhá) from whose hands a Bengal Brahman can take water.

Allimán, a section of Sudras in Eastern Bengal.

Allay, Allíá, Aleh, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Almál, a section of the Bán-gál sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar; of Kaibarttas in Central Bengal.

Almasi or Alamyán, a section of Goálás in Bengal.

Almas-Tarash, a diamond-cutter. The term is also incorrectly applied to the beyri, naginá-sás and others, all of whom perform different operations and are really distinct artisans.

A’imisi, a section of Kaibarttas in Murshedabad.

Alru, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Alu, a section of Korás in Chota Nagpur.

Aluná, a title of ascetics of the Saiva sect, who abstain from taking salt with their food.

Alyarnán, an eponymous section of Pátnis and Sánkháris.

Am, Amba, mango, a totemistic sept of Goálás, Nageswars, Korwas, and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.
Amal-dár, a manager, an agent.

Amam, a section of the Kamár sub-caste of Dosádhs in Behar.

Aman, a class of Nepalese liquor-sellers found only in the Supul subdivision of Bhágalpur.

Amal-dér, a manager, an agent.

Amam, a section of the Kamár sub-caste of Dosádhs in Behar.

Aman, a class of Nepalese liquor-sellers found only in the Supul subdivision of Bhágalpur.

Amar, a class of Nepalese cultivators found only in the Supul subdivision of Bhágalpur.

Amarábádi, a sub-caste of Bhuinmális found in Noakháli.

Amarnáth, an up-country religious sect who live on alms.

Amashta, a sub-caste of Káy-asths in Behar.

Amarébédi, a sub-caste of Bhuinmélis found in Noakhéli.

Amarnéth, an up-country religious sect who live on alms.

Amashta, a sub-caste of Káy-asths in Behar.

Amar, a class of Nepalese cultivators found only in the Supul subdivision of Bhágalpur.

Amárt, Amáth, a cultivating caste of Behar, many of whom are employed as personal servants by the higher classes of Hindus. This circumstance has led to the formation of two sub-castes (pangats): Gharbáit or “householder” and Bahiot or “bearer,” the members of which do not intermarry. Gharbáit Amáts, who also style themselves Ránt, live solely by cultivation, and cannot take service except at the risk of exclusion from their pangat; Bahiot Amáts, who bear the significant titles of Kháwás, “servant,” Ghíbíhar, “ghi-eater,” and Saghá, or “vegetable-eater,” regard service as their characteristic occupation, but many of them work as cultivators without, however, thereby qualifying themselves for membership in the more respectable sub-caste of Gharbáit. Within the Bahiot class, men who serve Rájas are held in special esteem, and an extra bride-price is paid for their daughters. That the Gharbáit sub-caste is the more ancient of the two, and represents the original nucleus of the entire caste, may be inferred from the fact that it is divided into exogamous sections (dihés), such as Larwár, Narhan, Pataiwar, Parábwar, and others; while the Bahiots have no such sections, and regulate their marriages by the less archaic system of prohibited degrees. Marriage between persons descended in a direct line from the same parents is of course forbidden; and in addition to this the descendants of the paternal and maternal uncles and aunts, and of the maternal grandmother, are barred ordinarily for seven generations, and even beyond that, so long as they reside in the same place and the practice of aoosh or mutual ceremonial impurity on the occurrence of death is kept up. These rules are also observed by Gharbáit Amáts, so far as they are not included in the rule of exogamy, which with them, as with many other castes, is one-sided in its operation, the name of the section following the male line. There is no definite rule to prevent a man from marrying two sisters, both living, but no instance of this is known to have occurred. A man may marry the younger sister of his deceased wife, but not her elder sister. It is unusual for Amáts to marry outside the district in which they reside; and with them, as with other Behar castes, the fact of a family having emigrated to Bengal puts a certain slur upon its members, and renders it difficult for them to procure wives from their original home.

Amáts practise both infant and adult-marriage according to their means, infant-marriage being deemed the more respectable, and adult-marriages being confined to those whose parents cannot afford to get them married earlier in life. Widows are allowed to marry again. It is considered right, if possible, for the widow to marry her late husband’s younger brother or younger cousin; and, in the case of Gharbâta, for her to marry within the dîh or section to which her husband belonged; but there is no positive rule against her marrying an outsider, and she incurs no social penalty by doing so. Under no circumstances can she marry her husband’s elder brother. The ritual in use at the marriage of a widow is far less elaborate than that of a spinster. Brahmans are not employed; only the simplest mantras are recited; a small present of cloth, sweetmeats, and cash is given to the woman; and the bridegroom completes the ceremony by smearing vermilion (sindur) on her forehead with his left hand.

Polygamy is permitted, but the conditions are not strictly defined, and, so far as rules go, there is nothing to prevent a man from marrying as many wives as he can maintain. Custom, however, and the normal standard of living among the caste, combine in practice to limit the number of wives to two, and it is unusual for a man to take a second wife unless the first is barren. In cases of proved infidelity a man may put away his wife with the sanction of the panchâyat or council of elders, and may marry again. There seems, however, to be no regular ceremony appointed for the purpose of divorce, and resort to it is far less frequent than among the lower castes. Many Amâts, indeed, deny that they allow divorce in any form, and the caste, as a whole, sets a high value on female chastity.

The religious observances of Amâts do not differ materially from those in vogue among orthodox Hindus of about the same social standing. Most of them belong to the Sakta sect, and worship Kali with the usual sacrifice of a he-goat. Maithil Brahmans are employed as priests, and incur no special degradation by serving in this capacity. Among the dî minores so numerous in Behar, the Amâts worship the five goddesses (panch devâti), a form of Bhavâni, with offerings of betel, areca-nut, areca rice boiled in milk with sugar, cakes boiled in ghi, plantains, etc.; Goraiyâ is propitiated with a pig; Sokhâ with piâhá, “a kind of boiled pudding made of sattu or meal;” and Bandî with unleavened bread and sweetmeats. No special days are set apart for this worship. It is conducted by the members of the household without the intervention of Brahmans, and the worshippers eat the offerings with the exception of the pig sacrificed to Goraiyâ, which is carefully buried. Bahiot Amâts have also a special ancestral deity of their own, called Pheku Ram, to whom kids, goats, sweetmeats, and betel-nut are offered, and afterwards distributed among the members of the sub-caste who happen to be present.

The dead are burned in the ordinary Hindu fashion, the ashes being thrown into the Ganges or into any sacred river that may happen to be handy. In the case of persons who die at a distance from a river, this duty is usually neglected, and the ashes are collected under a small platform (chabutra), upon which a tulsi-tree is planted. Infants under eight months are buried. Sṛiddh is performed according to the standard ritual on the fourteenth day after death. Ancestors are propitiated in the first half of Asin (September-October) by offerings of water poured from the palms of the hands.

The social standing of Amáts is much the same as that of Kurmis, Koiris, and Gosáls, and they belong to the group of castes from whom a Brahman can take water. This indeed is a matter of necessity for a caste largely employed in personal service. They will eat sweetmeats with, and take water from, members of the acharani group of castes and of the higher castes. Cooked food they will eat only with men of their own caste, and some Amáts are so particular that they will eat only with members of their own sub-caste. Formerly they would smoke with members of the acharani group, but of late years they have become more strict, and the question is governed by the rule applicable in the matter of cooked food. They indulge in all kinds of clean animal food, such as goats, both male and female, deer, hares, pigeons, wild fowl, and fish, with the exception of some scaleless varieties, which are supposed to bear a resemblance to snakes; but some of them abstain wholly from meat and fish, and are held in special respect for this abstinence. Spirituous liquors are not forbidden. Some Amáts say that they have no objection to eating the leavings of Brahmans, while others resent the suggestion. The point is an obscure one, on which accurate information is not readily to be had; but it seems likely that Bahiot Amáts, serving high-class Brahmans, would in practice eat what was left of their master's food, while Gharbait Amáts would of course not be exposed to this temptation, and would therefore deny the possibility of such a thing taking place. In Purnesh cultivating Amáts take credit to themselves for not ploughing with cows—a practice common in some parts of that district. Their status as agriculturists appears to vary somewhat in different districts, but the bulk of the caste appear to be fairly prosperous rayats, usually possessed of occupancy rights; some have sunk to the position of landless day-labourers, receiving wages in kind, while a very few have risen to be tenure-holders and proprietors of small estates.

The following table shows the distribution of Amáts in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>81</td>
<td></td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>6,372</td>
<td>6,438</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tribut-</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>7,153</td>
<td>7,028</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>81,014</td>
<td>2,937</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mozaffarpur</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>2,150</td>
<td>Balesore</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>371</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>140</td>
<td>516</td>
<td>Tributary 84</td>
<td>1,548</td>
<td>1,505</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>941</td>
<td>124</td>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td></td>
<td>27</td>
<td>Rajahhye</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Amátia, a mui or sept of the Suryabanshi sub-tribe of Rájputs in Behar.

Amáut, a title of Khandáits in Chota Nagpur.

Arnáyat, a title of Sudhás in Orissa.

Ambahlá, a section of the Karan sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.
Ambaria, a section of B̀bhans in Behar.

Ambastha, a synonym for Baidya in Bengal. In Manu (x. 13, 47) the Ambasthas are described as the offspring of a Brahman by a Vaisya girl, and are said to follow the practice of medicine.

Ambas, a fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ambuli, a gain of the Kásyapa gotra of Rárbi Brahmans in Bengal.

Amethi, a sub-caste of Rásotgis in Behar.

Amghát, a section of Bhójpuría Halwás in Behar.

Amri, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá-Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwás and of the Byáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwás in Behar.

Aminápur, a section of Báis Sonárs in Behar.

Amol, a section of the Kaḿár sub-caste of Dosádhs in Behar.

Ampur, a mul or section of the Kanaujia sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Amraut, a section of Awadhiá Hajáms in Behar.

Amri, a totemistic sept of Oraons, who are prohibited from drinking rice gruel.

Amrot, a section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Koirís in Behar.

Amu, a sept of Chakháis in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Anárikakesha, a section of Brahmans.
Angariá, a sub-caste of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur; charcoalburners, a sub-sept of the Tudu sept of Santáls and a sept of Hos.

Angbohang, king of the fir wood, a sept of the Athharai sub-tribe of Limbus.

Angbu, the forest-dweller, a sub-sept of the Thekim sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Angdenba, lord of the forest, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Angira, a gotra or section of the Baidya caste in Bengal.

Angirasa, a gotra or section of Brahmanas professing to be descended from the Vedic Rishi or sage Angira; a Brahmanical section of Khatriis.

Angláh, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Angrok or Angwár, a sub-caste of Rajwérs.

Angwár, a section of Turi or Dakhiná Doms in Behar, who perform their domestic worship inside the angan or court-yard of their houses.

Ankur, a title of Dakshin-Bárhi and Bangaja Káyasths.

Ánkuri, a section of the Sátmuliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Ánkuriá, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal who are basket-makers.

Ánlábáng, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Ánná, a section of the Bangál sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Annásani, a gán of the Sábarna gotra of the Uttar-Bárendra Brahmanas in Bengal.

Anokánwár, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá-Madhesia sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Anraiwár-Anrai, a mul of the Bátéa section of Maithil Brahm-
ans in Behar.

Anraiwár-Usrauli, a mul of the Bátéa section of Maithil Brahm-
ans in Behar.

Anraiwár-Jhauá, a mul of the Bátéa section of Maithil Brahm-
ans in Behar.

Anraiwár-Baingni, a mul of the Bátéa section of Maithil Brahm-
ans in Behar.

Anril, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Anrráhi, a mul or section of the Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ánruá, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá-Madhesia sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Antahriá, a section of Bhátsa.

Antáiya, a mul or section of Sonárs in Behar.

Antarvedi or Kanaújiá, one of the three main divisions of Kanaújiá Brahmanas found in Behar. They are said to have come from the country between the Ganges and Jamna.

Anulomaj (from anu, ‘according to,’ loma, ‘the hair of the body,’ and ja, ‘born,’—born with the hair or grain, i.e., in due order), the offspring of two persons of different classes, of whom the father is of the superior caste in social standing, as of a Brahman father and Khatriya mother. If the woman be of the Brahman and the man of the Kshatriya caste, the order is inverted, and the progeny is termed Pratilomaj, born against the hair.

Aoghar, a sect of Saiva ascetics founded in Guzerat by a Dasnémi mendicant, named Brahmagiri, through the favour of Gorakhnath, a religious reformer, who flourished early in the fifteenth century, and is now recognised in the Himalayan districts as an incarnation of Siva and the special protector of the Gorkhélis. They have not the custom of making proselytes. On the death of a chief of the math, one of the mendicants is promoted to his place with certain ceremonies. It is said that Gorakhnath invested Brahmagiri with his ear-ring and certain other symbols, which the latter afterwards distributed among five mendicants, each of whom formed a separate group of the sect—Gudar, Sukhar, Bukhar, Bhukhar, and Kukar. Members of the first three groups dress themselves in a long yellow overcoat. The Gudar wear a ring in one ear, and in the other a flat copper plate with the footprint of Aoghar or Gorakhnath. The Sukhar and Bukhar wear rings of copper or pewter on both the ears. These ornaments are said to be a sort of masonic signs, by means of which the members of each group may recognise each other. Asceotics belonging to the Bhukhar and Kukar divisions are rarely met with in Bengal. The main distinction between them and the first three groups lies in that they do not burn incense in their alms-pot, while the others do. The Kukar group collect alms with a new earthen-pot, called kāṭ händi, in which they also cook their food. Mention is made of a sixth group, called Ukhar, concerning whom no precise information is available. Some say, indeed, that the name is merely a title of those members of the first three groups who are given to indulgence in flesh and strong drink.

Apa, a title of Bangaja Kāya-astha.

Aphariá, a section of the Ahir or Goél caste in the North-Western Provinces.

Ar, a sept of the Chandrabansi division of Rājputs in Behar.

 Ard-farosh, a flour-vendor.

Arách, a section of Bábbhans in Behar.

Aráishwálá, a trader who makes and sells takhts, tásids, toys, artificial flowers, fruits, and festal decorations, such as paper or tālo lanterns, and horses and other figures of paper pulp.

Anwár, a section of Bábbhans in Behar.

Anyapurba, a woman who has been previously married.

Aráit, a kul or section of Bábbhans in Behar.

Aráiyá, Areá, Arre, a sub-caste of Telis in Behar, who claim to intermarry with the Maghaya sub-caste. The latter, however, do not admit the claim.

Aráipuría, a section of Maghayá Dhobis in Behar.

Arak-kash, a distiller of extracts and essences of flowers, etc., which are used as beverages and as medicinal draughts.

Aráp, a section of the Sát-muliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Arápe, a title of Bábhans in Behar.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Arísh, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aráth, a gáin or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Archnáni, a thar of the Atrái gotra of Nepáli Brahmans.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ardhá lakhiá, a section of the Banodhiá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Archauti, a sub-caste of Kumhárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ardi (fish), a totemistic section of Bágdis in Bengal.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arcá, a sub-caste of Gareris in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Area, fish, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arewár, a kúl or section of Bábhans in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Argariá, a section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arghaunle, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arhá, a title of Khandéits in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arhái-ghar, a hypergamous group of the Chájráti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arhatiyá, a broker or middleman, especially one who has a shop, sometimes with considerable storage accommodation, in a gany or emporium for the sale of grain. Hence, more generally, a business agent or correspondent.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ari, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in Western Bengal.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arí, a title of Kámárs and a section of Káyasts in Bengal.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aríár, a sub-caste of Bais Baniyás in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aríyár, a sub-caste of Sunris in Mánbhum.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arjel, a thar of the Atrái gotra of Nepáli Brahmans.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arkasiya, a Sawyer, a title usually applied to the Magháyá sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arkáti, (i) a pilot; (ii) an unlicensed purveyor of labourers for the tea districts, who collects emigrants in small batches within their native districts and makes them over for the purpose of transport to recruiters licensed under the Inland Emigration Act or formally authorised by their employers to collect free emigrants.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arna, a sect of Dasmáni San-nýásis.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arnab, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Káyasths.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arnowait, a section of Bábhans in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arrái or Arákash, ari, a saw, a title of Chandáls or Namásudras who are sawyers.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arriáir, a sub-caste of Tha-therá or brass-chaser in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Artthi, Artthiá, a broker, an agent, a salesman, a commercial correspondent, one who conducts business on commission for a principal at a distance; a banker who grants and accepts bills on other bankers or correspondents.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Aru, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Aru, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Aruyá, a sept of the Tung-jainya sub-tribe of Chakmas in the Chittagong Hill Tracts.

Aryajáti, “Aryan caste,” a pedantic designation adopted by nine persons, probably Brahman Pandits, in the 24-Parganas in the census of 1881.

As, Ash, a title of Dakshin-Ráhi Káyasaths and of Bárui and Mayarás in Bengal.

Asan, Asin-Tánti, Aswini-Tánti, the highest sub-caste of weavers in Bengal, who claim to be the original stock from which the other sub-castes have diverged. Asin-Tánti women do not wear nose-rings, and this peculiarity is regarded as the chief distinction of the sub-caste. See Tánti.

Asarhi, a mul or section of the Kanaují sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Asármáltá, Asarmaurá, a mul or section of the Chhamuli-Madhesia sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Asesmeghrám, a section of Kanaují Lohárs in Behar.

Ashá, a month—June, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ashtagrámi or Kataki, a sub-caste of Támbulis in Bengal.

Ashtalai, a sub-caste of Ká-márs in the Santál Parganas.

Asiswár, a section of the Kamár sub-caste of Dosádhas in Behar.

Asmait, a section of the Mag-hayá sub-caste of Kumhárs in Behar.

Asotoar, a sept of Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Asraur, a sect of Dasnámi Sannyásins, properly belonging to the Panjáb, but sometimes found in Bengal.

Asraráf, Asráph, noblemen, persons of rank. In Behar the designation is assumed by the more respectable classes of both Mahomedans and Hindus, and in particular by high-caste cultivators, who receive in virtue of their social status a remission of rent, variously known as máfí, chhuti, kamsare, rédet, marawati, kami, and inám. The word is the plural of Ar. shärif, ‘noble,’ but, like many similar forms, is used in the Indian vernaculars as a singular.

Asrukoti, a góin of the Kásyapa gotra of Bándra Brahmans in Bengal.

Assam-Mech, a sub-tribe of Meches in Assam.

Assampá, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhoris, the members of which are of a mixed, low origin.

Asur-Agariá, a sub-tribe of Agariás in Chota Nagpur.

Asur-Brijíá, a sub-tribe of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.
ASURA, Agoriá, Lohrá, a small non-Aryan tribe of Lohardagá and the eastern portion of Sargujá, who live almost entirely by iron smelting. Colonel Dalton seems inclined to connect them with the Asuras, who, according to Munda tradition, were destroyed by Singbonga; and, judging from the present position of the tribe, it is likely enough that the Asuras may be the remnant of a race of earlier settlers who were driven out by the Mundas. Herr Jellinghaus, however, suggests that the Asúra legend may refer to the more civilised mining and temple-building people of whom traces are found throughout Chota Nagpur. The legend is discussed at length in the article Munda.

The Asuras have thirteen totemistic sections, which are shown in Appendix I. Two of these—Basiirá (the bamboo) and Mukruár (the spider)—occur also among the Kurmia. A man may not marry a woman belonging to the same section as himself, nor may he eat, cut, or injure the plant or animal whose name his section bears. Marriage is usually adult, though a tendency towards the adoption of infant-marriage is traceable. Polygamy is permitted, and great license of divorce prevails. The women of the tribe indeed are notorious for their lax morality, and many of them earn their living as Khebrí or dancing-girls in the towns and larger villages of Chota Nagpur.

Little is known about the religion of the Asúras. According to Dalton, they worship Singbonga, the supreme deity of most Kolarian tribes, but know nothing of Marang Buru, though they worship the great hills near them under other names. The name Agoriá or Angoriá appears in Hazaráibágh as the appellation of a sub-caste of the non-Aryan Lohars, whose special function is the smelting of iron ore, from which rough pig-iron is manufactured by members of the Lohondia sub-caste.

The following table gives the number and distribution of Asuras in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
<th>DISTRICT.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Santál Parganás ... ...</td>
<td>335</td>
<td></td>
<td>Sinebhóum ... ...</td>
<td>66</td>
<td>253</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaráibágh ... ...</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>Tributary States ... ...</td>
<td>1,278</td>
<td>1,204</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardagá ... ...</td>
<td>178</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States ... ...</td>
<td>1,278</td>
<td>1,204</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Asur Lohara, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Aswariá, a section of Báhns and Sonárs in Behar.

Aswini, see Asan.

Atá-farosh, a seller of átá or wheat flour.

Atáía, a sept of Bájputs in Behar.

Atáí Baidya, a doctor who defrauds the ignorant; a title of Baidyas used by outsiders.

¹ Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, iv, 237.
Atari, a section of the Karan sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.

Atashbaz, a maker of fireworks.

Atgharíá, a group of Phulkétá Mális in Bengal.

Athárchurá, a group of the Bárendra Sunris in Tipperah.

Atháráth Panth, a sub-tribe of Mangars in Darjiling.

Atharb, an eponymous section of Bábhans.

Atharva, a low group of Brahmans in Behar.

Athísá, a sub-caste of Dhobás in Central Bengal.

Atit, Atith, from Sansk. atit, one who has passed away from worldly interests, or from atithi, a guest, a temporary dweller upon earth, a title of religious mendicants, practically synonymous with Sannyásí, q.v. The term is applied to both Vaishnavas and Saivas, and does not appear to be capable of very precise definition. As used in Behar, it includes two classes of persons—Sannyásí Atits, who adopt a purely ascetic and celibate life, and transmit their property to their pupils (chédás) by a sort of spiritual succession, and Gharbári Atits, whose manner of life is that of ordinary householders. The latter group, indeed, whatever may have been its original mode of formation, whether by descent from Sannyásí Atits, who broke their vows and married, or otherwise, does not now differ materially from any ordinary occupational caste. The term is also colloquially applied to a person going on a journey who puts up on the way either at a shop or house of some resident, whose guest he becomes. Sannyásí Atits are divided into four classes bearing different titles:—(1) Bháráti, from Bhárat or Hardrwá, (2) Girlu, (3) Puri, and (4) Arun. They are distinguished by wearing a headgear of an ochre colour dyed in gér (red ochre), and a necklace of rudrákshá, called kanthí. They abstain from animal food and wine, and wander about from one chédá or disciple to another, teaching mantras. The Gharbári Atits do not admit outsiders into their groups, follow the Hindu law of inheritance, and perform the sráddh. They are sometimes cultivators, holding from zemindars rent-free jágirs, many of which were not improbably granted to their ancestors on the ground of their being Sannyásis.
Atpára, a sub-caste of Kotáls in Western Bengal.

Atrab, a territorial section of Bábhans in Behar.

Atrái, Atri, a gotra or section of Nepálí Brahmans.

Atréya, a gotra or section of Brahmans; of the Srotriya sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans; of Baidyas and Káyasths in Bengal; and of Karans in Orissa.

Attár, a maker of perfumes and essences.

Attri-rishi, a section of Tánťás in Bengal.

Attul-rishi, a section of Chásá-dhobás in Bengal.

Atturá, a section of Doms in Western Bengal, who officiate as the priests of the caste.

Attur-Sannyási, a sect of religious mendicants, joined by persons who suppose themselves to be at the point of death. It is said to have been popularised by Tulsi Das, a Dakshinatya Brahman, who accepted the mantra of the sect when he was seriously ill, and afterwards recovering became a conspicuous adherent of the Vedánta school of philosophy at Benares. Persons who enter the sect in extremis and afterwards get well must remain Sannyásis for the rest of their lives.

Aturthi, a gáin of the Bharadwája gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Auigh Baid, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Aujana, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Atunria, a mul or section of the Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Aura, fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Aushti, a title of Kanaújíá Brahmins in Behar.

Aut-Átsram, a sub-caste of Gandhabaniks in Bengal.

Awadhiá, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmins in Behar.

Awadhiá, Ayodhiá, or Ayodhiábasí, literally those who live in Ayodhyá or Oudh—members of different sub-castes, who trace their origin from Ayodhyá. Also a sub-caste of Nuniyás in Behar, who practise infant-marriage and observe a curious custom, called ásmáni śádhi, which requires that the bride and bridegroom shall be held off the ground during the marriage ceremony. A sub-caste of Beldars, Binds, Dhobis, Ha jáma, Kálwára, Kumhára, Kurmis and Sonárs in Behar. Sonárs of this sub-caste affect a high standard of orthodoxy, and do not permit widows to marry again. Ayodhiá Kurmis affect superiority over the other members of the caste, and do not permit widows to marry again.

Azghalla, a totemistic sept of Chamárs and Doms in Chota Nagpur.
Baba, rice, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bábdji, a synonym for Brahman and of members of religious sects affecting to practise asceticism.

Babangá, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Bábhan, Bhuinhr, Zamindár Brahman, Girhasth Brahman, Pachchimá Brahman, Magahayá Brahman, Ajagyak Brahman, Zamindár, Chaudhríji, a large and influential caste which counts among its members some of the chief landholders of Behar. Regarding the origin of the Bábhans, a variety of traditions are current. One story represents them as the descendants of the Brahman rulers whom Parasu Ram set up in the place of the Kshatriyas slain by him, and who in course of time abandoned their Brahmanical duties and took to the profession of landholding. Another tells how a certain king of Ayodhya, being childless, sought to remove his reproach by the sacrifice of a Brahman, and bought for this purpose the second son of the Rishi Jamadagni, the father of Parasu Ram. By the intervention of Viswámitra, the maternal uncle of the victim, the Rája was enabled to get a child without bloodshed; but the young Brahman was held to have been degraded by the sale, and was called upon to settle down on the land and become the forefather of the Bábhan caste. A third legend, perhaps the best known of all, traces the Bábhans back to a sacrifice offered by Jarásandha, King of Magadhá, at which a very large number of Brahmans, some say a lakh and a quarter, were required to be present. Jarásandha’s Dewán, a Káyasth of the Amásht or Karan sub-caste, did his best to meet the demand, but was driven to eke out the local supply by distributing sacred threads among members of the lower castes and palming them off on the king as genuine Brahmans. Jarásandha’s suspicions being roused by the odd appearance of some of the guests, the Dewan was compelled to guarantee their respectability by eating the food which they had cooked; while the Brahmans thus manufactured, failing to gain admission into their supposed caste, had to set up a caste of their own, the name of which (Bábhán or Báhman) is popularly supposed to mean a sham Brahman; “just as in some districts an inferior Rájput is called a Ráut, the corruption of the name betokening the corruption of the caste.”

The last theory is at once refuted by the appearance and demeanour of the caste. “They are,” says Mr. Beames, “a fine manly race, with the delicate Aryan type of feature in full perfection.”

Traditions of origin: what are Bábhans?

Not promoted Non-Aryana

Not promoted Non-Aryana

1 The legend referred to is that of Sunah Sephas, told in the Aitareya Brahmana and in a slightly different form in the Ramayana.
This type, I may add, is singularly uniform and persistent among the Bábhans, which would not be the case if they were descended from a crowd of low-caste men promoted by the exigencies of a particular occasion; for brevet rank thus acquired would in no case carry with it the right of intermarriage with pure Brahmans or Rajputs, and the artificially-formed group, being compelled to marry within its own limits, would necessarily perpetuate the low-caste type of features and complexion. As a matter of fact, this is what happens with the sham Rajputs whom we find in most of the outlying districts of Bengal. They marry among themselves, never among the true Rajputs, and their features reproduce those of the particular aboriginal tribe from which they may happen to have sprung.

If, then, the hypothesis of a low-caste origin breaks down, there remains the question—Are the Bábhans Brahmans who have somehow been degraded and dropped out of the ranks of their original caste? There seems to be no prima facie improbability in this theory. Within the Brahman caste itself we find plenty of instances of inferior sub-castes being formed owing to the adoption of practices deemed inconsistent with the dignity of a Brahman. The Agradáni, Aohárji, and Varna Brahmans are cases in point. There is no reason therefore in the nature of the caste system why the Bábhans should not be Brahmans who, having lost status for some reason now forgotten, broke off entirely from the parent caste instead of accepting the position of an inferior sub-caste. The suggestion that they were degraded by taking to agriculture must of course be put aside, for, as Mr. Beames has pointed out, “there are many thousands of Brahmans in the same part of the country who are engaged in agricultural pursuits, but without losing caste, such as Tiwáris, Upádhyas, Ojhas or Jhás, and others.”

An examination of the sections or exogamous groups into which the Bábhans are divided appears, however, to tell strongly against the hypothesis that they are degraded Brahmans. These groups are usually the oldest and most durable element in the internal organization of a caste or tribe, and may therefore be expected to offer the clearest indications as to its origin. Now we find among the Bábhans section-names of two distinct types,—the one territorial, referring either to some very early settlement of the section, or to the birthplace of its founder, and the other eponymous, the eponym being in most cases a Vedio rishi or inspired saint. The names of the former class correspond to or closely resemble those current among Rajputs; the names of the latter are those of the standard Brahmanical gotras. Lists of both are given in Appendix I, s.v. Bábhan. Where the matrimonial prohibitions based on these two classes of sections conflict, as must obviously often happen where every member of the caste necessarily belongs to both sets, the authority of the territorial class overrides that of the eponymous or Brahmanical class. Suppose, for instance, that a man of the Karáncch territorial section and of the Sándilya eponymous section wishes to marry a woman of the Sakarwár territorial section, the fact that she also belongs to the Sándilya eponymous section will not operate as a bar.
to the marriage. Whatever may be the theory of the purohits of the caste, the Brahmanical gotra is disregarded in practice, and doubtful cases are decided in accordance with the mutil or territorial section to which the parties belong. This circumstance seems to indicate that the territorial sections are the older of the two, and are probably the original sections of the caste; while the eponymous sections have been borrowed from the Brahmans in comparatively recent times. It would follow that the Babhans are an offshoot, not from the Brahmans, but from the Rajputs. If Babhans had originally been Brahmans, they would at the time of their separation from the parent caste have been already fitted up with a complete set of Brahmanical gotras, and it is difficult to imagine any reason which could have induced them to borrow a strange and much more elaborate set of sections from a tribe of inferior status, and to relegate their own sections to an entirely subordinate position. Territorial sections, moreover, do not lend themselves to the process of borrowing. They are as a rule exceedingly numerous; the meanings of their names are obscure and difficult to trace; and, with the exception of a few names borne by famous Rajput clans, they are wanting in the note of social distinction. The Brahmanical gotras, on the other hand, form a clearly-defined and not inconveniently-numerous group to which well-known and honourable traditions attach; they can be borrowed en masse without any particular trouble; and the influence of Brahman purohits is sufficient to diffuse them throughout any caste which affects a high standard of ceremonial purity and wishes to rise in the social scale. Numerous examples of the process of borrowing the Brahmanical eponymous gotras can be found among most of the lower castes at the present day: I know of no instance of a caste adopting sections of another type. To take a familiar illustration: it is as unlikely that a rising caste would borrow territorial sections when the Brahmanical gotras were to be had for the asking, as it is that an English manufacturer who has got on in the world and is about to change his name would select Billing, Wace, or one of the earlier English patronymics instead of some more high-sounding name which may have come in with the Conquest. Kasypa, Sandilya, and the other Brahmanical section names do for the rising castes of Bengal what Vavasour, Bracy, and Montresor are supposed to do for the wealthy parvenu in England.

It should be added here that alongside of the clearly territorial section names we find a few names of another type, such as Bāghauchhiā, Belauriā, Kasturār, which are said to have reference to the tiger, the bel tree (angle marmelos), and the kas grass, and Harāriā, Kodāriā, Bhusbarāt, Domkatar (foundling, spade-wielder, husk-picker, Dom's knife), which seem to be nicknames of the same kind as we meet among some of the Himalayan tribes. In the absence of evidence that the members of the first three sections regard with veneration the animal and plants whose names they bear, we are hardly justified in pronouncing the names to be survivals from the totemistic stage. Some suggestion of inferiority does, however, seem to attach to the last four sections, and this point is more fully discussed below. For the purpose of controlling connubial arrangements, both of these classes seem to possess the same value as the territorial section, so that the argument stated above is not affected.

The considerations set forth above appear to me to render it highly probable that the Bábhans are a branch of the Rajputs. It must, however, be admitted that evidence in favour of a Brahmanical origin is not wanting. Mr. Sherring lays stress on the fact that the Bhunhárs of Benares "call themselves Brahmans; have the gotras, titles, and family names of Brahmans, and practise for the most part the usages of Brahmans." In Behar, though the claim to be Brahmans is not invariably put forward, Brahmanical titles, such as Misr, Pánre, and Tewári, are used along with the Rajput titles of Singh, Rái, and Thákur. In Shahabad and in parts of the North-Western Provinces members of other castes accord to a Bábhan the salutation pranám ordinarily reserved for Brahmans; while the Bábhan responds with the benediction asirbod. Further south, however, this practice is unknown; and in Patna a Bábhan would give the first greeting to a Káyasth, thereby implicitly recognizing the superior status of that caste in the social system.

Like the Rajputs, the Bábhans exclude the section of both father and mother, or, in other words, forbid a man to marry a woman who belongs to the same section as he himself or his mother. The operation of this rule is further extended by the manner in which it is applied. Account is taken, not merely of the section to which the proposed bride herself belongs (i.e., her father’s section), but also of her mother’s section; so that the marriage will be barred if the bride’s mother belonged to the same section as the bridegroom’s mother, though of course neither bride nor bridegroom can be members of that section. In respect of prohibited degrees, they follow the rules current among the Káyastha and explained in the article on that caste.

Among the Bábhans of Behar, as among the Rajputs, no endogamous divisions exist, and they also intermarry on terms of equality with the Bábhans of the North-Western Provinces. Some sections, however, are reckoned inferior to the rest, notably the Haráriá, Kodária, and Bhusbarát mentioned above, regarding whom there is a saying in Behar—

"Haráriá, Kodária, Bhusbarát mare, to Tirhut ka páp hare."

In the north of Manbhum the Rámpai and Domkatár sections are in such low repute that members of the other sections will not give their daughters in marriage to Rámpai or Domkatár men, although they have no objection to taking wives from those sections themselves. Consequently in that part of the country Rámpai and Domkatár Bábhans can only get wives from each other, though their women can obtain husbands from all sections except their own. If the restrictions were carried a step further, and Bábhans belonging to other sections interdicted from taking Rámpai and Domkatár women to wife, those sections would be wholly cut off.
BABBAN.

from the jus convubii, and would in fact, if not in name, have hardened into a sub-caste. I have no evidence to show that this is at all likely to take place—the Manbhum practice indeed appears to be quite exceptional—but the point deserves notice as tending to throw light on the obscure problem of the formation of sub-castes.

All Bábhans who can afford to do so marry their daughters as infants, the bride's age being often no more than four or five years. The same rule holds good for boys, only they are married comparatively later in life, and a son unmarried at the age of puberty does not bring the same sort of reproach on the family as a daughter is supposed to do. Instances, however, are not wanting where for special reasons the daughters of wealthy families have been married after they were grown up, as was the case with the late Maharani of Tikari; and it seems to be clear that even the most orthodox members of the caste do not take the extreme sacerdotal view of the necessity of infant-marriage. Ordinarily a price is paid for a bridegroom, but the purchase of brides is by no means uncommon. A man may marry two sisters, and the number of wives he may have is subject to no limit except his ability to maintain them. Some say, however, that a second wife is only permissible if the first is barren, is convicted of unchastity, or suffers from an incurable disease. Whatever may be the rule on the subject, it is rare to find a man with more than two wives. Widows are not allowed to marry again. Divorce is unknown: a faithless wife is simply turned out of the caste and left to shift for herself by becoming a prostitute, turning Mahomedan, or joining some of the less reputable religious sects.

The marriage ceremony of the Bábhans does not appear to differ materially from the standard type of a Behar marriage, which has been very fully described by Mr. Grierson at page 362 of Behar Peasant Life. It should perhaps be noted that a Bábhan marhra or marriage shed had six posts, not four, and that the bride is held throughout the ceremony by a woman of the Kahár caste. I may further observe that whereas according to Hindu law the completion of the seventh step by the bride renders the marriage final and irrevocable, a number of Bábhans in Patna assured me with much particularity of statement that in their opinion sindurdán, or the smearing of vermilion on the parting of the bride's hair, formed the binding portion of the ceremony—not the circumambulation of the sacrificial fire (bhánvar or bedi ghumaeh), which in Behar takes the place of the Vedic saptapadi. My informants emphasised their statement by adding that if the bridegroom were to die after bhánvar and before sindurdán, the bride would not be deemed a widow, and would be permitted to marry another man. In the article on Kumhár below, I have endeavoured to trace the origin of sindurdán, and have ventured to put forward the theory that it has probably been borrowed from the marriage service of the non-Aryan races.

Bábhans burn their dead and perform the sriddh ceremony on the eleventh day after death in the fashion described by Mr. Grierson (Behar Peasant Life,...
Bairagi Bábhans are buried. In cases of extreme poverty the corpse is thrown into a river after the nearest relative has touched the mouth with a burning torch. At the śrāddh ceremony, as in all other acts of domestic worship for which the services of a purohit are required, Kanaujia Brahmans officiate without thereby incurring any degradation in comparison with the Brahmans who serve the higher castes. In some parts of Eastern Behar Maithil Brahmans are employed by the Bábhans. These rank below Kanaujia, and are looked down upon by the Srotiya Brahmans, not because they serve in Bábhans’ houses, but because their own origin is believed to be of doubtful purity.

The religion of the Bábhan, like that of the ordinary high-caste Hindu, conforms in its details to the ritual of whatever recognized sect he happens to belong to. Representatives of all sects are found amongst the castes in much the same proportion as in the population at large. Vaishnavism, however, is said to have been only recently introduced among them, and in North Behar most Bábhans are either Saivas or Saktas. No social consequences are involved by professing the tenets of any of the regular sects, and intermarriage between their members goes on freely within the limits of the caste. Besides the standard worship which a Bábhan performs in virtue of belonging to a particular sect, all householders offer he-goats and rams to Kāli on the 24th or 25th of Kuar (September–October), sweetmeats, sandal-paste, flowers to Sītalā on the 24th Chait (March–April), and sugared cakes to Hanumān on every Tuesday. On the 1st of Chait these three deities are propitiated with piyā (wheat-flour and molasses cooked in oil), bārā (cakes of urid fried in oil), and kachwani (round balls of rice-flour, sugar, and butter). These offerings are presented by the men of the family without the aid of a Brahman, and are afterwards divided among the members of the household. To the women is relegated the task of appeasing a lower order of gods—Bandi Mai, Sokha, and Goraiya—with molasses and pithā, a sort of boiled pudding made of sattu or meal.

Owing probably to the controversy about their origin, the social standing of the Bábhans is not altogether easy to determine precisely, and varies slightly in different parts of the area which they inhabit. In South-Eastern Behar they rank immediately below Káyasthas, but in Shahabad, Sáran, and the North-Western Provinces they appear to stand on much the same level as Rájputs. The fact that in Patna and Gya the Amashtha or Karan Káyasthas will eat kachchi food which has been cooked by a Bábhan, while the other sub-castes of Káyasthas will not, may perhaps be a survival from times when Bábhans occupied a higher position than they do at the present day. In Champáran, according to Mr. Beames, Bábhans are not permitted to drink and smoke with Brahmans, “and only under some restrictions with “Rájputs. Thus, a Rájput may eat rice with them only when it is “without condiments; he may not eat bread, and he may drink water “only from an earthen vessel, not from a brass lota. Similarly, when “he eats with them his food must be placed on a dish made of leaves, and not on the usual brass thak. The meaning of these apparently trifling distinctions is that the Rajput, on an emergency, may eat hastily prepared food with them, but nothing that implies "a long preparation or deliberate intention." Babhans themselves claim to observe a higher standard of ceremonial purity than Rajputs, in that they will not touch the handle (pari hath or lagna) of the plough, and that they use the full upanayan ritual when investing their children with the janeo or sacred thread. In the matter of food they profess to take cooked food only with Brahmans, and sweetmeats, curds, parched rice, etc. (pakki), from Rajputs and the group of castes from whose hands a Brahman can take water. As regards the latter class, they are careful to explain that, although they will take sweetmeats, &c., as guests in their houses, they will not sit down and eat with them. The Bábhán's own diet is the same as that of all orthodox Hindus, and, like theirs, depends in some respects on considerations of sect. Thus Saivas and Saktas eat flesh, while Vaishnavas are restricted to vegetable food. Spirituous liquors are strictly forbidden, and can only be indulged in secretly.

The characteristic occupation of the Babhan caste, as indeed is indicated by the title Bhuinhar, is that of settled agriculturists; but they will under no circumstances drive the plough with their own hands. Apart from this special prohibition, they do not appear to be unreasonably fastidious as to how they get their living, and will take service as soldiers, constables, durwans, nagdis or lathiáls, cut wood, work as coolies, and do anything that is not specifically unclean. Many of them trade in grain, but it is considered derogatory to deal in miscellaneous articles or to go in for general shop-keeping. Some Babhans hold great estates in Behar and the North-Western Provinces, among whom may be mentioned the Maharajas of Benares, of Bettiah in Champáran, Tikari in Gya, Sáran, and Tamakhi in Gorakhpur, the Raja of Sheohar, and the Rájkumár Babu of Madhoban in Champáran. They are found as tenure-holders of all grades, and occupancy and non-occupancy raiyats, while a very few have sunk to the position of landless day-labourers. According to their own account, although ranking as ashraf or high caste cultivators, they enjoy no special privileges in respect of rent, and are not particularly sought after as tenants, because, in common with Brahmans, Rajputs and Káyasthas, they cannot be called upon for forced labour (begári) or for specific services in addition to the money-rent. The fact seems to be that, as they will not plough themselves, and therefore must employ labourers (kamiyás) for this purpose, they cannot pay so high a rent as men who work with their own hands; while their bold and overbearing character, and their tendency to mass themselves in "strong and pugnacious brotherhoods," render them comparatively undesirable tenants in the eyes of an exacting landlord. It is said, indeed, that the title Bhuinhar, a term which Babhans never apply to themselves, has passed into a by-word for sharpness and cunning.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Bábhans as ascertained in the census of 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>33</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tirhut</td>
<td>818,897</td>
<td>127,454</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>14</td>
<td></td>
<td>Mosoherpur</td>
<td>109,086</td>
<td>53,331</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>97,884</td>
<td>33,351</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>4</td>
<td></td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>44,884</td>
<td>22,415</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajabahye</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>150,275</td>
<td>170,935</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranpur</td>
<td>4</td>
<td></td>
<td>Bhagilpur</td>
<td>25,794</td>
<td>49,334</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>110</td>
<td></td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>6,632</td>
<td>11,848</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>11</td>
<td></td>
<td>Santal Pargana</td>
<td>105</td>
<td>6,085</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koch Behar</td>
<td>15</td>
<td></td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td></td>
<td>96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>116,714</td>
<td>121,484</td>
<td>Hasaribagh</td>
<td>6,989</td>
<td>29,598</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gaya</td>
<td>140,134</td>
<td>152,567</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>5,789</td>
<td>11,084</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>72,038</td>
<td>76,689</td>
<td>Singhbhum</td>
<td></td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>12,580</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bábhaniáme-Karráín, a mul of the Bátsha section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bábaunchha, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Bábri, a synonym for Bharbhnunja.

Bábu, also called Bábu Paliyá, a group of the Paliyá sub-caste of Kochhs in Northern Bengal. A title of itájputs in Behar and Chota Nagpur, importing descent from one of the leading families of the locality, and not unfrequently carrying with it the right to hold land on favourable terms by the privileged tenure known as babuán. Colonel Yule gives the following note on the word in his Anglo-Indian Glossary:—"Properly a term of respect attached to a name, like Master or Mr., and formerly applied in some parts of Hindustan to certain persons of distinction. Its application as a term of respect is now almost or altogether confined to Lower Bengal (though C. P. Brown states that it is also used in Southern India for 'Sir, My Lord, Your Honour'). In Bengal and elsewhere, among Anglo-Indians, it is often used with a slight savour of disparagement, as characterising a superficially-cultivated, but too often effeminate, Bengali; and from the extensive employment of the class, to which the term was applied as a title, in the capacity of clerks in English offices, the word has come often to signify 'a native clerk who writes English.'"

Bábuán, a title of Cheros in Chota Nagpur, probably referring to the peculiar landed tenure noticed under Bábu.

Babunathia, a sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Bachá, calf, a sept of Goálás in Chota Nagpur.

Bachás, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Bachberait, a territorial section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Báchgotióa, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Báchgotria, a section of the Chaubhán sub-caste of Nuniás in Behar.
Bachh, a gotra or section of Nepali Brahmans.

Báchhil, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bachhraíán, a section of the Banodhiá and Jaiswár Kalwár.

Bachhwaliá, a section of Goalás in the North-Western Provinces.

Bádál, a sept of the Tung-jainya sub-tribe of Chakmás in the Chittagong Hill Tracts.

Bádámasti, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá-Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Bádármí, a sub-caste of Korás in Western Bengal.

Badd Kurkutiá, a sept of Bhumij in Manbhum.

Badgar, a section of Goalás in the North-Western Provinces.

Badhariyá, see Bathawa.

Badhik, a sept of Rajputs in Gorakhpur.

Badhiria, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Badhwadiá, a section of Goalás in the North-Western Provinces.

Badísámá, a section of the Karan sub-caste of Káyasthás in Behar.

Bádlá-gar, a wire drawer. The trade of wire-drawing, or Tar-kash, is followed by Hindus of all castes, and sometimes by Muhammadans, in a very primitive manner. Silver wire is heated and merely passed through apertures in a steel plate, according to the fineness wanted. In gilding silver, China gold leaf wrapped round the silver is put over a charcoal fire and slowly heated. When partially fused, it is withdrawn and burnished with 'Lahsan patthar,' perhaps soapstone, after which it is drawn into wire and sold to workers in embroidered muiin and brocade. The Bádágar also manufacture chumki, or spangles, and Gokhru-gota, or filigree ankle bells.

Badoniá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Badraka or Badrika, a guide, a guard, an escort.

Badramiá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

 Bádsháhi, a section of the Pallur sub-caste of Dosáda in Behar.

Báduriá, an eater of the flying fox (Vespertílis vampyrus), a title of Doms, Hárís, Malias, and other low castes in Behar.

Bádyakar, a musician, a sub-caste of Pátnis who play on drums on ceremonial and festive occasions. The term is also a title denoting the occupation of the following castes:—Báiti and Muchi, who use the dhák or big drum; Hári or Kaora, who use the dhol or small drum.

Báergoa, a mul or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goalás in Behar.

Bág, a sept of Parheyas in Chota Nagpur.

Bagáiya, a mul or section of Sonárs in Behar.

Bágál, a cowherd, occ.
Bágáli, Bágáni, a title of Ekádas Tolis—agriculturists and traders.

Bagálya, a thar or sept of Gurungs and of the Bharadwája gotra of Nepáli Brahmanas.

Bagánde, a sub-caste of Pods in Bengal.

Bágchhi, a gáin of the Sándil gotra of the Uttar-Bárendra Brahmanas in Bengal.

Bágchhi, a title of Bárendra Brahmanas in Bengal.

Bágdi, Bágtit, Mudí, a cultivating, fishing, and menial caste of Central and Western Bengal, who appear from their features and complexion to be of Dravidian descent, and closely akin to the tribes whom, for convenience of description, we may call aboriginal. A variety of more or less indelicate legends are current regarding the origin of the caste. One story tells how Parvati disguised herself as a fisherwoman and made advances to Siva with the object of testing his fidelity to herself. When the god had yielded to the temptation, Parvati revealed her identity, and Siva, out of pique at her triumph, ordained that the child to be born from her should be a Bágdi and live by fishing. Another account lays the scene of this adventure in Kochh Behar, where Siva is represented as living with a number of concubines of the Kochh tribe. Parvati was moved by jealousy to come in the disguise of a fisherwoman and destroy the standing crops of the Kochhis, and Siva could only induce her to depart by begetting on her a son and a daughter. These twins were afterwards married, and gave birth to Hamvir, King of Bishanpur in Bankura, from whose four daughters—Sántu, Netu, Mantu, and Kshetu—the four sub-castes Tentulia, Dulia, Kusmetiá, and Mátá are descended.

According to a third tradition, the first Bágdi was accidentally begotten by Ráma on a widow maid-servant in attendance on Sita, and, after undergoing some persecution at the hands of his reputed father, was recompensed by the promise that he and his descendants should be palanquin-bearers, and in that capacity should be trusted to carry females of the highest classes. From Orissá comes the still more grotesque tale how once upon a time the gods being assembled in council, a goddess suddenly gave birth to three sons, and feeling embarrassed by the situation, hid the first under a heap of tamarind (tentul) pods, the second in an iron pan, and the third under a hermit’s staff (danda). From these vicissitudes of their infancy the children got the names of Tentulia Bágdi, Lohár Mánjhi, and Dandachhatra Mánjhi. It will, of course, be understood that these traditions are quoted here, not for any light that they may throw upon the origin of the Bágdis, but as contributions to the modern science of folklore. Apart from any value they may possess as illustrations of the working of the myth-making faculty among primitive folk, I may point out that all of them must have grown up after the Bágdis had ceased to be a compact tribe. Such traditions could only have been invented by people who had already in some measure attended to Hinduism and felt the want of a mythical pedigree of the orthodox type. The last in particular furnishes an excellent example of a myth devised for the purpose of giving a respectable explanation of the totemistic name Tentuliá. A parallel case will be found among the Kumhars of Orissa.

In the district of Bankura, where the original structure of the caste seems to have been singularly well preserved, we find the Bagdis divided into the following sub-castes:—(1) Tentuliá, bearing the titles Bagh, Sántrá, Rái, Khán, Puilá; (2) Kasáikuliá, with the titles Mánjhi, Masálchi, Palankhái, Phérká; (3) Duliá, with titles Sardár and Dhárá; (4) Ujáh or Ojáh; (5) Máchhuá, Mechhuá, or Mecho; (6) Gumlá, Gumlá, or Gumni; (7) Dandámánjhi; (8) Kusmetiá, Kusmátiá, or Kusputra; (9) Máltiá, Máltiá, or Máltiá. Within these again are a number of exogamous sections, among which may be mentioned Kásbak, the heron; Ponkrisiá, the jungle cock; Sálrisi or Sálmách, the sáál fish; Pátrishi, the bean; and Kachchhap, the tortoise. The totem is taboo to the members of the section; that is to say, a Kásbak Bagdi may not kill or eat a heron; a Pátrishi, like the Pythagoreans according to Lucian, may not touch a bean.

A Bagdi cannot marry outside the sub-caste, nor inside the section to which he belongs. Thus a Tentuliá must marry a Tentuliá, but a man of the Sálrishi section, to whatever sub-caste he may belong, cannot marry a woman of that section. The section names go by the male side, and the rule prohibiting marriage within the section requires therefore to be helped out by a separate set of rules, which to some extent overlap the rule of exogamy. Marriage with any person descended in a direct line from the same parents is forbidden as long as any relationship can be traced. To simplify the calculation of collateral relationship, the formula "Paternal uncle, maternal uncle, paternal aunt, maternal aunt—these four relationships are to be avoided in marriage," is in use. Ordinarily the prohibition extends only to three generations in the descending line; but if bhaiyádi or mutual recognition of relationship is kept up, intermarriage is barred for five or, as some say, seven generations. In counting generations the person under consideration is included.

In the more eastern districts the organization of the caste seems to be less elaborate, and has clearly been affected by closer contact with Hinduism, inducing the adoption of Brahmanical customs. In the 24-Parganas only five sub-castes are found—Tentuliá, Kusmetiá, Trayodas, Mánjhi, Noda; while the sections are reduced to three—Kásyapa, Káneho, and Dásya—the members of which profess to be descended from Vedic Rishis, and have abandoned the totemistic observances which are common further west. Traces of totemism, however, still survive in the names of sub-castes. Tentuliás admit that they are called after the tamarind tree, and Kusmetiás that they take their name from the kusá grass, but neither show any reverence for the plants in question. The system of exogamy has also been developed in the direction of closer conformity with the usages of the higher castes. The mother's section is excluded in addition to the father's, and marriage with Sapindas is prohibited.
In Bankura, Manbhum, and the north of Orissa, where the example of the aboriginal races is prominent, Bágdis practice both infant and adult marriage indifferently. In the case of girls who are not married in infancy, sexual license before marriage is virtually tolerated, it being understood that if a girl becomes pregnant she will find some one to marry her. Further east, infant-marriage is the rule and adult the exception, while the Bágdis of the 24-Parganas, Jessore, and Nadiya pretend entire ignorance of the custom of adult-marriage. Polygamy is permitted. In theory, a man may marry as many wives as he can afford to maintain: practically, however, the standard of living of the caste limits him to two. He may also marry two sisters at the same time.

Among a mass of ritual borrowed from the Brahmanical system, the marriage ceremony (bibáha or byáh as opposed to sángá) of the Bágdis of Western Bengal has preserved some interesting usages, which appear to belong to a different, and perhaps more primitive, order of symbolism. Early on the wedding morning, before the bridegroom starts in procession for the bride’s house, he goes through a mock marriage to a mahuá tree (Basistia latifolia). He embraces the tree and bedaubs it with vermilion; his right wrist is bound to it with thread, and after he is released from the tree this same thread is used to attach a bunch of mahuá leaves to his wrist. The barát or procession of the bridegroom’s party is usually timed so as to reach the bride’s house about sunset. On arrival, the inner courtyard of the house is defended by the bride’s friends, and a mimic conflict takes place, which ends in the victory of the barát. Symbolic capture having been thus effected, the bridegroom himself is seated with his face to the east on a wooden stool (pirá) placed under a bower of sád leaves, having pots of oil, grain, and turmeric at the four corners, and a small pool of water in the centre. When the bride enters, she marches seven times round the bower, keeping it always on her right hand, and seats herself opposite to the bridegroom, the pool of water being between the pair. The right hands of the bride, the bridegroom, and the bride’s eldest relative are tied together with thread by the officiating Brahman, who at the same time recites sacred texts (mantras), the purport of which is that the bride has been given by her people to the bridegroom and has been accepted by him. The priest then claims his fee, and, after receiving it, unties the thread and knots together the scarves worn by the married couple. This part of the ceremony is called gotrántar, ‘the change of gotra,’ and is supposed to transfer the bride from her own section or exogamous group into that of her husband. It is followed by sindurdán, when the bridegroom takes a small cup of vermilion in his left hand and with his right hand smears the colour on the parting of the bride’s hair. By the Bágdis, as by most of the aboriginal tribes of Western Bengal, sindurdán is deemed to be the essential and binding portion of the marriage ceremony, and they know nothing of the “seven steps” of the Brahmanical rite. Garlands of flowers are then exchanged by the parties, and the rest of the night is spent in feasting, the married couple leaving for the bridegroom's house early next morning. The knotted scarves are not untied until the fourth day after the wedding.

All sub-castes, except the Tentulía Bágdis, allow widows to marry again by the ceremony known as Sángá,—a maimed rite, at which no Brahman officiates, no mantras or Vedic texts are recited, and the sacred fire, which from the days of the Rig-Veda has formed the distinguishing feature of the marriage ritual, is not kindled. In the Sángá ceremony as practised by the Bágdis of Central Bengal, the bride and bridegroom sit face to face on a mat, and each daubs the other's forehead with a paste of powdered turmeric and water. A sheet (chádar) is then thrown over the heads of the pair, so as to cover them entirely, and under this the bridegroom puts an iron bracelet (lohr khándu) on the left wrist of the bride. The proceedings are finished by a feast to the caste brethren of the village. If the newly-married couple are too poor to afford a feast, they pay a fee of Re. 1-4. A widow may marry her late husband's younger brother, but she is not compelled to do so.

In the matter of divorce, the practice of the caste seems to vary in different parts of Bengal. Hinduised Bágdis follow the example of the higher castes in denying that such a thing is possible. The general opinion, however, seems to be that a wife may be divorced for barrenness, unchastity, or disobedience, duly proved to the satisfaction of a council of elders of the caste. When the council have given their assent, the husband closes the proceedings by the symbolic act of breaking a straw in two, or by taking away the iron bracelet which every married woman wears on her left wrist. A divorced wife is entitled to claim maintenance from her late husband for a period of six months after the divorce. She may marry again by the Sángá form, and in some districts such marriages are exceedingly common. Cases, indeed, have come to my notice in which a wife has taken steps to get a divorce with the avowed object of marrying another man. As a rule, however, the initiative is supposed to be taken by the husband.

Like the Bauris, all sub-castes of Bágdis, except the Tentulía, admit into their circle members of any caste higher than themselves in social standing. No regular ceremony is appointed for such occasions: the new member merely pays to the caste panchayat a sum of money, varying from Rs. 10 to Rs. 15, to be spent on a feast, in which for the first time he openly eats with his adopted caste brethren. When admitted into the Dulia sub-caste, he is made to take the palanquin on his shoulder to signify his acceptance of the characteristic occupation of the body to which he has joined himself. The origin of this singular practice, which is entirely out of accord with the spirit of the caste system at the present day, is apparently to be sought in the lax views of the Bagdis and Bauris on the subject of sexual morality. In every other caste a woman who has an intrigue with an outsider is punished by expulsion from the caste; but Bagdis and Bauris not only allow their women to live openly with men of other castes, but receive those men into their own community when, as frequently happens, they are outcasted by their own people for eating rice cooked by their mistresses.

---

1 Among the Bágdis of the Tributary States of Orissa, I am informed that Brahman do attend at the Sángá ceremony for the purpose of chanting mantras and sanctifying by their touch the new cloth and iron bracelet which the bridegroom presents to the bride.

The religion of the Bagdis is compounded of elements borrowed from orthodox Hinduism and survivals from the mingled Animism and Nature-worship which prevails among the aborigines of Western Bengal. Siva, Vishnu, Dharmaraj (Yama), Durga, the Saktis, and the myriad names of the modern Hindu Pantheon, are worshipped in a more or less intelligent fashion under the guidance of the degraded (patit) Brahmins who look after the spiritual welfare of the lower castes. Alongside of these greater gods we find the Santali goddess Gosain Fé and Barpahár, the "great mountain" god (Marang Burul of the same tribe. According to the Bagdis themselves, their favourite and characteristic deity is Manasá, the sister of the Snake-king Vasuki, the wife of Jaratkáru and mother of Astiká, whose intervention saved the snake race from destruction by Janmējaya.

Manasá is worshipped by the caste with great pomp and circumstance. On the 5th and 20th of the four rainy months—Asár, Srában, Bhádra, and Aswin (middle of June to middle of October)—rams and he-goats are sacrificed, rice, sweetmeats, fruit, and flowers are offered; and on the Nagpanchami (5th of the light half of Srában = end of August) a four-armed effigy of the goddess, crowned by a tiara of snakes, grasping a cobra in each hand, and with her feet resting on a goose, is carried round the village with much discordant music, and finally thrown into a tank. The cult of Manasa is of course by no means confined to the Bagdis. In Eastern Bengal all castes, from the Brahman to the Chándal, adore her, and no class is more strict in attending to the details of her worship than the Kulin Brahmins of Bikrampur in Decc. Bagdis, however, regard her with peculiar respect, and say that they alone among her votaries make images in her honour. Some add that the puja has the effect of securing the worshippers from snake-bite, which is naturally more frequent during the rains; and this notion finds a curious echo in the promise given by Vásuki to Astiká in the Mahabharata, that those who call upon his name, be they Brahmins or common folk, shall be safe from the attacks of the snake race.

On the last day of Bhádra (middle of September) the Bagdis of Manbhum and Bankura carry in procession the effigy of a female saint named Bhádu, who is said to have been the favourite daughter of a former Rájá of Pachete, and to have died a virgin for the good of the people. The worship consists of songs and wild dances, in which men, women, and children take part. The story of its origin may well have some foundation in fact, it being notorious that the Rájás of Pachete, like most of the pseudo-Rajput families of Chota Nagpur, find great difficulty in arranging suitable alliances for their daughters, and often have to keep them at home unmarried until they have long passed the age of puberty. Regarding from this point of view, the legend adds one more to the numerous instances which may be cited in support of the theory propounded by Sir Alfred Lyall in his essay on the origin of Divine Myths in India.

Bágdís burn their dead and throw the ashes into a stream or tank. The bodies of persons who die of small-pox or cholera are either buried or exposed. Infants under three years are buried. In parts of Orissa the universal practice is to bury the dead on the left side with the head towards the north. The śrāddh ceremony is performed a month after death under the supervision of a Brahman and in general conformity with the standard Hindu ritual.

Bágdís profess to follow the Hindu law of inheritance, but their legal business, as with most of the lower castes, is of a very simple character, and is generally disposed of by their own caste councils (panchāyats) without the intervention of the Courts. In making a division of property the eldest son gets an extra share (jeth-anges), which seems to be intended to enable him to support the female members of the family, who remain under his care. A similar provision was recognised by early Hindu law, but it has since become obsolete, and entire equality of division is now the rule among all the higher castes, unless perhaps where some special family custom can be proved.

Opinions differ regarding the original occupation of the caste.

Some say fishing, others personal service, but the question clearly is not one on which we can hope to arrive at any definite conclusion. At the present day the Tentuliá and Kasáikuliá Bágdís work as masons, and also prepare the lime which is mixed with betel and areca nut. Duliá Bágdís carry palanquins or dulis, and, in common with the other sub-castes, earn their livelihood by fishing, making gunny-bags, weaving cotton, and preparing the red powder (abir) used in the Holi festival. The Bágdi fisherman uses the ordinary circular cast-net described in the article on Máló, but swings the net round his head before casting it—a practice which is supposed by the regular fishing castes of Bengal—Tiyar, Mánd, and Kaibratá—to be peculiarly dishonourable. Most of the Bágdís are also to some extent engaged in agriculture, usually as kurfa or under-raiyats, and comparatively few have attained the more respectable position of occupancy tenants. In Western Bengal we find large numbers of them working as landless day-labourers, paid in cash or kind, or as nomadic cultivators, till ing other men’s lands on the bhág-jot system, under which they are remunerated by a definite share of the produce—sometimes one-half, sometimes less, as may be arranged with their immediate landlord. I can recall no instance of a Bágdi holding a zemindari, or even a superior tenure, such as patni or mukparati, of any importance; but some of the Manbhum zemindars, who now claim to be Rajputs, are said by Colonel Dalton to be really Bágdís, and the conjecture is likely enough to be true. In the neighbouring district of Bankura, Bágdís must have been among the earliest settlers, if not the actual aborigines, of that part of the country, for at the present time there are 14 Bágdís holding the tenure of sardár ghatáldi, 6 are sádiáls, 2 are village sardárs, 178 tábidárs, and 117 chákrán chattídars. In Mánbhúm one Bágdi holds a village sardár's tenure, and four are employed as tábidárs. In Central Bengal, Bágdis are frequently met with as chattídars.

1 Asiatic Studies, p. 30.

Their social rank is very low. They are usually classed with Baurís and Bhuiyáns as dwellers on the outskirts of Hinduism. Some Bágdis eat beef and pork, and all indulge freely in flesh of other kinds, and are greatly addicted to drink. Tuntúlá Bágdis, however, will not eat beef, and many members of this sub-caste have become Vaishnavas and abstain from all sorts of flesh. By abstaining from beef they consider themselves to be raised above the Baurí, Muchi, and Orsón, and the beef-eating members of their own caste.

Dulié Bágdis eat tortoises. In Western Bengal the Bágdis eat and drink with the Mál; in Orissa they eat rice with the Lohár Mánjhí and sweetmeats with the Bhuiyán.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Bágdis in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>208,074</td>
<td>169,242</td>
<td>Fárídpur</td>
<td>1,460</td>
<td>2,329</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>19,633</td>
<td>105,741</td>
<td>Bákarganj</td>
<td>76</td>
<td>941</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>50,594</td>
<td>73,287</td>
<td>Mainmansinh</td>
<td>1,523</td>
<td>2,323</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>78,262</td>
<td>114,700</td>
<td>Chittásong</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>406</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>132,619</td>
<td>126,781</td>
<td>Nóakháli</td>
<td>86</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>53,533</td>
<td>84,333</td>
<td>Tipérrah</td>
<td>301</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>60,658</td>
<td>126,781</td>
<td>Pátna</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nádyya</td>
<td>35,576</td>
<td>50,046</td>
<td>Shahábd</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jowcór</td>
<td>6,146</td>
<td>18,234</td>
<td>Móngyr</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>4,614</td>
<td>4,614</td>
<td>Purnásh</td>
<td>85</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murábedábéd</td>
<td>23,295</td>
<td>33,197</td>
<td>Sántál Parganas</td>
<td>3,507</td>
<td>4,078</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinágpur</td>
<td>136</td>
<td>1,231</td>
<td>Maládah</td>
<td>778</td>
<td>2,344</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rejákshayé</td>
<td>1,980</td>
<td>2,055</td>
<td>Cuttáck</td>
<td>3,586</td>
<td>4,068</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bangpúr</td>
<td>83</td>
<td>837</td>
<td>Púri</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>303</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bógrá</td>
<td>285</td>
<td>1,409</td>
<td>Balásore</td>
<td>410</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pábna</td>
<td>1,590</td>
<td>6,115</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>11,767</td>
<td>4,550</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjíling</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>Hazarbhagí</td>
<td>94</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jálápúrú</td>
<td>146</td>
<td>24,587</td>
<td>Lohárdaga</td>
<td>8,140</td>
<td>2,993</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behár</td>
<td>1,600</td>
<td>14,289</td>
<td>Sínéhbhum</td>
<td>383</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>2,446</td>
<td>9,543</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>9,045</td>
<td>7,487</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bágdi-Lohár, a sub-caste of Lohárs in Mánbhúm.

Bagé, anything forbidden, a sept of Mundás and Khariáś in Chota Nagpur.

Bagéháár, a section of Turís in Chota Nagpur.

Bágh, tiger, a totemistic sept or section of Goálás, Kharwars, Lohárs, Oraons, Páns, Ghásías, Goráíts, and Gonds; a title of Bágdis and Kaíbárttas in Bengal.

Bághá, a sub-caste of Agurís in Western Bengal; tiger, a title of Khandáits in Orissa.

Bághái or Bághál, a sub-caste of Rájus in Midnapur.
Baghail or Baghel, a sept of the Suryabansi Rajputs in Behar; tiger, a totemistic sept of Páns, Gonds, and Rautiás in Chota Nagpur.

Bágháir, a sept of the Suryabansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Bághákol, a section of the Sátmulé Magháyas sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Bághbán or Bágrán, a gardener, or a vendor of vegetables, fruits, and flowers.

Bághbanuárr, tiger, a totemistic section of Kurmis in Western Bengal and Chota Nagpur, the members of which will not touch or kill a tiger.

Baghela, quail, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bagher, tiger, a totemistic sept of Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Bághiá, a section of Goáláś in the North-Western Provinces.

Baghoar, tiger, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bághgot, tiger, a totemistic section of Nuniás in Behar.

Baghot, a title of the Ghosi sub-caste of Goáláś in Behar.

Bághrishi (the tiger), a totemistic section of Bágdis, Chásádhobás, and of Kánárs in Singbhum and the Santál Parganas.

Baghtuar, a devotee, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Baghuárr, a section of Goráíts in Chota Nagpur.
Bahelá, a title assumed by the Dosadhás who have come as immigrant labourers to the Terai from Behar.

Baheliá, a sub-caste of Dosadhás in Behar, also called Bhula, who are employed as labourers and bird-catchers. Although closely allied to Dosadhás, the Baheliás will not eat or drink with them; and when serving as policemen, they call themselves Hazaras. Many pursue agriculture, while some serve as grooms in Bengal. There is a caste of the same name in Bengal who are professional hunters, and are thus allied to Bediyas.

Bahera, a jungle fruit, a totemistic sept of Kharwars and Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Baheriá, a class of Rajputs in Jaunpur and Chunar.

Baherwár, a fruit, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa; a totemistic sept of Agarias and Kharwars.

Bahíá or Bahiot, the ‘water-carrier,’ the ‘bearer,’ a title of Dhánuks and Kaháres in Behar, who are personal servants in the houses of the higher castes. The term also denotes a sub-caste of Kewats in Bhágalpur, who are said to have been outcasted for eating the jhutá, or leavings, of their masters.

Bahíáwák, Bahiot, or Ghibitár, a sub-caste of Kewats in Behar.

Bahio, a sub-caste of Khatwès in Behar.

Bahiot, a sub-caste of Amáts in Behar. The name implies personal service—bearer of water.

Bahirarwár-Parhat, a muí of the Báttsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bahirarwár-Punách, a muí of the Báttsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bahirarwár-Párkhand, a muí of the Báttsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bahirarwár-Kasiám, a muí of the Báttsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bahomar, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Bahra, a title of Dhobis in Behar.

Báhubalendra, strong as the god Indra, a title of Khandáits in Orissa.

Bahudaka, a mendicant who lives in a strange town and begs his food from house to house. The name is said to be derived from bahu, ‘many,’ and udaka, ‘water,’ drinking water from various sources.

Báhuja, a synonym for Rajput.

Bahurupia, a mimic, an actor, a person assuming various characters and disguises. Bahurupiás are believed to have been originally low-caste Hindus, who on their conversion to Islam affected to trace their descent from Umar-i-yár, the court jester of Naushirwan. They often appear in the guise of a decrepit old woman, her face puckered with gab juice, who calls herself Akbar’s nurse. Another popular rôle is that of Siv-Gaurí, in which the Bahurupiá gets up one side of his person as Siva and the other as Gaurí, and conducts a humorous dialogue between the two.
Bái, Mahomedan dancing-girls and prostitutes.

Baiághrapad, an eponymous section of Rajputs in Behar.

Báibá, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Baid, a section of Maghayá Kumhárs in Behar; a corrupted form of Baidya or Vaidya; a title of the barber caste in Hazaribagh, where they practise surgery and prescribe for the sick; a section of Oswáls.

Baidha, a title of Dhobis in Behar.

Baidik, a sub-caste of Brahmans and Jugis in Bengal.

Baidmota, a section of Oswáls.

Baidohang, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Bailsín, a section of the Amashta Káyaëths in Behar.

Traddions of origin.

According to this account the Baidyas are anulomaj (born with the hair or grain, i.e., in due order), the father being of higher caste than the mother. Another tradition describes them as begotten on a Brahman woman by one of the Aswini Kumáras, the light-bringing and healing twin-horsemen of Vedic mythology; and then, oddly enough, goes on to say that they were reckoned as Sudras because their mother was of superior rank to their father, and their generation was consequently pratilomaja, "against the hair," or in the inverse order according to the succession of the castes. It would appear from this that the Aswini Kumáras were classed as Kshatriyas, and that, according to Brahmanical ideas, even the gods were not equal mates for a Brahman maiden.

An expanded version of the pedigree given by Manu is found in the Skanda Purana. This legend tells how Gálahá Muni, a pupil or son of Visámitra, being greatly distressed by thirst while on pilgrimage, was given a draught of water by a Vaisya girl named Birbhádhrá. The grateful sage blessed the maiden that she should soon have a son. Birbhádhrá demurred to this boon, on the ground that she was unmarried; but the rash oath, so characteristic of Indian mythology, could not be recalled, nor could Gálahá himself put matters straight by marrying the virgin whose kindness had involved her in so strange a difficulty. For, so it is explained, she had saved his life by the draught of water, and therefore he looked upon her in the light of a mother. A miracle was clearly in request. By the word of power of a Vedio mantra a wisp of kusa grass (Poa Cynosuroides) was transformed into a male child, variously known as Dhanyantari, Amrita Achariya, and Ambastha. He was the first of the Vaidyas, because to a Vedio (Vaidik) text he owed his birth. He was also Ambastha because he had no father, and therefore belonged to the family of his mother (Amba). A number of analogous myths have been collected by Bachofen in his two letters on "Pueri juncini," and his method of interpretation, if applied to the present case, would lead to the conclusion that the tradition given in the Skanda Purana records an instance of female kinship.

---

1 The term Baidya is not distinctive, and may denote either a member of the Buidya caste properly so called, or a man who practises medicine, whether a Brahman or a member of some lower caste. In Behar, where the Baidya caste is unknown, Sakadwipi Brahmanas are the regular physicians.

The Baidyas are now divided into the following four sub-castes:——(1) Ráhri, (2) Banga, (3) Bérendra, (4) Panchakoti, according to the parts of Bengal in which their ancestors resided. All of these are endogamous. A fifth endogamous group, which, however, bears no distinctive name, comprises those Baidya families of the districts of Sylhet, Chittagong, and Tipperah who intermarry with Kéyasths and Sunris, the children in each case following the caste of the father. This practice appears to be the only modern instance of intermarriage between members of different castes. It is said to have arisen from the reluctance of the Baidyas farther west to give their daughters to men who had settled in the country east of the Brahmaputra. Failing women of their own caste, the latter were compelled not only to marry the daughters of Kéyasths, but to give their own daughters in return. This interchange of women is said to extend even to the comparatively degraded caste of Sunri, and it may be for this reason that the Chittagong, Tipperah, and Sylhet Baidyas are cut off from community of food with the other sub-castes. The sections or exogamous groups in use among the Baidyas will be found in Appendix I. All of them appear to be eponymous, the eponyms being Vedio Rishis or saints. The restrictions on intermarriage are the same as among Brahmans.

The evidence of inscriptions shows that a dynasty of Baidya kings ruled over at least a portion of Bengal from 1010 to 1200 A.D. To the most famous of these, Ballál Sen, is ascribed the separation of the Baidyas into two divisions, one of which wore the sacred thread and observed fifteen days as the prescribed period of mourning, while with the other investiture with the thread was optional and mourning lasted for a month. Before his time, it is said, all Baidyas formed a single group, the members of which intermarried with one another, as all were equal in rank. All wore the thread and observed the term of mourning characteristic of the Vaisyas. Ballál Sen, however, insisted on marrying a ferryman’s daughter, named Padmavati, of the Patni or Dom-Patni caste. His son, Lakshan Sen, followed by a majority of the caste, protested against the legality of the marriage, and, finding their remonstrances unheeded, tore off the sacred cord which all Baidyas then wore, and retired into a distant part of the country. These were the ancestors of the Banga and Bérendra sub-castes of the present day, while the Ráhri Baidyas represent the remnant who condoned Ballál Sen’s offence. It is difficult to reconcile this legend with the accepted tradition that in the course of his social reforms Ballal Sen separated the Baidyas into three classes—Rārhi, Barendra, and Banga—according to the place of their abode, and introduced the hypergamous divisions of Kulin, Bangsaj, and Maulik. A Kulin must marry his daughter to a Kulin, but he himself may marry either a Kulin or a Bangsaj woman. If he marries a Maulik woman, his family is to a certain extent dishonoured, but the stain may be wiped out by marrying his sister or daughter to a Kulin. Hence the saying, “Rising and falling is the Baidya’s lot, provided the original stock remains sound.” Ballal Sen is said to have distributed the Baidyas of his time into twenty-seven sthānas or communes, beyond which no one could reside without losing caste. The principal settlements were at Senhati, Chandam Mahál, Daspará, Puigrám, Karoria, Shendiá, Itna, and Bhattacharóp in Jessore; Poragáchha in Bikrám pur; and Dásora and Chánd-pratāp in Dacca. To him also is attributed the institution of the three classes—Siddha, Sādhyā, and Kashta, which, like the Kulinistic groups, have reference to social esteem or purity of lineage. They differ from the latter in being more rigid. Thus, a Siddha Baidya who takes a wife from the Sādhyā or Kashta class sinks at once to their level, and his descendants cannot recover their status by marrying into a higher class.

The Samaj-pati, or presidency of the Banga Baidyas, has for several generations been vested in the family of Rájá Ráj Ballabh of Rajnagar, who reside on the south bank of the Padma river, and though now poor and dependent, the members are still consulted on matters affecting the caste. In the middle of last century the influence of the family was still stronger, and a Rájá of that time induced many of the Bangas and Barendra Baidyas to resume the sacred thread which their ancestors had discarded. With reference to this tradition, Ward writes as if the entire caste had then for the first time obtained the right to wear thread by means of Ráj Ballabh’s influence. He says:—“Raj Ballabh, a person of this [Baidya] class, steward to the Nawáb of Murshedábád, about a hundred years ago first procured for Baidyas the honour of wearing the paitić: he invited the Brahmans to a feast, and persuaded them to invest his son; from which time many Baidyas wear this badge of distinction.”

Infant-marriage is the rule of the caste, rare exceptions being met with in highly-educated families, which have come under the influence of European ideas. Polygamy is permitted, but is not practised on a large scale. Divorce is unknown: a woman taken in adultery is simply turned adrift, and ceases to be a member of respectable Hindu society. Widows are not allowed to marry again, and the practice of sati was formerly very common. On this point Ward, writing in 1811, says:—“Many Baidya widows ascend the funeral pile. At Sonakhali, in Jessore, which contains many families of this order, almost all the widows are regularly burnt alive with the corpses of their husbands.”
The Baidya marriage ceremony does not differ materially from that in vogue among Brahmans, except that sometimes the Kusundikā ceremony is performed on the marriage night. When equals marry a curious custom is observed. A bond is executed certifying that the bridegroom has received twelve rupees; should a second son marry, he executes a bond for twenty-four; and in the case of a third son the acknowledgment is for thirty-six. Beyond this it never goes, however many brothers the bridegroom may have older than himself.

The religion of the Baidyas is that of the orthodox high caste Hindu. All old Baidya families are Sakti worshippers, but among the poorer classes Vaishnavas are occasionally found. Of late years many of the caste have joined the Brāhma Samaj. Brahmans are employed for religious and ceremonial purposes; but it is doubtful whether these are of the highest rank, as they also officiate for the Nava-sākha. They have also ghataksof their own, who were formerly Brahmans, but for many years past members of their own caste have discharged this important social function. The innovation is ascribed to one Viswarath of Jessore, who is said to have been the first regular Baidya ghatak.

The practice of medicine, according to the traditional Hindu method, was no doubt the original profession of the Baidya caste. From the time of the Sen kings, however, the tendency has been towards the adoption of other pursuits, and at the present day hardly one-third of the caste are believed to be engaged in their traditional avocation. These latter are still in pretty general request. Certain passages of the Shástras regard the taking of medicine from a Baidya as a sort of sacramental act, and forbid resort to any one not of that caste, so that some orthodox Hindus when at the point of death call in a Baidya to prescribe for them in the belief that by swallowing the drugs he orders for them they obtain absolution for their sins. Many Baidyas have distinguished themselves at the Bar, and as agents, managers, and school-masters, whilst others have taken to the study of English medicine and have entered Government service or engaged in private practice as medical men. Many again are found among the higher grades of land-holders, as semindars, tenure-holders, and a few are occupancy raiyats. They will on no account hold the plough, or engage in any form of manual labour, and thus necessarily carry on their cultivation by means of hired servants paid in cash or by a share of the crop.

In point of social standing, Baidyas rank next to Brahmans and above Kayasthas. Strictly speaking, they are inferior to Rajputs, but this point cannot be insisted on in practice, as there are comparatively few Rajputs in the area inhabited by Baidyas, and those are mostly immigrants from Upper India, who belong to a different social system from Bengalis. There has been some controversy between Baidyas and Kayasthas regarding their relative rank, the leading points of which will be found in the article on Kayasthas. Putting aside the manifest futility of the discussion, we may fairly sum it up by saying that in point of general culture there is probably little to choose between the two castes, and that the Baidyas have distinctly the best of the technical claim to precedence. On the other hand, it would, I think, strike most observers that the Káyasáths are the more pliant and adaptive of the two, and have thereby drawn to themselves a larger share of official preferment than the more conservative Baidyas.

Baidyas eat boiled rice and food coming under that category only with members of their own caste. They will drink and smoke with the Nava Sákha and with castes ranking higher than that group, but will not use the same drinking vessel or the same hookah. Brahmans will eat sweetsmeats in a Baidya’s house, and will drink and smoke in their company, subject to the restriction noticed in last sentence as to not using the same vessel or pipe.

The following statement illustrates the distribution of Baidyas in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>5,004</td>
<td>3,320</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>12,000</td>
<td>11,518</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>3,360</td>
<td>3,981</td>
<td>Mamsamn</td>
<td>5,007</td>
<td>4,015</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>1,583</td>
<td>1,834</td>
<td>Chitongong</td>
<td>4,016</td>
<td>4,607</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>2,680</td>
<td>2,469</td>
<td>Nokhali</td>
<td>3,323</td>
<td>1,997</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>3,088</td>
<td>776</td>
<td>Tippershá</td>
<td>3,351</td>
<td>0,479</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>4,556</td>
<td>1,820</td>
<td>Chitongong Hill Tracts</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rú-Parganas</td>
<td>6,556</td>
<td>1,080</td>
<td>Paicka</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>2,337</td>
<td>1,747</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>74</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>3,529</td>
<td>1,972</td>
<td>Bhagapour</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>......</td>
<td>1,584</td>
<td>Purniah</td>
<td>467</td>
<td>654</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>3,258</td>
<td>1,474</td>
<td>Santali Parganas</td>
<td>549</td>
<td>508</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dúsajpur</td>
<td>585</td>
<td>633</td>
<td>Maidah</td>
<td>465</td>
<td>611</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bajalakya</td>
<td>1,179</td>
<td>828</td>
<td>Cutsack</td>
<td>234</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rangpur</td>
<td>886</td>
<td>2,183</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>184</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>147</td>
<td>213</td>
<td>Balsaore</td>
<td>88</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>1,506</td>
<td>1,116</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalipuri</td>
<td>82</td>
<td>201</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>729</td>
<td>664</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Bóhar</td>
<td>......</td>
<td>289</td>
<td>Singhbum</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>108</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>5,459</td>
<td>10,081</td>
<td>Manbhoom</td>
<td>3,954</td>
<td>1,638</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>9,025</td>
<td>4,593</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Baidya, a title of Pods, and of Nápits in Bengal who practise medicine. A synonym for Doái.

Baidya-nidhi, a title or popular designation of Baidyas practising medicine, used by themselves.

Baiga, a sorcerer; a sept of Dhenuárs in Chota Nagpur.
Also a synonym for, or title of, the Kharwár tribe of Chota Nagpur, possibly having reference to the idea that they being among the original inhabitants of the country are best qualified to play the part of sorcerer and propitiate the local gods.

Baïjahmapadya or Baiyághrapadya, a section of Brahmans and Káyasáths in Bengal.

Baikar, a synonym for Goráít in Chota Nagpur.

Bail, fruit, a totemistic sept of Kharwars and Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Báilhar, Báilhor, a section of the Kumhár caste in Western Bengal. The members of the caste say that the term denotes one of the Rishis or Vedic seers.
The last syllable of the word, however, seems to be the Santali for man (hor or horo), and to suggest a Kolarian eponym for this section of the caste.

Bainá, a sub-caste of Rájus in Midnapur.

Baini, a section of Majhraut Goálás in Behar.

Bainipati, a group of the Srotriya sub-caste of Utkal Brahmanas.

Bair, plums, a totemistic sept of Binjhías and Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Bairági, 'one who is free from all worldly desires, one devoid of passion:' a class of Hindu religious mendicants who worship Viahnu, to be distinguished from the Sannyásí, who are usually Saivites; but the term is indiscriminately applied to different classes of vagrants professing a religious life. In Chota Nagpur there exists a group bearing the name Bairagi, which appears closely to resemble a true caste. The exogamous sections of this group are shown in appendix I. Some of them are totemistic and some have reference to divisions of the Bairagi sect based upon differences of ascetic practice.

Bairiá, a sub-caste of Lohárs in Behar.

Bais, a trading caste of North Bhágalpur, who claim to be the lineal descendants of the Vaisyás of early Aryan tradition, goes by this name. They disown all connexion with the Bais Baniyás mentioned below, and keep up elaborate genealogies for the purpose of preserving the purity of the stock and guarding against consanguineous marriages. They observe an intricate system of exogamy, in which regard is had to the following considerations:—

First, a man may not marry a woman who belongs to the same mul as he himself, his mother, or his paternal grandmother. Secondly, he may not marry a woman whose mother or paternal grandmother belonged to any of the muls prohibited to him. For instance (vide table below), the question is whether Propositus may marry Proposita. The capital letters show the muls. Proposita herself does not belong to any of the three muls A, B, D, which are barred on the man's side. But her maternal grandmother belonged to D mul, which is barred for Propositus. Consequently the marriage cannot take place. The mul of Proposita's maternal grandfather is not taken into account:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Paternal grandfather</th>
<th>Paternal grandmother</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A</td>
<td>D</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Father</th>
<th>Mother</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A</td>
<td>B</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Maternal grandfather</th>
<th>Maternal grandmother</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>E</td>
<td>D</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Father</th>
<th>Mother</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>F</td>
<td>E</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Propositus</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>P</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Proposita</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>F</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Bais marry their daughters as infants, prohibit the remarriage of widows, and do not recognise divorce. They rank high socially, and their physical appearance lends some support to their claims to be of comparatively pure Aryan descent.

Bais, a sub-caste of Sonárs and a sept of the Chandrabanish division of Rájputs in Behar.

Baisák, Basíkk, a title of Tántis in Bengal.

Baisániyá, a sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar, some of whom claim to be the modern representatives of the ancient Vaisyas. It is, however, equally likely that they may be an offshoot from the Bais sub-tribe of Rajputs, which was separated from the parent group by reason of its members taking to trade. They have three sections—Morwait, Karnait, and Gothman, supplemented by the usual rules regarding prohibited degrees. Marriage is either infant or adult, the former custom being deemed the more respectable.
The standard ceremony is followed, and tilak is paid to the parents of the bridegroom. Widow-marriage and divorce are prohibited, and polygamy is permitted only in the event of the first wife being barren. They burn their dead and perform the śriddha on the thirty-first day after death. Trade and agriculture are their regular occupations.

Baiswánar, a gotra or section of the Baidya caste in Bengal.

Baiswara, a sub-caste of Tántis in Behar.

Baisya, a synonym for Vaisya, g.v.

Báiti, Báoti, a small caste of Central and Eastern Bengal, usually called Chunári or Chuniyá, from being engaged in the manufacture of lime from shells. They are also mat-makers, weavers, dancers, and beggars.

Regarding the internal structure of the caste very little is known. The Báitis of Dacca all belong to one section, Aliyan, and thus, like several other castes of Eastern Bengal, habitually transgress the rule of exogamy implied in the recognition of a section-name. A degraded sub-caste is found in Faridpur, under the name of Magi, the members of which do not intermarry with the Báitis of Dacca. In the 24-Parganas, Musalman Báitis are found. These, of course, do not intermarry with Hindu Báitis, nor do they follow the characteristic occupation of making lime.

The Purohit of the Báiti is a Patit Brahmán, and the caste consists mainly of Vaishnavas. The only titles met with are Rái, Bhuya, and Sen.

The Báiti do not gather shells themselves, but Bedíyas occasionally do, and fishermen from the Murshedabad district come annually in March and April to collect them. The best fishing ground is the Kamargangá river in Faridpur, and the only shells calcined by the Baiti are the Ghongha, Sipt, and Shámuk, the molluses (gita) being extracted by an iron hook. A maund of shells, costing from fourteen to twenty annas, produces, when calcined, about four maunds of lime, which sells for about an anna a seer. The Káthuria Sutáras and Bágdis are the only other classes of Bengalis engaged in lime-burning.

Although the Baiti is one of the most impure of Bengali castes, their water-vessels defiling any pure Hindu, no one will refuse to chew lime moistened with water from these very same vessels. Kabirájs purchase unsaked lime (gúra-chún) from the Baiti for medicinal purposes, while the finest and most expensive lime for chewing, pan-chún, is prepared with the ashes of tamarind wood.

The Súdra barber and washerman work for the Baiti, but the Bhúnmáli, owing to some party grudge, will not, and the Muhammedan Beldár has to be engaged whenever the Baiti has a house to build or a ditch to dig.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Baitis in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>4,601</td>
<td>2,920</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>537</td>
<td>1,063</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>932</td>
<td>1,196</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>5,632</td>
<td>252</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>8,001</td>
<td>3,039</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patur</td>
<td>352</td>
<td>488</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24 Parganas</td>
<td>1,543</td>
<td>1,429</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>2,619</td>
<td>1,218</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>2,463</td>
<td>2,289</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>551</td>
<td>1,226</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>1,564</td>
<td>1,310</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>501</td>
<td>163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahiyas</td>
<td>1,061</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td></td>
<td>1,121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>170</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baman</td>
<td>1,493</td>
<td>466</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jhalpur</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,694</td>
<td>1,567</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>1,249</td>
<td>1,776</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parulpur</td>
<td>1,133</td>
<td>1,527</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>634</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainmanat</td>
<td>2,969</td>
<td>628</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>123</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>223</td>
<td>107</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>906</td>
<td>197</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Malda</td>
<td>13,323</td>
<td>1,121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sindpur</td>
<td>300</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Baitiriba, buffalo, a totemistic sept of Juángs in Orissa.

Baitosh, Baittash, a title of Dakshin-Ráhi and Bangaja Káyasths.

Baiyágrapadya or Baijahmapadya, a section of Brahmans and Káyasths in Bengal.

Bájándariá, a sub-caste of Bágdis found in Jessore.

Bájaniá, players on musical instruments, whether Hindus or Mahomedans; if the latter, usually barbers or the husbands of midwives (dái); a title of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Báfapeyí, a title of Kanaujíia and Sásrawat Brahmans in Behar.

Bajá, Bajarpurí, a sept of Chiks or Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Bajgáin, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Báfikar, Básigar, a sub-caste of Bédiyás, the common name applied to wandering jugglers; some of them profess to be Hindu, others are Mahomedans.
Bajitpur, a mul or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Bájná, a synonym for Bádyakar, q.v.

Bájpái (corruption of Bájapeyí), a title of Kanaújia Brahmans; also a section of Doms who are employed as drummers in Behar.

Bajú, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Bajúa, a variant of Daibayná, an astrologer, q.v.

Bájuniá, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal who are musicians.

Bakál, Bakkál, a grocer, a chandler, a grain-merchant, a cloth-dealer; a shopkeeper in general, hence a title of Banías. See Baqqál below.

Bákdáí, a title of Baniás.

Bakat, pánre ke pánre, a section of the Biyáhut and Kháridáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Bákhim, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Bakho, a profession followed by both Hindus and Mahomedans, who go about singing on the occasion of the birth of a child, the husband carrying a khanjri to play on and the wife (Bakhán) a macháí or stool, on which she sits at the door and sings.

Bákhólá, a section of the Karan Káyashts in Behar.

Bakriyáór, a title of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Baksár, a mul or section of the Chhamulía-Madhesía sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Baksar Chausá, a mul or section of the Kanaújia sub-caste of Hajiáms in Behar.

Baksariá, belonging to Buxar, a section of the Biyáhut and Kháridáhá Kalwárs and of Bábhans in Behar.

Bakshi, a paymaster; a subordinate in the Treasury Department of a Collector's Office; a section of the Sribástab Káyashts in Behar; an honorary title of Brahmans and Káyashts in Bengal.

Bakutáí, a mul or section of the Chhamulía-Madhesía sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Bákuli, a title of Goálás.

Bákundi, a title of Sadgops in Bengal.

Bakurá or Bakulá, paddy bird, a totemistic sept of Chiks and Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Bál, a section of Murmis; a title of Dakshin-Ráhí and Bándgaja Káyashts.

Bála, a gái of the Bharadwája gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Bálágachpargaria, a mul or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Bálágachpokhrám, a mul or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Baláhar, Baládhárr, a low-caste servant, a village guide or messenger, a village watchman, inferior to the ordinary chaukidáí; he is also employed as a sweeper.

Baláhi, a man of low caste; a Chamádr or worker in hides and leather, sometimes employed to measure land.
Baláíár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Baláín, a section of the Karan Káyasths in Behar.

Balamrái, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Balamtiríá, Bálalmiríá, a sub-caste of Halwáis and Kándus in Behar.

Baláram or Balabhádriá, a section of the Mahasthán sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans.

Baláramí, a sub-caste of Tán-tis in Bengal.

Bálavashthi, a gáin of the Kásyapa gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Balbandhi, a sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Balbandhiá, a section of Bháts.

Balbandhiya, a sept of Chikas who tie up the hair.

Balbheráit, a section of the Magháya sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Baldev, a cowherd.

Baldía, a herdsman or drover.

Bálgori, a sub-tribe of Rajpúts in Western Bengal.

Bálháti, a territorial section of Barhís in Behar.

Bálháva, a title of Chásádho-bás in Bengal.

Báli, a gáin of the Sábarna gotra and a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Báláése-Bálha, a mel of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Báláése-Ási, a mel of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Báláése-Sakuri, a mel of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Báláése-Dharaurá, a mel of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Báláése-Suket, a mel of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Báláése-Baghánt, a mel of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Báláhéri, a gáin of the Kásyapa gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Bálimba, mosquito, a totemistic sept of Juánás in Orissa.

Bálká, a young follower of a religious Hindu mendicant.

Bálkhárya, a sept of Rajpúts in Behar.

Ballabhi, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Balliáti, a mel or section of the Magháya sub-caste of Barhís in Behar.

Ballisor, a sept of Pang in Chota Nagpur.

Balliwélé, a trader in beams of undressed wood, used for scaffolding by masons and others, and also as rafters in thatched and tiled roofing.

Bálmiik, a sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.
Bálmus, a kind of insect which lives in river sand, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bálthabi, a ĝain or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.

Báltong, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Balum, salt, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bálwán, a section of Goáls in the North-Western Provinces.

Bám, a totemistic sept of Mundas, the members of which may not touch or be touched by a Brahman. Also a synonym for Brahman.

Bámamáni, a sub-caste of Káũrs in Chota Nagpur.

Bálwén, a section of Goalas in the North-Western Provinces.

Bán, a totemistic sept of Mundas, the members of which may not touch or be touched by a Brahman. Also a synonym for Brahman.

Béma, a sub-caste of Nápits in Bengal.

Bamhajýa, a hypergamous division of Tiyars found by Buchanan in Bhagalpur.

Banábai, a kind of eel, a totemistic sept of Káũrs in Chota Nagpur.

Bámbori, a section of Goáls in the North-Western Provinces.

Banhangour, a class of the Gaur Rajputs.

Bámbori, a subdivision of the Káchhi tribe, a class of cultivators in Behar and the North-Western Provinces.

Bánia, salt, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Bámo, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Bámodá, a sept of the Agniá sub-tribe of Meches in Darjiling.

Bámu, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Bámmuniá, a section of Káũrs in Singbhum and the Santál Parganas.

Bán, eel, a totemistic sept of Lohars; a title of Dakshin-Kráhi and Bangaja Káỹasths; a section of Goáls in the North-Western Provinces.

Banadhiá, see Banaudhiá.

Banáfar or Banáphar, a sept of Yadubansi Rájputs, chiefly settled in Oudh, but also found in small numbers in Behar.

Bánaiba, bear, a totemistic sept of Juângs in Oríssa.

Banámpur, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Banáphar, Banáphar, a sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Bánaprasth (from ban, ‘a solitude,’ praðth, ‘who proceeds to’), the Hindu of the third order, who has discharged the duty of a householder and has become a hermit.

Bánapáisi, a section of Málos in Eastern Bengal.

Banárasí, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Bána, a class of up-country mánjís or boatmen, probably members of the Gónrhi caste, who are met with occasionally on the rivers of Bengal.

Banásil, a title of Subarna-baniks in Bengal.

Banaudhiá, a sub-caste of Baniyas, Kurmis, Kumhárs, Dhánuks, Tánti, Suuris, and Kalwárs in Behar; also a sept of the Chandrabansi division of Rájputs and a section of Kásrás in Behar.
BANAUT.

Banáut, a variant for Bandáwat, q.v.

Ban-char, a forester, a woodman.

Bánda, a kind of leaf, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bandáwat, a respectable cultivating caste in Hazaribagh, who wear the sacred thread and claim to be Rajputs.

Bandarbkretá, monkey-seller, title of Birhors and other non-Aryan hunting castes.

Bandáwat Sombansi, a branch of the Bandáwat caste in Hazaribagh, who claim descent from the moon.

Bandh, a sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Bándhalgoti, a sept of Rajputs of Chauhán descent occupying part of Bundelkhand.

Bandhiá, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Bandhu, Bandhur, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Káyasths and of Sánkhári in Bengal.

Bandi, a title of Bháts, said to be derived from the laudatory verses recited by them; a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Bandigwár, a forest guard; a title of Bhumij in Manbhum.

Bandihá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bandijan or Suta, a division of Brahmans in Behar.

Bando, a wild cat that barks at night, a totemistic sept of Lohárs, Mundas, Oraons, and Pán in Chota Nagpur; a section of Kahárs.

Bandrishi, fish, a totemistic section of the Paripál sub-caste of Sunris in Manbhum.

Bandya, a gáin of the Sándilya gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Bánebenáras, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá-Mádhesí sept of Halwais in Behar.

Bán-farosh, Bán-sás, a rope-maker, chiefly of the Kahár and Malláh castes, who make twine and rope from muny, san, káns, and háthi chinyár.

Banga, Bangaja, a sub-caste of Baidyás, Káyasths, Jugís, Subarnabaniks, and Sunris in Bengal.

Bangál, a sub-caste of Bányás in Behar, who immigrated from Bengal some generations ago and have now forgotten their original language; a sept of the Tungjainya sub-tribe of Chakmás, who are said to be descended from a Bengali father.

Bángál, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans and of Jugís and Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Bangáli, a sub-caste of Hajjáms or barbers in Behar, whose ancestors immigrated into that province from Bengal; a sub-caste of Bhars in Western Bengal, comprising the two sections of Agní and Raishi, both of which seem to have been borrowed from the Brahmans. A sub-caste of Dhobás in Western Bengal, of Dhobís in Manbhum, of Kaibarttas in Behar, and Kumhárs in Western Bengal.
Bangálí or Rárhi, a sub-caste of Kumbára in Behar.

Bangaréri, a sub-caste of Gareres in Hazaribagh.

Bangás-rási, a section of Máloes in Eastern Bengal.

Bángdel, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Baner Rárhi, a sub-caste of Sunris in Eastern Bengal.

Banglá, a sub-caste of Dohias, Pods, and Sunris in Behar, who are probably immigrants from Bengal.

Bangrongpá, a rui or sept of the Bed tshan-gye sub-tribe of Dejong Lhoris or Bhotias of the south.

Banhor, "jungle-man," the same as Birhor ('ho,' or 'hor,' being the Kolarian for man), a name by which some of the primitive people of Chota Nagpur who emigrate to the tea gardens, who are generally known as Dhángars, occasionally call themselves.

Bání, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in Noakhali.

Baniá, Baniyá, a synonym for Gandhabanik and Subaranbanik.

Banía, a sept of Kharwars and Telis in Chotá Nagpur.

Baníápáthar, a mul or section of the Chhamulia-Madhesi sub-caste of Halwái and Kándus in Behar.

Banichar, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Banik, Baniya, Banika, Banikar, a generic term including most of the banking and trading castes, and specially denoting those who deal in money as distinguished from commodities.

Banika, a synonym for Subaranbanik.

Bánikarnauti, a mul or section of the Sátmulia or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goélás in Behar.

Bániya, Banik, Barnik, Banikar, a generic name, derived from Sans. vanij, 'a merchant,' applied to almost all of the trading castes throughout India. In Bengal Bániya is not, strictly speaking, a caste name at all; that is to say, there is no endogamous group exactly co-extensive with the title of Bániya, although that name includes a large number of groups, some of which are endogamous within a círcle defined more or less by their trading functions, while others belong to castes or sub-castes which follow other pursuits, such as agriculture or service. There is nothing, for instance, to prevent Bábans, Chhatris, or Kayasths from keeping grain-shops or engaging in money-lending, and they might in this way come to be designated by the vague term Bániyá, although their occupation would not debar them from intermarriage within their original caste. In order to define the term more closely, it should be remarked that it appears to connote the idea of a rather general trade, and to exclude special forms of shopkeeping, such as that of the Halwai and the Kandu. It is also more or less associated with the sale of some kind of food-grain. If a man trades in money rather than in commodities, he is commonly known by the more dignified title of mahájan, or banker. One of the variants of the word is used colloquially in Bengal as a synonym for Gandhabanik, a dealer in medicinal drugs and spices. An Anglicised form, 'banian,' is specially applied to the native brokers attached to European houses of business in Calcutta. These brokers have most of the bazar transactions in their hands, and usually give substantial security to the firm. In the early part of this century high officials used to keep banians to transact their private business; and the intrigues of "Kanto Baboo," Warren Hastings' banian, are mentioned by Burke in several of his speeches on Indian affairs.

Baniyá, a section of the Banodhié and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Banjar, a sept of Kaurs.

Banjára, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Banjárá, Banjári: the term is most usually applied to a grain and cattle merchant, who, with a more or less numerous party of the same calling, moves about to different markets, and specially accompanies bodies of troops to supply them with corn. It is specially applicable also to a numerous tribe spread along the foot of the mountains from Haridwar to Gorakhpur, and forming various subdivisions, many of whom are stationary and follow agriculture. They comprise both Hindus and Mahomedans, acknowledging a common origin and affinity. The most migratory are the Bahurupa Banjáras, of whom there are five branches, four of whom assume the well-known appellations of the chief Rajput tribes, or Rahtor, Chauhná, Powar, and Tumár. The fifth, called Barka, is said to be descended from a Gaur Brahman. Each of these is infinitely subdivided. The Rahtor branch, for instance, splits into four families, and these comprehend 138 sub-branches. Some of these Banjáras have the privileges of the Charán and Bhát, q.v., their persons being sacred and accepted in guarantee of engagements. The origin of these people is obscure. If they were primarily a distinct race, they are now much intermixed.

Banjir, a sub-caste of Bhuiyas in Hazaribagh who make baskets.

Banjor, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Bank, a sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Banni or Banihár, a ploughman or labourer, whose services are paid in kind.

Banodhiá, see Banaudhiá.

Banpar, a sub-caste of Malláhs and Gonrhis in Behar, probably of Dravidiandescent. Their original occupation seems to be that of boatmen and fishermen, but away from the big rivers they till the soil and sometimes engage in trade. They are skilful sportsmen, entrapping the alligator (magar) and gharial in strong rope nets and eating their flesh. They marry their daughters as infants or adults, according to their means. Widow-marriage is permitted, but the widow may not marry her husband's younger brother, as is usual among the lower castes of Hindus. Socially the Banpar rank low, but it is a curious circumstance that, like the Mals of Bengal, tradition ascribes their inferior position, not to their use of unclean food, but to their habit of passing the netting needle from above downwards in making nets, whereas the other fishing castes of Behar work from below upwards. Banpar is the name of a nomadic sub-caste of Goálás in Behar, whose special function it is to take charge of the large herds of cattle which are driven into Chota Nagpur, Sirgujá, Mirzápur, and other jungle-clad tracts for grazing during the hot weather. This sub-caste is also found in Nepal.

Banráhá, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalágárs in Behar.

Banreit, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Banriá, a section of Bábháns in Behar.

Bánrishi, a section of Sutra-aláhrs in Bengal.

Báns, bamboo, a totemistic sept of Lohars; a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Bansa, a sept of Hoe in Singbhum.

Bansahr, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá-Madhesia sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Bansáiín, Bausáiín, a class of Mahomedan religious mendicants, who are also weavers.

Bansaýa, a hypergamous group of Ráíhi Brahmins and Baidyás in Bengal.

Báns-aráá, a title of the Kochh caste in Northern Bengal.

Bansarí, a sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Bánebatti, a synonym for Dom in Behar.

Bánsdeo, a sept of Santás.

Bánsdih, a section of the Mag-hayá sub-caste of Barhís in Behar.

Bansetti, a sept of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur who are not permitted to touch bamboo at a wedding.

Bansil, a section of the Agar-wáí caste in Behar.

Bánshkhori, a synonym for Dom in Behar.

Bánsmáli, a synonym for Hári who work in bamboo; a sub-caste of Doms who make bamboo baskets, etc.

Bánsphor, Baspuravá, Bámábaksá, “bamboo-splitter,” a sub-caste of Pátnís in Bengal; a sub-caste of Doms in Behar who are mat and basket-makers and do not remove filth. They have nothing to do with funerals, and do not eat beef, offal, or other people’s leavings. The Bánshphors of Banka in Bhagalpur have a number of exogamous sections (pangáta), which have been entered in their proper places. Other Bánshphors on the Nepal frontier regulate their marriages by local sections (díha); while others in the town of Bhagalpur have neither pangáta nor díha. Bánshphors work with a peculiarly curved knife (katdá), with a heavy back, which they regard as characteristic of their sub-caste, and which is used by them in their domestic sacrifices.

Bánsphor-Mahili, “bamboo-splitter,” a sub-caste of Mahilís in Western Bengal, who work in bamboos.
Bansriar, a section of the Kurmis in Mânbhum, the members of which may not play the básri or bamboo flute used by the Kolarian tribes throughout Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Bánarishi, a totemistic section of Bhars in Mânbhum.

Bánswálá, a dealer in bamboo.

Banswär, a sub-caste of Rajwârs in Western Bengal.

Bánt, a section of the Játhot division of the Parbatti-Kurin sub-caste of Gourhis in Behar.

Bantar, a sub-tribe of Thârus in Behar.

Bántar, Bánt, Bator, a small Dravidian caste of Behar who make baskets and work at thatching houses. They keep and eat pigs, practise widow-marriage, and rank socially somewhat lower than Dósâdhês.

Bantari, a sub-caste of Gulgulâis in Gya and Hazaribagh.

Bantariá, a sub-caste of Kândus in Behar.

Bánhth, a sept of the Rautár sub-tribe of Thârus in Behar.

Bantiriá, a sub-caste of Hâlwaís or confectioners in Behar who have departed from the original occupation of the caste and now find employment as servants and petty shopkeepers dealing in miscellaneous articles.

Bántor, a cultivating caste of the Nepal Terai.

Banuér, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Bánukiá, a sub-caste of Doms who breed silkworms and work in silk filatures in Murshedabad and Rajahahye.

Banwar, Banwér, a small caste, probably of Dravidian descent, found in the Santál Parganas. They have no traditions of their own, and nothing seems to be known regarding their origin. The fact that they have no exogamous sections may perhaps indicate that they are an offshoot from some of the compact aboriginal tribes of the neighbourhood, who, by embracing Hinduism, cut themselves off from their parent tribe, but were not numerous enough to secure for themselves a recognised position in the caste system.

Banwârs practise both adult and infant-marriage, but sexual intercourse before marriage is strongly reprobated, and the tendency is for all persons who can afford to do so to marry their daughters as infants. Polygamy is permitted, and in theory there is no limit to the number of wives a man may have. It is rare, however, in actual life to find more than two. Divorce is permitted; the form consists in the couple expressing their wishes in the presence of their assembled relatives and tearing a sál leaf in two as a symbol of separation. Widows and divorced wives are allowed to marry again by the sanga ritual. A widow may marry her husband’s younger brother, but is not compelled to do so. She may on no account marry his elder brother.

They follow the Hindu religion, Kali and Satya Narain being the favourite objects of worship. For the worship of these deities, and for the śriddh ceremony, Brahmans are employed, who, however, do not associate on equal terms with the Brahmans who serve the higher castes.

Banwárs either burn their dead or bury them in a recumbent position. In either case the propitiatory rite of śraddha is performed, in general accordance with orthodox usage, on the thirteenth day after death. It is not, however, followed by periodical offerings for the benefit of ancestors in general, as is common among the higher castes.

The social rank of the Banwárs may best be defined by stating that the Khetauri, Perga, Bhuiya, and Rajwar will take water and sweetmeats from their hands. They stand therefore below the castes from whom Brahmans and the members of the upper castes generally can take water. Agriculture is their usual occupation; a few are found as occupancy raiyats, but the majority are under-raitys or landless day-labourers.

Banwár, a sub-caste of Ban-iyás in Behar.

Bápoli, a gáin of the Bátaya gotra of Bárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Bápoli, a gáin of the Bátaya gotra of Bárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Disposal of the dead.

Social status.

Banwér, a sub-caste of Ban-iyás in Behar.

Bápoli, a gáin of the Bátaya gotra of Bárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Bápoli, a gáin of the Bátaya gotra of Bárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Baqqál (Arabic), a grocer, chandler, grain-merchant, cloth-dealer, also generally a shopkeeper; a title of Baniyás which ordinarily has no bearing upon questions of caste.

In Eastern Bengal the term denotes a small sub-caste of Chandals, who neither eat nor intermarry with the parent stock, although their Brahman is the same. The Baqqáls are wandering traders, who retail turmeric, bay-leaves, rice, ginger, and other condiments in inland villages and markets. They are numerous in the Ja’farganj and Manikganj parganas of Dacca. They will not cultivate the soil, but, possessing cargo-boats of their own, navigate them without any hired servants. All belong to one gotra, the Kasyapa, and the majority follow the Krishna Mantra. In the belief that by engaging in trade they have attained a higher and more respectable position than the Chandáls, they have renounced the drinking of spirits and the eating of pork.

Bar, Ficus Indica, a totemistic sept or section of Kumhárs, Khariá, Goráita, Turí, Bédiyás, Chika, Oraona, Goálás, Kharwárs, Mundas, and Páns, in Chota Nagpur.

Bara, a sept of Chiká in Chota Nagpur.

Barabátia, a section of the Dhaprá sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Bara-bhág, a sub-caste of Bhuinmális and Háris in Bengal.

Barabhágiyá, a sub-caste of Kumhárs in Bengal.

Bara-Bhágiyá or Bikrampur Sánkhári, a sub-caste of Sánkháris in Eastern Bengal.

Baró-bhágiyá, a sub-caste of Muchis in Bengal.

Bárabhalá, twelve brothers whose families cannot intermarry, a sept of Chika and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Barabháiyá, a sub-caste of Suklis in Midnapur.
Barabhumia, a sub-tribe of the Bhumij in Manbhum who claim to be connected with the zamindars of pargana Barabhum. The zamindars, on the other hand, affect to be Rajputs, and disown all affinity with the Bhumij tribe.

Barabihá, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Bará-Bráhman, an ironical synonym for Agradání Brahman, q.v.

Barachain, a respectable division of the Chain caste in Behar and the North-Western Provinces, who claim to be somewhat superior to ordinary Chains. They are agriculturists, and their women prepare and sell vegetables. It is not clear that the Barachain have as yet formed themselves into an endogamous group, but they appear to be on the way to do so.

Baradái, a sub-tribe of Rajputs in Western Bengal.

Barágain, a sept of the Suryabansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Báráhake Máhto, a section of the Biyahut and Kharidahá Kalwára in Behar.

Bára-Hazár, a sub-caste of Cheros in Palamau.

Báraházári, a sub-caste of Telis and Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Bárah-Gurung, a sub-tribe of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Báráhi, a sept of the Suryabansi division of Rajputs in Behar; a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Baráhil, a zamindári servant, employed generally in the collection of rent and on the duties of a bailiff.

Barai, a synonym for Bárui.

Baráiá, Baraihiá, a sept of the Suryabans sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Barají, a synonym for Barai, q.v.

Baráik, a title (signifying great) of Jadubansi Rajputs; of Binjhias, Rautias, Chiks or Páns, and of Khandáits in Chota Nagpur.

Baráik or Chik-Baráik, a sub-caste of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Baráii, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Bárajáti, a sub-caste of Khatri in Bengal.

Baraji, Barajíbi, a synonym for Barui.

Barákar, a sub-caste of Koiris.

Bará-kharak, a section of the Pailwár sub-caste of Dosádhs in Behar.

Barál, a gáin of the Sándilya gotra of Bárohi Brahmans in Bengal; a thar of the Dhartá-Kausik gotra of Nepálí Brahmans; a title of Subarnabaniks in Bengal. In the case of the latter intermarriage is prohibited within the title, which has therefore developed into a section.

Barál, Bhariád, a title of Brahmans, said to be a corruption of Batabyád.
Barambhat, Barnabhát, Birmbhát, a sub-caste of Bháts in Behar.

Bará-mián, a term of address, originally Persian, used in speaking to an elderly and respectable or venerable person, or to the head of a village. The term is properly a Mahomedan one, and is only used by those Hindus who have come a good deal into contact with Mahomedans.

Barándiá, a section of grihasth or householding Bairágis in Chota Nagpur.

Baranwár, Baranwád, Banwár, a sub-caste of Baniyas in Behar, divided into the following sections:—Alchárá, Barbigáhíá, Báríá, Bhawániá, Dhekh, Mircháíá, Malhán, Tílíá. A man may not marry a woman of his own section or of the section to which his mother belonged before her marriage. As a woman changes her section on marriage, this rule is usually expressed by saying that the section of the maternal grandfather is excluded. Beyond the operation of the rule of exogamy, prohibited degrees are reckoned by the usual formula. Baranwárs marry their daughters as infants, forbid widows to marry again, and do not recognise divorce. Their marriage ceremony is of the standard type, with this peculiarity that pámgrahas, or the formal gift of the bride to the bridegroom, is omitted when, owing to the poverty of the bride’s parents, the wedding takes place in the bridegroom’s house. They are orthodox Hindus, usually of the Vaishnava sect, and affect to employ only Gaur Brahmans as their priests. If, however, these are not to be had, they will content themselves with members of the Maithil and Srotri groups. Baranwárs are mostly shopkeepers, and only a small proportion of them have taken to agriculture.

Barapatti, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Barar, a sub-section of the Levatiá section of Majhraut Goálás in Behar.

Bararási, a section of Tántis in Bengal.

Bara-Samáj, a sub-caste of Dhobás in Hughtli.

Barásh, a title of Tántis in Bengal.

Bara-Sudhá, a sub-caste of Sudhás in Orissa.

Barát, a title of Baidyas and Mayarás in Bengal.

Bárátába, boar, a totemistic sept of Juángs in Orissa.

Barbáiá, a pangat or section of Dosádhis in Behar.

Barbarié, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Barbattá, a section of the Tirhutiáy sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Barbigáhíá, a section of the Baranwár sub-caste of Baniyas in Behar.

Barbora, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Bárchái, a section of the Chain sub-caste of Nuniás in Behar.

Barchi, spearman, a sub-sept of the Saren sept of Santálá.
BARD.

Bard, a sept of Dhenuárs in Chota Nagpur.

Bátádá, a totemistic sept of the Bhumij tribe in Western Bengal, the members of which do not touch or eat the yam or sweet potato; a section of Korás in Chota Nagpur.

Bardadhá, a section of the Banodhiá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Bardháni, a sub-caste of Támbulis in Bengal.

Bardhan, a title of Dakshin-Ráhri and Bangaja Káyashta, and of Kaibarttas and Subarnabániks in Bengal.

Bardhá, a sub-caste of Kumhárs in Behar; also a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bardi, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Bardiá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bardiár, a section of the Amaśhta Káyasths in Behar.

Bardwáná, a group of the Kswini Tántis and Dwádas Telís in Bengal.

Bardwániyá, a sub-caste of Agúris and Sutradhárs in Western Bengal.

Báre, a section of the Kádár caste in Behar which intermarries only with the Mídáha, Kamptí, and Ráut sections.

Bárendra, Várendra, a sub-caste of Brahmanas in Bengal, who allege that their ancestors were brought by Adisur from Kanauj in order to perform certain sacrifices, the local Brahmanas having degenerated and lost their ceremonial purity. For a fuller account of the Bárendra sub-caste, see the article Brahman.

A sub-caste of Kumhárs, Tántis, Telís, Baidyas, Bárnis, Jugías, Chásádbhábas, and Káyasths in Bengal; of Kámrás in Murshedabad, who in Pabna are also called Panch Samál; of Goálás and Sunris in Bengal; of Kaibarttas in Murshedabad; of Nápits and the group of Phulkátá Mális in Bengal.

Báreya, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Bargáhá or Bargdhi, a title of Rajputs who are domestic servants of the Báfás of Chota Nagpur.

Bárgán, a mul or section of the Kanaujíá sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Bárgáir, a sept of the Suryabánsi Rajputs in Behar.

Bárgáit, one who cultivates the land on an agreement by which the cultivator engages to pay the landlord half the produce, the latter providing half the seed and paying the whole revenue.

Bárgamáet, a section of the Dhaprá and Pachainyá sub-castes of Doms in Behar.

Bárgárrí, the twelve brethren, a sept of the Chhothar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Bárgóár, Bárgwár, a sub-caste of Goálás in Behar, who are believed to have separated from the parent caste by reason of their taking service (khaucási) in the houses of the higher castes. They also keep cattle, sell milk, and cultivate land. Bárgóár rank with Kurmis, Koíris, etc., and Brahmanas can take water from their hands. They ordinarily marry their daughters as infants, adult-marriage being looked upon as exceptional and not quite respectable. Widows are allowed to marry again, but divorce is not recognised. It deserves notice that Bargoars have none of the exogamous sections so numerous among the Goálas, and regulate their marriages by the formula of prohibited degrees explained in the introductory essay.

Bar-gohri, a sub-caste of Khandáits, Rajwárs, and Rautías in Chota Nagpur.

Bargwál, the title of a class of Srotárya Brahmans who act as servants to the Maharaja of Darbhanga.

Barhá, hog, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Barhadagiá, a section of Goálas in Behar.

Barhai, a synonym for Barhi.

Barharnbiá, a section of Bábhans in Behár.

Barhampurái-Barhampur, a mul of the Gautam section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Barhampuriá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Barhari, a section of the Karan sub-caste of Káyaesths in Behar.

Barháriá, a sub-caste of Telis in Behar.

Barhariá ke pánre, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Barharcóa, a wild fruit, a sept of Telis in Chota Nagpur.

Barghi, Barhai, the carpenter caste of Behar, claiming descent from the celestial architect and artificer Visvakarmá. The word barhi seems to be a corruption of the Sanskrit Badhik, from bardhí, 'to bore,' and the caste may probably be regarded as a functional group composed of members of several intermediate castes, who have been drawn together by the attraction of a common occupation.

The Barhís of Behar are divided into six sub-castes, as shown in Appendix I, the members of which do not intermarry. I cannot ascertain the precise basis of these divisions. According to some, the distinction between the Kanaujía and Maghayá depends on the former working in wood only and the latter in both wood and iron; while others say that the Maghayá are house-carpenters and work on a larger and coarser scale than the Kanaujía, who are turners, cabinet-makers, and the like. Again, the Lohar sub-caste in Bhágalpur work only in iron, but disclaim all connexion with the Lohárs, whom they regard as people of a different race. The Kamar-Kalla sub-caste have no settled homes, but wander about, exhibiting marionettes (kát-púti) and doing odd jobs like gypsies. Their sections (mul or dih) are mostly of the territorial type, but a few of the Brahmanical gotrus have been borrowed of late years. Usually the prohibition of intermarriage extends only to women belonging to a man's own mul, and the rule is supplemented by the standard formula of degrees; but among Maghayá Barhis seven, or according to some accounts nine, multis are excluded. In the same sub-caste we also find the hypergamous divisions Thákur, Rái, and Kuar. The Thákur can take wives from the other two groups as well as their own, but will not give their daughters to men of a lower group. So also a man of the Rai group will marry a Kuar woman, while a man of the Kuar group cannot aspire to marry a Rai woman. Wherever the custom of hypergamy prevails, the preponderance of women in the higher groups and the consequent demand for husbands have necessarily led to the introduction of infant-marriage, which, again, has spread by imitation. Among the Maghayá Barhis of Darbhanga girls are married between the ages of three and five; and so firmly has the fashion established itself, that it is difficult to find a husband for a girl who is more than five years old.

Adult-marriage, however, is not entirely unknown among the other sub-castes, although all aver that infant-marriage is the rule. The marriage ceremony differs little from the standard form for middle-class Hindus in Behar, which has been described by Mr. Grierson in Behar Peasant Life, pages 362–73, except that instead of the parents of the parties exchanging paddy (dhánbatti) when the marriage has been agreed upon, they exchange betel-nut. This ceremony is called pánbatti. Polygamy is permitted in the event of the first wife being barren or suffering from some serious physical defect. A widow may marry again by the sugaí form. Although such marriages are supposed to be arranged entirely by the parents of the widow, she appears to have some liberty of choice in the matter, and may marry any one outside the prohibited degrees. As is the case with other castes, it often happens that she marries her deceased husband's younger brother; and this is considered a proper thing to do, but no special pressure appears to be exercised in order to compel her to do so. Divorce is effected with the sanction of the caste council (panchayat) on the complaint of the husband in case of adultery, or on the application of both husband and wife on the ground of inability to agree. Divorced women may marry again by the sugaí form. This privilege, however, does not extend to a woman taken in adultery with a man of another caste. In that case no question of formal divorce arises; she is simply turned out of the caste, and usually ends by becoming a regular prostitute.

The religion of the Barhis is simply the average Hinduism of the middle classes of Behar, and calls for no special remark. The caste employ Tírhubtí Brahmans for the worship of the greater gods, and these Brahmans are not held to incur any social degradation by performing these functions. Their special god is Viśvákarma, who is worshipped once a year, on the seventh of Sráwan, and when a son is apprenticed to the trade. On these occasions homage is done to the tools of the craft,—the adze (bástala), chisel (rukhám), and saw (ára), and a goat whose right ear has been slit, and a new waist-cloth, are offered to the god and afterwards presented to a Brahman. In addition to Bandi, Goriya, the Páñch Pír, and the other village gods common in Behar, Barhis also offer sweetmeats and ganja to Ugrí Maháráj, a sort of patron saint, whose origin and functions I have not been able to ascertain. They also worship the standard yard (káni or gaj).
In point of social standing Barhis rank with Gosálas, Hajams, Koiris, etc., and Brahmans will take water from their hands. Their practice in the matter of diet does not differ from that of other orthodox Hindus of the same class. They will smoke with Lohars. They believe carpentry to be their original occupation, but outside the larger towns many of them are now engaged in agriculture, and hold lands as occupancy and non-occupancy raiyats.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Barhis in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Districts</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>Districts</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>22,050</td>
<td>24,583</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>3,466</td>
<td>3,827</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>35,701</td>
<td>35,189</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>17,184</td>
<td>16,149</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>15,065</td>
<td>14,702</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>9,675</td>
<td>11,509</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary (Barhias)</td>
<td>30,730</td>
<td>30,343</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>4,976</td>
<td>7,356</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>16,714</td>
<td>16,623</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>4,946</td>
<td>5,728</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>6,745</td>
<td>6,114</td>
<td>Bazarbagh</td>
<td>16,100</td>
<td>24,070</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monohar</td>
<td>39,132</td>
<td>20,835</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>6,566</td>
<td>11,747</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhaesulpur</td>
<td>4,636</td>
<td>9,733</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>948</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>15,703</td>
<td>14,533</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,077</td>
<td>1,112</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Barhi, a section of the Sátamulía Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Barhi, a territorial section of Barhis in Behar.

Bári, a small caste of Behar, who are supposed to have come from the North-West Provinces or Oude. They are employed as makers of the leaf-platters (doná, khoná, khadoná, pattai, patri, patta, patravá, pannárá) used at Hindu entertainments and festivals. They also make and carry torches, and sometimes sell betel-leaves. Their social rank is about the same as that of the Hajjam. Mr. Nesfield regards the Bári as “merely an offshoot from the semi-savage tribes known as Banménush and Musahar. He still associates with them at times; and if the demand for plates and cups (owing to some temporary cause, such as a local fair or an unusual multitude of marriages) happens to become larger than he can at once supply, he gets them secretly made by his ruder kinsfolk and retails them at a higher rate, passing them off as his own production.” If this view is correct, the Bári are a branch of a non-Aryan tribe who have been given a fairly respectable position in the Hindu system in consequence of the demand for leaf-plates, which are largely used by the highest as well as by the lowest castes. Instances of this sort, in which a non-Aryan or mixed group is promoted on grounds of necessity or convenience to a higher status than their antecedents would entitle them to claim, are not unknown in other castes, and must have occurred frequently in outlying parts of the country, where the Aryan settlements were scanty and imperfectly supplied with the social apparatus demanded by the theory of ceremonial purity. Thus the undoubtedly non-Aryan Bhuiyas have in parts of Chota Nagpur been recognised as jal-acharani; and it may be conjectured that the Kahars themselves only attained this privilege in virtue of their employment as palanquin-bearers. Of course in any case there is no breach of continuity and nothing resembling the sudden elevation of a social group. But a gradual upheaval takes place; the social levels are altered, and the fiction is maintained that things have been so all along.

1 Behar Peasant Life, p. 721.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Bari caste in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>958</td>
<td>661</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>1,343</td>
<td>3,190</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Simlabad</td>
<td>4,609</td>
<td>5,234</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tirhut (Darbhanga)</td>
<td>2,528</td>
<td>3,522</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baran</td>
<td>8,044</td>
<td>4,321</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>3,040</td>
<td>3,386</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>1,958</td>
<td>1,010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>365</td>
<td>571</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>2,428</td>
<td>333</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>118</td>
<td>133</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribaug</td>
<td>2,483</td>
<td>2,069</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>422</td>
<td>194</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>141</td>
<td>388</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>83</td>
<td>388</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bariswár, a section of the Baranwár sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Barīarō, a sept of Tántis in Chota Nagpur.

Bārīk, a pangat or section of Dosádhás in Behar; a section of the Kádar caste in Behar which intermarries with the Kápar, Márík, Darbe, Mánjhi, Hazári, Naiyá, and Kamptí sections, but not with the Mandar, Mírdáha, Ráut, and Báro; a section of Maghayá Kumhárás in Behar. A title of Goálás, Kaibarttas and Nápits in Bengal, and of Bhandárís in Oríssa.

Bariswár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Báriya, a knife-grinder, razor-setter, etc.

Barjo, name of ancestor's village, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Barjoki, fig-tree roots, a totemistic sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Barkádeswári, a sub-caste of Kharwárs, who are also called Deswári; it is contradistinguished from Chotka Deswári.

Barkandás (p. bark, 'lightning,' and andád, 'who casts'), properly a matchlock-man, but commonly an armed retainer, an armed unmounted employé of a civil department. The term was especially used to denote the old zemindari police, and jail warders at the present day are often spoken as barkandás.

Barki-dángi, a sub-caste of Koirís in Behar who do not permit widows to remarry.

Barla, Ficus Indica, a totemistic sept of Nágéswars and Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Bárlá, a section of Khariás in Chota Nagpur.

Barlos, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Barrná, a title of Dakshin-Ráhi and Bangaja Káysths.
Barmait, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Barman, (i) “wearer of armour,” a title of Rajputs, Khatrias, and Káyasths; (ii) a native of Burma.

Barmosiá, a section of the Kasarwáni sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Barna or Patita Brahman, a sub-caste, or rather an aggregate of sub-castes, of Brahmins in Bengal, formed of as many endogamous groups as there are numbers of Hindu Sudra castes, whom they serve as priests.

Barnait, a section of Bábhans and of the Magháyá sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Barna-Kul, a sub-caste of Tántís in Bengal.

Barnakule, a sub-caste of Sunris in Western Bengal, who are vegetable-sellers.

Barnár, a sept of the Chandrabansi division of Rajputs in Behar.

Barnasankar (Sansk. barna, ‘caste,’ and sankar, ‘mixed’), a mixed caste, properly the designation of the large class of castes supposed to have been formed by intermarriage between members of the four original castes. The term is also used to denote the offspring of illicit intercourse between members of different castes, and bears the same meaning as Bidura, Chhokar, Doglá or Dográ, Járág, Krishnapakshi, Málzadá, Ságarpeshá, and Šurathwala.

Barna-sil, a title of barbers who shave the Chandáls in Eastern Bengal.

Barna Sreni, an indefinite term, probably denoting either members of the barna sankar, mixed castes, or the Brahmins, colloquially known as Barna-Brahmans, who serve those castes.

Barni, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Barnió, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Barnawár, Barnwár, Banwár, a sub-caste of Baniyás engaged in trade, agriculture, and service in Behar. They abstain from spirits and forbid widows to marry again.

Baroá, a sept of Khariás and Asuras in Chota Nagpur.

Baroár, a section of Goráits in Chota Nagpur.

Baroha, a sept of Lohars in Chota Nagpur.

Barpái, a sept of Hos in Chota Nagpur.

Barpárá, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Barpaserá, a section of the Banodhíá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Barphungpuso, a sept of Lepchas in Darjiling.

Barra, a section of Newars in Darjiling.

Barsái, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmins in Behar.

Barsam, a section of the Majraut sub-caste of Gosálás in Behar holding the title of Marar, whose profession is to make curd.

Barthoár, a section of Awa-dhiá Hajáma in Behar.
BARUA.

Barua, a mixed caste in Chttargong who are descendants of Magh fathers and Bengali mothers.

Barua, (i) a title of certain castes in Assam; (ii) a title of village headmen exercising police functions in Midnapur and Orissa; (iii) a group of the Aswini Tantis in Bengal.

Baruar, a section of the Bijya-hut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Barui, “Barai,” the names of the two castes engaged in Bengal and Behar, respectively, in the cultivation of piper betel, ordinarily known as pán (Sansk. parna), the leaf par excellence. Although their occupation is the same, provincial and linguistic distinctions separate the Bengali-speaking Barui of Bengal and the Hindi-speaking Barai of Behar into two entirely distinct castes, who do not intermarry or eat together, and whose domestic usages differ in important particulars. They will therefore be separately treated here.

Regarding the origin of the Baruis of Bengal several traditions are current. The popular legend represents them as specially created by Brahma in order to relieve the Brahmins from the labour of growing betel, which was found to interfere with their religious duties. The Jati-Malá makes them the offspring of a Tanti woman by a man of the Goála caste, while the Brihadáháma Purana describes their father as a Brahman and their mother as a Sudra. Other traditions assign to them a Kshatriya or Kayasth father and a Sudra mother. At the present day the Baruis are divided into four endogamous sub-castes:—(1) Rári, (2) Bërendra, (3) Náthán, (4) Kotá. Within these again we find a number of the standard Brahmanical gotras. The latter groups, however, appear to be mainly ornamental, for marriage in most places is allowed with persons belonging to the same gotra, provided they are not Samanadakas. As the fact of their belonging to this class would in any case have been a conclusive bar to marriage, it follows that the sections are exogamous only in theory, and we may assume that they were borrowed dignitäts causā from the system of the higher castes. It may further be surmised that the Barui caste is made up of members of various respectable castes, who were drawn together by the common occupation of betel-growing, and is not, as many castes undoubtedly are, a homogeneous offshoot from a single caste or tribe. The contradictory character of the legends regarding its origin, in which several different castes figure, tends on the whole to bear out this view.

Baruis marry their daughters as infants, forbid widows to marry again, and do not allow divorce. Polygamy is admitted only in the sense that a man may marry a second wife when the first proves barren. Hypergamy is unknown, and a bride-price is paid to the parents of the bride. Certain families enjoy the hereditary rank of Gostipati, or head of a clique or party within the caste; but this involves no restrictions on marriage, and the members of such families give their daughters in marriage to ordinary Baruis. The marriage ceremony of the Baráui differs little from that in use among Brahmans, except that the rite of Kusandiká is not always insisted upon. After the gift and acceptance of the bride, the bridegroom stands behind her, and, taking her hands in his, lifts an earthen vessel containing parched paddy, ghee, plantains, and betel leaves, and pours the contents on a fire kindled with straw. The couple then make obeisance to Agni, and the ceremony is held to be complete.

In matters of religion the Báruiis follow the usages of all orthodox Hindus. Most of them belong to the Sákt sect, and a few are Vaishnavas. Saivism is said to be unknown among them. For all the standard offices of religion they employ Brahmans, who stand on an equal footing with the Brahmans who serve the other members of the Navaásk group. In some places they have also special ceremonies of their own. On the 4th of Baisakh (April–May) the patroness of betel cultivation is worshipped in some places in Bengal with offerings of flowers, rice, sweetmeats, and sandal-wood paste. Along the banks of the Lakhya in Eastern Bengal the Báruiis celebrate, without a Brahman, the Navami Puja in honour of Ushas (Hós, Aurora) on the ninth of the waxing moon in Asin (September–October). Plantains, sugar, rice, and sweetmeats are placed in the centre of the pán garden, from which the worshippers retire, but after a little return, and, carrying out the offerings, distribute them among the village children. In Bikrampur the deity invoked on the above date is Sungái, one of the many forms of Bhagabati. The reason given by the Báruiis for not engaging the services of a Brahman is the following:—A Brahman was the first cultivator of the betel. Through neglect the plant grew so high that he used his sacred thread to fasten up its tendrils, but as it still shot up faster than he could supply thread, its charge was given to a Káyasth. Hence it is that a Brahman cannot enter a pán garden without defilement. Hence it is that a Brahman cannot enter a pán garden without defilement.

At the present day some Báruiis have taken to trade, while others are found in Government service or as members of the learned professions. The bulk of the caste, however, follow their traditional occupation. Betel cultivation is a highly specialised business, demanding considerable knowledge and extreme care to rear so delicate a plant. The pán garden (bara, baró) is regarded, says Dr. Wise, as an almost sacred spot. Its greatest length is always north and south, while the entrances must be east and west. The enclosure, generally eight feet high, is supported by hijul (Sansk. ijjala, Barringtonia acutangula) trees or betel-nut palms. The former are cut down periodically, but the palms are allowed to grow, as they cast little shade and add materially to the profits of the garden. The sides are closely matted with reeds, jute stalks, or leaves of the date or Palmyra palm, while nal grass is often grown outside to protect the interior from wind and the sun’s rays. The top is not so carefully covered in, wisps of grass being merely tied along the trellis work over the plants. A sloping footpath leads down the centre of the enclosure, towards which the furrows between the plants trend, and serves to drain off rain as it falls, it being essential for the healthy growth of the plant that the ground be kept dry.
The pān plant is propagated by cuttings, and the only manures used are pāk-mati, or decomposed vegetable mould excavated from tanks, and khādi, the refuse of oil-mills. The plant being a fast growing one, its shoots are loosely tied with grass to upright poles, while thrice a year it is drawn down and coiled at the root. As a low temperature injures the plant by discolouring the leaves, special care must be taken during the cold season that the enclosure and its valuable contents are properly sheltered. Against vermin no trouble is required, as caterpillars and insects avoid the plant on account of its pungency. Weeds are carefully eradicated, but certain culinary vegetables, such as pepper, varieties of pumpkins, and cucumbers, pālwa (Trichosanthes dioeca), and bağun (egg-plant, Solanum melongena), are permitted to be grown. Pān leaves are plucked throughout the year, but in July and August are most abundant, and therefore cheapest; while a garden, if properly looked after, continues productive from five to ten years. Four pān leaves make one ganda, and the bīra, or measure by which they are sold, now-a-days contains in Eastern Bengal twenty gandas, although formerly it contained twenty-four. In the Bhāti country (Bakarganj), thirty-six gandas go to the bīra. Pān leaves are never retailed by the Bāruis himself, but are sold wholesale to agents (paikārs), or directly to the pān-sellers.

The varieties of the piper betel are numerous, but it is probable that in different districts distinct names are given to the same species. The kafūri or camphor-scented pān, allowed by all natives to be the most delicately flavoured, is only grown at Sunārgaon in Dacca and Mandalghāt in Midnapur for export to Calcutta, where it fetches a fancy price. The next best is the sānchi, which often sells for four annas a bīra. This is of a pale green colour, and if kept for a fortnight loses in pungency and gains flavour. The commoner sorts are the deśi, bangalu, bhātīl, dhālōggas, ghās pān, grown best in Bakarganj, and a very large-leaved variety called bastā. The usual market price of the inferior kinds is from one to two pice a bīra.

It has been mentioned that the bāra is regarded as almost sacred, and the superstitious practices in vogue resemble those of the silk-worm breeder. The Bāruis will not enter it until he has bathed and washed his clothes, while the low-caste man employed in digging is required to bathe before he commences work. Animals found inside are driven out, while women ceremonially unclean dare not enter within the gate. A Brahman never sets foot inside, and old men have a prejudice against entering it. It has, however, been known to be used for assignations. At the present day individuals belonging to the Dhobā, Chandāl, Kaibartta, Sunri, and many higher and lower castes, as well as Muhammadans, manage pān gardens, but they omit the ceremonies necessary for preserving the bāra clean and unpolluted.

The social standing of the Bāruis is sufficiently defined by stating that they belong to the Nabasāk. They eat goats, deer, pigeons, fish, and the leavings of Brahmans, and drink country spirits. They will drink with BARUI.

Kaibarttas, and smoke in their company, but will not use the same hookah. In respect of their relations to the land their position is fairly high. Some have risen to be zamindars, others are tenure-holders or substantial occupancy raiyats. Instances of their having come to be day-labourers or nomadic cultivators are so rare as to be practically unknown.

The following statement shows the numbers and distribution of the Béruis in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>11,028</td>
<td>3,000</td>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>671</td>
<td>355</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>978</td>
<td>2,748</td>
<td>Pauna</td>
<td>2,277</td>
<td>2,104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>3,968</td>
<td>9,069</td>
<td>Darijung</td>
<td>543</td>
<td>319</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>7,001</td>
<td>5,945</td>
<td>Jalipur</td>
<td>485</td>
<td>377</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>7,406</td>
<td>5,827</td>
<td>Koch Behar</td>
<td>1,166</td>
<td>1,106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>4,210</td>
<td>5,333</td>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>15,031</td>
<td>17,584</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24 Puranas</td>
<td>9,021</td>
<td>8,782</td>
<td>Patipur</td>
<td>8,337</td>
<td>9,357</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>4,276</td>
<td>3,393</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>14,463</td>
<td>9,401</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>16,794</td>
<td>9,412</td>
<td>Maimansing</td>
<td>6,435</td>
<td>5,440</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>3,683</td>
<td>5,014</td>
<td>Nokhali</td>
<td>5,482</td>
<td>2,877</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinepur</td>
<td>2,860</td>
<td>1,370</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>9,085</td>
<td>6,904</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bajalabye</td>
<td>410</td>
<td>410</td>
<td>Hill Tracts of Chittagong</td>
<td>626</td>
<td>626</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bangpur</td>
<td>1,374</td>
<td>1,415</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Barai of Behar bear the title Raut, and are divided into the following sub-castes:—(1) Maghayá, (2) Jaiswár, (3) Chaurasia, (4) Semeryá, (5) Sokhwé. They have only two sections, Káisyapa and Nág, and regulate their marriages by the formula of prohibited degrees already quoted. Marriage is both infant and adult, the former being deemed more respectable. Widow-marriage is permitted by the sagari form. The widow may marry her late husband's younger brother, but is not compelled to do so. If, however, she marries an outsider, she forfeits all claim to share in her deceased husband's property, and the custody of her children usually rests with his family. A man may marry two wives, but not more. Divorce is not recognised: indiscretions within the caste are winked at; but a woman who goes wrong with an outsider is turned out of the caste, and probably ends by becoming a regular prostitute. It will be observed that the practice of widow-marriage and the recognition of adult-marriage for females sharply distinguish the Barai from the Béruis, and are sufficient of themselves to form a conclusive bar to intermarriage between the two groups. Curiously enough, the standard tradition regarding the origin of the Barai alleges that they were formerly Brahmans, who were turned out of the sacred caste because they allowed widows to marry again.

Most Barais are Hindus of the Saktasect. Their minor gods are Mahábirí (Hmanumán), Bandi, Goraiyá and Sokhá. The last mentioned is held in special reverence and awe, and it is believed that when his worship is neglected great disasters come upon the pán garden. Maithíl, Kanojíá, and Srotí Brahmans are employed by the Barai in the worship of the greater gods; the di minores being usually propitiated by the members of the family without the intervention of Brahmans.

Betel cultivation is the main business of the Barai, to which they add the preparation of lime and khair or kath, an astringent extract from the wood of several species of acacia (Acacia catechu, Willd., the khair; Acacia suma, Kurz, acundra, D.C., and probably more). For a description of the methods of betel-growing followed in Behar, I may refer to Grierson's Behar Peasant Life, pages 248-49. The statement on page 249, that "the betel-nut, which is the fruit of the areca catechu, is called supāri or *so pāri," was corrected by extracts from Colonel Yule's Glossary put the matter in a clear light:

"Betel, s. The leaf of the piper betel, L., chewed with the dried areca-nut (which is hence improperly called betel-nut, a mistake as old as Fryer—1673—see page 40), chunam, etc., by the natives of India and the Indo-Chinese countries. The word is Malayāl. vettila, i.e. veru + ila = 'simple or mere leaf,' and comes to us through the Port. betre and bete."

"Pawn, s. The betel-leaf. Hind. pan, from the Sansk. parna, 'a leaf.' It is a North-Indian term, and is generally used for the combination of betel, areca-nut, lime, etc., which is politely offered (along with otto of rose) to visitors, and which intimates the termination of the visit. This is more fully termed pawn-sooparie (supāri is Hind. for areca)."

"Areca, s. The seed (in common parlance the nut) of the palm, Areca catechu. L., commonly, though somewhat improperly, called 'betel-nut'; the term betel (q.v.) belonging in reality to the leaf, which is chewed along with the areca. Though so widely cultivated, the palm is unknown in a truly indigenous state. The word is Malayāl. adakka, and comes to us through the Portuguese."

In Beames' edition of Elliot's Glossary, vol. ii, p. 231 s.v. Bīrā, the ingredients of pañ-supāri are stated, on the authority of the Kānun-i-Islām, to be "betel leaves, areca or betel-nut, catechu, quick-lime, aniseed, coriander seed, cardamoms, and cloves."

Barais rank with the ācharani castes of Behar, and Brahmans can take water and sweetmeats from their hands. Their diet is that of the average orthodox Hindu. Unlike the Bārui of Bengal, they will not eat the leavings of Brahmans, nor will they drink spirituous liquors. The Bārhi and Lohār are the lowest castes from whom a Barai will take water or sweetmeats. Cooked food, of course, they will only eat with people of their own caste and sub-caste. As regards their agricultural position, few of them appear to have risen above the status of occupancy raiyaṭ.

The following table gives the number and distribution of the Barais and Tāmbulis or Tāmolis in 1872 and 1881. In the former year the figures of both castes are included, and in the latter they

---

1 Yule's Glossary, s.v. Catechu. are shown separately, so that absolutely accurate statistics cannot be prepared:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872 Barai</th>
<th>1872 Tamoli</th>
<th>1881 Barai</th>
<th>1881 Tamoli</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>8,075</td>
<td>4,431</td>
<td>5,024</td>
<td>3,186</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>3,141</td>
<td>2,923</td>
<td>2,930</td>
<td>2,188</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shashbad</td>
<td>7,139</td>
<td>2,573</td>
<td>4,416</td>
<td>4,156</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tirhut</td>
<td>73,014</td>
<td>17,554</td>
<td>37,425</td>
<td>33,424</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>9,605</td>
<td>7,324</td>
<td>6,800</td>
<td>5,242</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>9,714</td>
<td>10,665</td>
<td>1,031</td>
<td>819</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munshiyar</td>
<td>16,465</td>
<td>14,057</td>
<td>5,017</td>
<td>5,017</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>7,375</td>
<td>6,521</td>
<td>3,131</td>
<td>2,828</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purniah</td>
<td>8,279</td>
<td>8,028</td>
<td>2,494</td>
<td>2,345</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maidah</td>
<td>3,556</td>
<td>1,844</td>
<td>423</td>
<td>342</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>7,359</td>
<td>3,186</td>
<td>3,186</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cut teas</td>
<td>4,016</td>
<td>4,016</td>
<td>4,016</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>1,002</td>
<td>274</td>
<td>274</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baisore</td>
<td>7,135</td>
<td>3,183</td>
<td>3,183</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>1,521</td>
<td>229</td>
<td>229</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Basaribag</td>
<td>1,273</td>
<td>1,273</td>
<td>1,273</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>4,416</td>
<td>1,273</td>
<td>1,273</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sukhbum</td>
<td>500</td>
<td>500</td>
<td>500</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>13,610</td>
<td>7,500</td>
<td>7,500</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>118</td>
<td>118</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Barui, a section of Bais Sonars in Behar.

Barukandal, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur who cannot touch the kusum-tree.

Barunda, a big frog, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Barupendil, kusum-tree, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Baruwa, a sept of Chakmas in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Barwa, small cocoon, a totemistic sept of Mundas and Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Barwáik, a title of Thárus in Champaran.

Barwá, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar; a sub-sept of the Hansda sept of Santal; a section of Rájputs in Behar.

Basa, a tree, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Basáithi, a mul or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Gaoliás in Behar.

Bábar, a muk or section of the Naomulía or Majraut sub-caste of Gaolás in Behar.

Básáriá, a mul or section of the Tinmulía Madhesia and Bhojpuria sub-castes of Halwáis in Behar.

Basaroar, a small hawk, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Basbáit, Baswait, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bás-baniya, a dealer in fragrant articles, a perfumer.

Básbaria, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Básdebpur, a section of Bhojpuria Halwáis in Behar.

Báshariá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Basahe, a mul of the Garg section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bási, a title of Tántis in Bengal.
Basari, a synonym for Vaisya, q.v.

Basiniá, the headman of a village in Rangpur.

Basishtha, a gotra or section of Brahmans, Baidyas, and Káyasthas in Bengal, and of Sudras in Eastern Bengal.

Básáki, a sept of Santás.

Basnait, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Básíá, a sept of Asures in Chota Nagpur.

Bastibaroná, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Basu, a titular adjunct to names borne by the Dakshin-Rérhi and Bangaja families of Káyasthas or writer caste in Bengal, commonly pronounced as Bose; a sub-section of the Bharadwája section of Utkal Brahmans.

Basuári, a gain of the Sándilya gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Básudeo, an eponymous section of Rautíás in Chota Nagpur.

Básuki, a section of Brahmans and of Káyasthas in Bengal.

Basauná, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Western Bengal.

Básundár, a section of the Biyálut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Baswariá, a section of Kámárs in Chota Nagpur.

Bétke, a labourer in the salt works of Orissa, an assistant malangi.

Batkuar, a bird, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.
Bátor, a section of Madhesia Halwais in Behar.

Bat-rassi, a rope-maker, chiefly of the Kahar or Mallah castes, who make twine and rope from munj, san, káns, and háthi chingår.

Batsagrámi, a gāin of the Bátzya gotra of Bárendra Brahmins in Bengal.

Batsas, a section of the Srotriya sub-caste of Utkal Brahmins in Orissa.

Batsauriar, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmins in Behar.

Bátsil, a gotra or section of Agarwáls.

Bátsa, Bátsya, a gotra or section of Brahmins, Baidyas, Báruis, Káyasths, and Tántis in Bengal; and of Maithil Brahmins, Bábhans, Khatris and Rajputs in Behar.

Bátor, a cultivating, earth-working, and palanquin-bearing caste of Western Bengal, whose features and complexion stamp them as of non-Aryan descent, although evidence is wanting to affiliate them to any particular tribe now in existence. Their meagre folk-lore throws no light on their origin. According to one story they were degraded for attempting to steal food from the banquet of the gods; another professes to trace them back to a mythical ancestor named Bákak Rishi (the bearer of burdens), and tells how, while returning from a marriage procession, they sold the palanquin they had been hired to carry, got drunk on the proceeds, and assaulted their guru, who cursed them for the sacrilege, and condemned them to rank thenceforward among the lowest castes of the community. Another name of this ancestor is Rik Muni, the same as the eponym of the Musahars or Bhuiyás, but it would be straining conjecture to infer from this any connexion between the Bauris and the Bhuiyas.

The Bauris are divided into the following nine sub-castes:—

1. Mallabhumiá, 2. Síkhariá or Gobáría,
3. Panchakoti, 4. Molá or Mulo, 5. Dhumlá or Dhulo, 6. Malúá or Mátúá, 7. Jhátiá or Jhétia, 8. Káthuriá, 9. Páthuriá. Some of these may perhaps be nothing more than different local names for what was originally the same sub-caste, but this point is not really very material, by reason of the marked reluctance of the lower castes to intermarry families living at a distance. Assuming, for example, that Mola or Mulo and Malla-bhumia, two sub-castes of Bauris found in the 24-Parganas and Murshedabad, are really the same as the Malua or Malu sub-caste common in Manbhum, it would by no means follow that the eastern and western members of this sub-caste would be willing to intermarry. And if there were no intermarriage, the groups would rightly be treated as true sub-castes. On the whole therefore, in spite of the suspicious similarity of some of the names, I incline to think that the nine groups enumerated above are really distinct at the present day, whatever may have been the case some generations back. As for the origin of the sub-castes, the names Mallabhumia, Malua, and perhaps Molá, denote a group originally resident in pargannah Manbhum or in the country south of the Kasái; the Dhuliá sub-caste is supposed to have come from Dhalbhüm; and the Sikharíá from Sikharbhum, the tract between the Kasái and Barákar rivers, which includes the Pachete estate. Panchakoti again denotes the central portion of the Pachete estate. Gobariá is said to refer to a domestic custom of cleaning up the remnants of meals with cowdung, which has somehow come to be deemed a characteristic of the Sikharíá sub-caste; while Jhátiá is explained as denoting a group who simply sweep away the fragments of a meal without washing the place where it had been spread.

The few exogamous subdivisions which we find among the Bauris have clearly been borrowed significatis coads from the higher castes, and are inoperative for matrimonial purposes, as marriage between members of the same gotra is not forbidden. They profess to observe the standard formula mamaera, chacherá, etc., and in addition to prohibit marriage between persons descended from the same ancestors within seven degrees on the male and three degrees on the female side; but the caste is extremely illiterate: there is no machinery among them for maintaining genealogies, and thus guarding against consanguineous marriages, and in actual practice such marriages are believed to be far from uncommon.

The absence of compact exogamous groups, such as we find among tribes apparently closely akin to the Bauris, may possibly be due to the latter having adopted the profession of palanquin-bearing, and thus having been brought into closer contact with Hindus than was the case with their more independent congeners. Traces of totemism, however, still survive in their reverence for the red-backed heron and the dog, and perhaps in their strong objection to touching horse-dung. The heron is looked upon as the emblem of the tribe, and may not be killed or molested on pain of expulsion from the caste. Dogs also are sacred. A Bauri will on no account kill a dog or touch a dead dog's body, and the water of a tank in which a dog has been drowned cannot be used until an entire rainy season has washed the impurity away. "In regard to dogs," says Colonel Dalton, "I was gravely informed by some of their elders that as they killed and ate cows and most other animals, they deemed it right to fix on some beast which should be as sacred to them as the cow to the Brahmán, and they selected... the dog, because it was a useful animal while alive, and not very nice to eat when dead—a neat reconciliation of the twinges of conscience and cravings of appetite.” This ingenious explanation, however valueless in itself, shows that their own customs had become unintelligible to the Bauris themselves, and serves to illustrate the tendency to imitate Brahmanical usages.

Like the Bégdis, Bauris admit into their caste members of any caste higher than themselves in social standing.

Admission of outsiders.

No regular ceremony is appointed for such occasions: the new member merely pays to the caste panchâyat a sum of money, varying from Rs. 10 to Rs. 15, to be spent on a feast, in which for the first time he openly eats with his adopted caste brethren. The origin of this singular practice, which is entirely out of accord with the spirit of the caste system at the present day, is apparently to be sought in the lax views of the Bauris and Bégdis on the subject of sexual morality. In every other caste a woman who has an intrigue with an outsider is punished by expulsion from the caste; but Bégdis and Bauris not only allow their women to live openly with men of other castes, but receive those men into their own community when, as frequently happens, they are outcasted by their own people for eating rice cooked by their mistresses.

Marriage among the Bauris is either infant or adult, the tendency being for those who can afford it to marry their daughters as infants. Polygamy is permitted: a man is allowed to have as many wives as he can afford to maintain. Widows may marry again, and are usually expected to marry their deceased husband’s younger brother. No ceremony is gone through; the bridegroom pays Re. 1-4 to the bride’s father, and gives a feast to the members of the caste. Divorce is recognised. It is effected by the husband taking away from his wife the iron ring which every married woman wears, and proclaiming to the pāramāṇik and panchâyat the fact of his having divorced her. In some districts a wife may divorce her husband for ill-treatment, desertion, or adultery. Divorced wives may always marry again. The marriage ceremony in use among the Bauris of Western Bengal differs little from that of the Bégdis, except that there is no pool of water in the middle of the marriage bower, and the bride sits on the left of the bridegroom instead of facing him. In districts further east an attempt is made to follow the standard Hindu ritual, and the interchange of garlands is held to be the binding portion of the procedure.

Bauris profess to be Hindus of the Sākta sect, but in Western Bengal, at any rate, their connexion with Hinduism is of the slenderest kind, and their favourite objects of worship are Mansā, Bhádu, Mánásingh, Barpahári, Dharmaráj, and Kudrasiní. The cult of the two former deities has been described in the article on the Bagdis. Goats are sacrificed to Mánásingh, and fowls to Barpahári, which is merely another name for the “great mountain” (Marang Burn) of the Santals. Pigs, fowls, rice, sugar, and ghee are offered to Kudrasini on Saturdays and Sundays at the ákhra or dancing place of the village through the medium of a Bauri priest, who abstains from flesh or fish on the day preceding the sacrifice. The priest gets as his fee the fowls that are offered and the head or leg of the pig; the worshippers eat the rest. It should be mentioned here that in Western Bengal Bauris have not yet attained to the dignity of having Brahmins of their own. Their priests are men of their own caste, termed Lává or Deghariá, some of whom hold táyáli land rent-free or at a nominal rent as remuneration for their services. The headman of the village (pardámanít) may also officiate as priest. The Bauris of Eastern Bengal employ a low class of Barna Brahmins. Káli and Visvakarma are their favourite deities. In most districts Bauris have adopted the Hindu practice of burning their dead; but in Bankura corpses are buried with the head to the north and face downward, the object of this attitude being to prevent the spirit from getting out and giving trouble to the living. A rude funeral ceremony is performed on the eleventh day after death, when the relations feast together and the nearest relative of the deceased has his head shaved.

Agricultural labour and palanquin-bearing are supposed to be the original occupations of the caste, and this tradition corresponds pretty closely to the facts as we now find them. They work also as wood-cutters and masons, and in Bardwan a few have risen to be traders and money-lenders. In some respects they are more particular than would be expected, considering the low social position they hold. A Bauri who takes to curing leather, works as a syce, or keeps a liquor-shop, is turned out of the caste. Comparatively few Bauris are raiyats with occupancy rights, but the majority may probably be put down as under-raiyats or landless day-labourers. They were well known as indigo-cultivators and workers in the vats in the prosperous days of Bengal indigo, and nomadic tillage of char lands is one of their characteristic pursuits. In Manbhum and Bankura many of them hold substantial tenures on terms of police service—a fact which lends colour to the view that they are among the earliest settlers in that part of the country. Thus in Manbhum we find two sádíás, one digváär, two náib digwárs, 17 village sádárs, and 49 tábidárs of the caste; while in Bankura the Bauris are represented by 14 sádárs ghátwáls, 16 sádíás, 8 digváárs, 375 tábidárs, and 554 chákrán chaukidárs.

The social rank of Bauris is very low. Members of the higher castes will not take water from their hands, and they themselves eat with Bégdis, Kewats, Lohars, and the non-Aryan Kurmis of Western Bengal. They are, in fact, hardly distinguishable from the Háris of Bengal and the Ghásia of Chota Nagpur, and are despised everywhere except in Manbhum and Birbhumi, where they are allowed by the Hindus to do certain menial offices which are usually done by people of higher castes. With few exceptions, they are entirely indifferent to the nice scruples regarding food, which have so important a bearing on the status of the average Hindu, for they eat beef, pork, fowls, all kinds of fish, and rats, and are much addicted to strong drink. Nevertheless they pique themselves on not eating snakes and lizards, like the Oraons.

The following statement shows the number of Bauris in 1872 and 1881:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>70,628</td>
<td>77,281</td>
<td>Rakarganj</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>76,918</td>
<td>117,548</td>
<td>Mainamansh</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>76</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>24,589</td>
<td>27,749</td>
<td>Chittaranj</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>4,461</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>14,946</td>
<td>12,770</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>9</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>780</td>
<td>1,961</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>334</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hocraha</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>4</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>St-Parganas</td>
<td>684</td>
<td>610</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>8</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>2,916</td>
<td>1,677</td>
<td>Purnah</td>
<td>3,736</td>
<td>514</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>329</td>
<td>373</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>1,303</td>
<td>509</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murcheshabad</td>
<td>6,506</td>
<td>4,614</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>14,976</td>
<td>18,534</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>394</td>
<td>1,989</td>
<td>Cutchack</td>
<td>45,361</td>
<td>59,925</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajahbyre</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>108</td>
<td>Harti</td>
<td>58,119</td>
<td>68,657</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bansaipur</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>146</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>5,872</td>
<td>7,376</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nogra</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>6,281</td>
<td>4,908</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pobna</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>255</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>1,092</td>
<td>323</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Lohardaha</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>495</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jaiporgi</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>80</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>802</td>
<td>1,646</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>808</td>
<td>Nabh urb</td>
<td>82,938</td>
<td>70,111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fardpur</td>
<td>120</td>
<td>239</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1,445</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Baurihá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bawál, a title of Báruis in Bengal.

Báwan gali, tirpan bánár, chhatís láchá, battis parkár, "fifty-two lanes, fifty-three bázars, thirty-six prête, thirty-two ways of making money," a formula or shibboleth distinguishing a section of the Jaiswár sub-caste of Kalwārs in Behar. In the Glossary forming part of his Monograph on the Trade and Manufactures of Northern India, Mr. Hoey writes (s.v. mandi, "a market");—"They say of Lucknow in Saádat Ali's time that the city consisted of báwan mandi, tirpan bánár." The close correspondence between this phrase and the opening words of the shibboleth quoted above may perhaps deserve notice.

Bázárgasht, a wanderer in a bánár, a kind of broker who spies out customers and guides them to shops.

Bazigar, Bājikar, a juggler or conjurer, a synonym for Nat, q.v. See Bediyá.

Bazzáz, a cloth merchant, a draper.

Beañh, a large fish with thorns on its back, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Beár, a pangat or section of Dosádh and a title of Chamárs in Behar.

Beauran, a section of Awadhié Hajáms in Behar.

Bebarttu, the title of the head officer of a Rájá in the Tributary States of Orissa.

Bed-bág, a weaver of cane-work.

Bedbangsi, probably a synonym for Baidya, the physician caste, or for the group of vagrant castes generically known as Bediyá, from the Sanskrit vyádha, 'a hunter.' Both words are colloquially contracted into Bed.
Bed (silent) or Beh tshangye, a sub-tribe of Dejong Lhoris or Bhotias of the south.

Bed, Bid, a title of Dakshin-Rāghi and Bangaja Kāyasthas.

Bedē, a synonym for Bediā.

Bedi, a group of the Srotriyasub-caste of Utkal Brahmans.

Bediā, Bedē, Bedē, a small agricultural Dravidian tribe of Chota Nagpur, supposed to be mūrating bhāi, or cousins through the maternal aunt, of the Kurmis. Formerly, it is said, Bediās and Kurmis intermarried, but a split occurred when it was discovered that the former ate beef, or more probably, when the latter gave up eating it. They do not claim any connexion with the Mundas, nor do the Mundas recognise them as cognates. Their septs are totemistic. In their marriages a barber officiates as priest. Bediās take kachū food from Kurmis only, and Khanghār Mundas take similar food from them. The twelfth sept of the Santāls, which is supposed to have been left behind in Champa, and has long been separated from the parent tribe, bears the name of Bediā, and it seems not improbable that the Bediās of Chota Nagpur may be actually a branch of the Santāls who did not follow the main tribe in their wanderings eastward. The connexion of the Bediās with the Kurmis tells rather for this view. The tribe has certainly nothing to do with the Bediyās of Eastern Bengal.

Bediā, the generic name of a number of vagrant gipsy-like groups, of whom it is difficult to say whether they can properly be described as castes. The following groups are included under the name (1) Babajiya, Lava, or Patwa, pedlars and mountebanks professing to be Mahomedans, but singing songs in praise of Bama and Lakshmana, and exhibiting painted scrolls representing the exploits of Hanumān. Their women have the reputation of being skilful in the treatment of children’s diseases and the removal of nervous and rheumatic pains. They also tattoo, but are not so expert in this art as the Nat women. (2) Bāzigar, Kabutari, Bhanumati, Dorabāz, acrobats and conjurors, probably closely akin to the Nats and Kanjara of Hindustan. As acrobats the women and girls are the chief performers: the men play tricks with balls and knives. The women also dabble in medicine, prescribe for children suffering from fever or indigestion, practise massage for rheumatism and affect to cure toothache. (3) Māl, also called Ponkwhān from their dexterity in extracting worms from the teeth. They appear to be a vagrant group of the Māls of Western Bengal, who in their turn are possibly a Hinduised offshoot of the Malē. It seems at any rate more reasonable to suppose that the tribal name Māl may be a variant of Malē, a man, than to derive it from Māla, a hillman, or Malla, a wrestler. Māls do not now intermarry with other Bediās, and repudiate any connexion with them: for further particulars, see the article Māl. (4) Mir-shikār or Chirimār, hunters and fowlers, takes birds with bird-lime or horse-hair nooses and the Sātnali or light lance divided into sections like a fishing rod. Some of the animals which the Mir-shikār catches are highly prized for medicinal purposes or for charms. The flesh of the scaly ant-eater, Banrahu or Bajrakit (Manis pentadactyla), is believed to restore virile energy, its scales bound on the arm cure palpitations of the heart, and worn on the finger in the form of a ring are a sovereign prophylactic against venereal diseases. The flesh of the crow pheasant (mahokha or pán-kori), if killed on a Tuesday or Saturday, cures enlargement of the spleen and puerperal disorders. The claws and droppings of the spotted owlet (penchá) if pounded up with betel-nut are a powerful and certain love-philtre, and the dried flesh of the déuk (Gallinula phoenicura) is very beneficial in rheumatism.

(5) Sámeria, snake-charmers, hawkers of miscellaneous goods, and makers of fish-hooks and such like articles. According to Dr. Wise, the snakes usually exhibited are the cobra; the light and dark varieties of the Ophiophagus, named by them Dudh-raj and Mani-raj; the python; a whip-snake, with red, black, and yellow spots, called Udaya Sámp; and a large brown snake with black stripes on its neck, known as Ghár-bánká, from the singular way it bends before striking.

The Sámeria catches a snake by pinning it to the ground with a forked stick, and seizing it by the neck, the thumb being held over the first vertebra. If the snake be a poisonous one, the fangs are torn out, but the poison bag is carefully preserved. Snake poison is highly valued by Hindu physicians for the treatment of diseases, and fetches in the market from fifteen to sixteen rupees per bhari or 179 grains. Another valuable prize is the tick (kilní), occasionally found on the hood of the black cobra, about which many fabulous stories are told. One of these parasites is worth a large sum, as it is popularly believed to be a certain preservative against snake-bites and poisons in general.

The Sámeria feeds his snakes on fish, frogs, and mice. Sámerias have no specific for snake-bite, but each man carries, as a charm, the root of the Bhatráj, a forest creeper. The popular idea is that the bud (málatí) of the Bhatráj is a specific, but the Sámerias deny this. When any one is bitten by a poisonous animal, the Sámeria ties a string round the limb, sucks the wound, bathes the extremity in hot water, and covers the bite with the leaves of the Bhatráj. One of the company then recites Hindu matras or incantations, which are usually utter gibberish.

Members of this caste are in great request at the festival of Manasa Devi, their patron deity in the month of Srávan (July-August), being engaged by Brahmans to exhibit their collection and make the snakes crawl in front of the idol. On such occasions the Sámeria plays on a pipe, while his wife or child chants a monotonous Hindustáni song, and irritates the reptile to strike.

The Sámeria also tames jungle cocks to entrap wild ones, and the Kora (Gallicrex cristatus), a bird famous for its pugnacity. When he is in want of food he tethers the decoy near a marsh, arranging a low screen with three movable leaves from which horse-hair nooses hang. The wild bird advancing to test the courage of the captive, gets entangled and falls an easy prey to the Sámeria, who is lying concealed close by. Like other Bediýás, the Sámerias keep tame cormorants to drive fish into the net, but they do not sell what they catch. They are keen sportsmen, and when an opportunity offers they stalk deer, and shoot partridges, paddy-birds, and egrets.

(6) The Shándára have the reputation of being the most orderly and industrious of the Bediýa divisions. Their name is derived from the Persian Shénah, a comb. This comb, or more correctly reed, through which the warp threads pass, is in great demand by Tántṣ and Júláhas for their looms, and no one can make them so cheaply and neatly as the Shándár. The framework of the comb (dhangi) is made of split bamboo, and the teeth (gãbri) of well-seasoned wood. The latter are fixed at equal distances apart by strong cotton thread. The Shándár is also a Manihár, or pedlar, retailing in the villages beads and trinkets; waist-strings (Kardhani) bought from the Patwá; and needles, thread, and tape, procured from Mughuliyá shops.

Shándára are expert divers, and, when anchored in suitable localities, gather the common bivalve shells (ṣipf), and sell them to the Chunári, or lime-burner. They also use the sét-náli, or bamboo rod of seven joints, tipped with bird-lime, catching bulbuls and other small birds. Like the Sámpérias, they keep tame koras, jungle ocks, and cormorants, and, if they can afford to do so, take out a gun license to shoot game.

Of late years they have all become converts to Islam, but Mahomedans do not admit them into their society, and refuse to intermarry, to eat, and to pray with them.

(7) Rasía Bediýas use boats of curious construction, only half covered over, while the tilt is cocoon, or bottle-shaped, tapering gradually towards the stern, where there is a small round opening, through which a man can with difficulty crawl. These Bediýas work with zinc, which is bought in pigs, melted, and run into moulds. From the similarity in colour of zinc and mercury (rása), the division has derived its distinctive name from the latter metal. The Rasías make anklets, bracelets, and collars for the neck (hanší), which are worn by all Hindu and Mahomedan females of the lower orders. At their homes they are cultivators, and being strict Farázs are accepted as members of the Mahomedan community. Their social standing, however, is so precarious that prolonged absence from home, or a manifest partiality for boat life, is punished by expulsion from society. other English words. The word is also used as an honorific title of Gonds and of some Uriya Brahmans; of the headmen of Jharuá, Kumbar, Bhuiya, and Kewat castes.

Behári, Bihári, a mul or section of the Kanaújiá sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Beherá, a title of Sudhás in Orissa.

Behna, a cotton-vendor. Occ.

Behnáhán, a section of the Bandodhiá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Bejeá, a synonym for Bedié.

Bekh, a totemistic sept of Oraons who cannot eat earth-salt.

Bel, a fruit, a sept of Páns; a totemistic section of the Bhar caste in Western Bengal, the members of which will not touch or eat the bel fruit.

Belélai, a sub-caste of Kamárs in the Santál Parganas.

Belásti, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Bardwan.

Belaučuče-Káko, a mul of the Bharadwája section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Belaučuče-Ghaul, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Belaučuče-Sudái, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Belaučuče-Ratpár, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Belaučuče-Garh, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Belaučuče-Dih, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Belawahári, a section of Mauliks in Chota Nagpur.

Beldár, 'one who works with a béi, or hoe.' A wandering Dravidian caste of earth-workers and navvies in Behar and Western Bengal, many of whom are employed in the coal-mines of Raniganj and Barakar. Both men and women labour, the former digging the earth and the latter removing it in baskets carried on the head. The Beldárs regard this mode of carrying earth as distinctive of themselves, and will on no account carry earth in baskets slung from the shoulders. They work very hard when paid by the piece, and are notorious for their skill in manipulating the pillars (ádkhi, 'witness') left to mark work done, so as to exaggerate the measurement. On one occasion, while working for me on a large lake at Govindpur, in the north of the Manbhum district, a number of Beldárs transplanted an entire pillar during the night and claimed payment for several thousand feet of imaginary earthwork. The fraud was most skilfully carried out, and was only detected by accident. In Western Bengal they rank with Koras and Bauris, and, like them, are terribly addicted to drink. They profess to marry their daughters as infants, but the practice of adult-marriage still survives among them; while they certainly allow widows to remarry, and recognise considerable license of divorce. Divorced women may marry again.

The origin of the caste is obscure. They are certainly closely akin to the Binda and Nuniaá, and it seems probable that the former represent the remnant of a compact aboriginal tribe, from which the Nunias broke off by taking to the manufacture of saltpetre, and the Beldars by going in for earthwork. The functions of the Binds are less specialised; and this circumstance, coupled with the fact that they reckon hunting and fishing among their characteristic occupations, leads me to regard them as the oldest of the three groups, and probably the parent of both Nunias and Beldars. The internal structure of the Beldars throws little light upon their tribal affinities. In Behar they have two sub-castes:—Chauhán and Kathautiá or Katháwá, and one section, Kásyapa. Their marriages are regulated by the standard formula manerá, chacherá, etc. Infant-marriage is in vogue, and the marriage ceremony is of the standard type. A second wife may be taken if the first is barren. Widows marry by sagai. Divorce by the caste pancháyat is recognised, and divorced women may marry again.

Beldars employ Maithil Brahmans as their priests, and conform in matters of religion, funeral rites, etc., to the average Hinduism of the lower castes. On the Tilé Sankránt festival, in Mágh, they worship the Lárba, a pointed iron instrument used in pounding bricks—one of their standard occupations. A few of them are cultivators with occupancy rights: most, however, earn their living as navvies or as agricultural day-labourers. Their social rank is much the same as that of Nunias.

In treating of the Beldars much confusion is caused by the fact that the term Beldar, 'mattock-bearer,' besides denoting a distinct endogamous group, is also used as a generic title common to the low castes of Hindus employed on earthwork. This use of the word in its proper etymological sense, as denoting merely an occupation, comes out even more clearly in Eastern Bengal, where we find Mahomedan Beldars, who act as scavengers in their own villages, removing carcasses or cutting brushwood, and serve as torch-bearers (masalchi) at Hindu and Mahomedan weddings.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Beldars in 1872 and 1881, but the statistics are worthless by reason of the confusion in the use of the name explained in the last paragraph:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
<th>DISTRICT.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>161</td>
<td>185</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>154</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>18,461</td>
<td>18,463</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>102</td>
<td>102</td>
<td>Gaya</td>
<td>16,255</td>
<td>16,257</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>102</td>
<td>34</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>9,003</td>
<td>228</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli with Howrah</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>10,092</td>
<td>10,092</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>Mousafipur</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>799</td>
<td>831</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>500</td>
<td>904</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>536</td>
<td>540</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>14,678</td>
<td>17,411</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>1,449</td>
<td>277</td>
<td>Shangpurl</td>
<td>11,338</td>
<td>15,361</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmahal</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>7,323</td>
<td>11,183</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranagpur</td>
<td>139</td>
<td>139</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>683</td>
<td>467</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhamra</td>
<td>88</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>Malda</td>
<td>1,301</td>
<td>1,301</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>298</td>
<td>374</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>965</td>
<td>1,096</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>172</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>818</td>
<td>578</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>155</td>
<td>99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Meitmanthi</td>
<td>781</td>
<td>308</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>103</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Beldkar. 88  Belhar.

Beldar, a title of Nuniás in Behar.

Belgachi, a sub-caste of Kumhára in Jessore.

Belgrámi, a gán of the Kásyapa gotra of Bárendra Brahmins in Bengal.

Belha, a section of Sonáras in Behar.

Belíar, a sept of Asuras in Chota Nagpur.

Belkhariyá, Belkharí, Bilkharí, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Belkuar, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bella, a section of Goálás in Behar.

Beloar, fruit, a totemistic sept of Lohars in Chota Nagpur.

Belonchá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Belontiá, a division of Brahmins in Behar.

Belsandi, a section of the Magahiya, Pachainyá, and Tirhutiyá sub-castes of Doms in Behar.

Beluri, a gán of the Sándílya gotra of Bárendra Brahmins in Bengal.

Belwadhiya, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Nepal.

Belwár, a sub-caste of Dhobis in Behar, a mul or section of the Naomulía or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Benamón, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Benátiyá, a sub-caste of Chásás in Orissa.

Bendah, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhoria in Darjiling whose ancestor had emigrated from Bhotan.

Bendiár, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Bendkar, a sub-tribe of Savars, q.v.

Beng, frog, a totemistic sept of Bhuiyas and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Beni, a pathi or hypergamous sub-group of Bárendra Brahmins in Bengal; a variant of Baniyá, q.v.

Beniah-Kandch, a sub-tribe of Kándhs in Orissa.

Beniaro, frog, a totemistic sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Benkurá, a section of Páns in Behar.

Benkurá, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Benrá, a synonym for Páttar, a class of fishermen in Eastern Bengal.

Beopéri, bepári, an importer of grain and a wholesale dealer, who frequently supplies goods on trust to retail shopkeepers to sell at a minimum price fixed by the bepári. If the goods are not sold within a month after delivery, the bepári charges interest at one per cent. per mensem on their value.

Bepári, a title of Málós in Eastern Bengal.

Berá, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Berar, a mul or section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.
BERAUT.

Beraut, a section of Awadhí, Hajám in Behar.

Bere, a section of the Sátmúli, Magháy sub-caste of Káond in Behar.

Berga-Khariá, a sub-caste of Kharíás in Chota Nagpur.

Beraut, a section of the Panch-Játí sub-caste of Khatriás in Bengal.

Bermán, a section of Kanaújiá Lohárs in Behar.

Berrá-Rajwár, a sub-caste of Rajwárs in Lohardagá.

Beruá, Pátra-Beruá, a small cultivating and fishing caste of Eastern Bengal, probably an offshoot of the Chandál tribe, with the members of which they still eat and drink, but do not intermarry. Their name is derived from berá, a weir of bamboos or reeds used for catching mullet. It is the well-known habit of this fish to jump over any obstacle it meets with in water. The Beruas at full tide throw a weir across a creek, and on the surface of the water below it they moor a broad raft. As soon as the mullet encounters the weir and finds no opening, it leaps over and is caught on the raft. The fish are sold in the market, but no Beruá will cast a net or earn a livelihood as the Kaibarttás do.

The whole of the Beruá caste belongs to the Kásyapa gotra, and they therefore practise exogamy only in name. Their headman is called Pátra. The intimacy of their connexion with the Chandálás is attested by the fact that the same purohit officiates for both.

Beruár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Beruká Kissán, a mul or section of the Biyáhút sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar.

Beri, a section of the Panch-Játí sub-caste of Khatriás in Bengal.

Beru ke Máhto, a section of the Biyáhút and Kharídáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Beru ke pánre, a section of the Biyáhút and Kharídáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Besáti, Bisdíti, a vendor of small wares, generally Mahomedans.

Betiah-Kandh, a sub-tribe of Kandhs in Orissa.

Beserwár, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Besra, small hawk, a totemistic sept or section of Lohárs, Mundás, Santáls, Cheros, and Gonds.

Betra Pán or Raj-Pán, a sub-caste of Páns in Orissa.

Besyá putra, the son of a prostitute, a bastard.

Bhadrániá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhabhut or Bibhuti, the ashes of burnt cow-dung, with which mendicants, of the Saiva orders chiefly, besmear their bodies: hence a title of such mendicants.

Bhadáiya, a pangat or section of Dosádhs in Behar.

Bhadáníá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhadání, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhadániá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.
Bhádar, a gāin of the Bharadwája gotra of Barendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Bhadariá or Bharerí, a sect of mendicants of Brahmanical descent, professors of astrology in Behar; a sub-caste of the Kraunchdwípi Brahmanas in Behar.

Bhadauríá, a sept of the Suryabansí sub-tribe of Rajputs and of Kewats in Behar.

Bhad-bhadriá, sparrow, a totemistic section of the Jagannáthí sub-caste of Kumhárs in Orissa.

Bhaddal, a gotra or section of the Agarwál caste.

Bhadísawér, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Bhadpá, a ruí or sept of the Bedtshan-gye sub-tribe of Dejong Lborí or Bhotías of the south.

Bhadra, a title of Dakshin-Ráhri and Bangaja Káyasthas, and of Sánkháris in Bengal.

Bhadraghátí, a section of Pátinis in Bengal.

Bhadraj, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Goría sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Bhadshuhiá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bhádwa or Bhánruá, a title of Nápis, from the bhánr or bag in which they carry their shaving implements.

Bháduri, a gāin of the Kásyapa gotra of Barendra Brahmanas; also a title of Sadgops in Bengal.

Bhadwariá, a mul or section of the Biyáhut sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar.

Bhádyá-bau, a title of Tántis in Bengal.

Bhagabán, a section of the Mahmudábáz sub-caste of Nápis in Bengal.

Bhágái, a gāin or sub-section of Saptaasati Brahmanas in Bengal.

Bhagan Bhájan, a family of the Grihasth group of Jugis in Bengal.

Bhagat, a title of the Jaiswár and Biyáhut sub-castes of Kalwárs in Behar; a title of those members of the Kasodhan sub-caste of Baniyas in Behar who refrain from eating fish. The same title is also used by Kasarwáni Baniyas without this distinction.

Bhagwat, Bhakat, literally a worshipper of Vishnu—a class of Baniyas who strictly observe the rules of the Hindu religion and abstain from meat and intoxicating drinks.

Bhainsá, buffalo, a totemistic sept of Gonds, Páns, and Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Bhainsu, a section of Goálás in Behar.

Bhair, a section of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Bhairab Ghataki, a meí or hypergamous sub-group of Ráhri Brahmanas in Bengal.

Bhaiskayéri, a section of the Banodhia and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Bhaji Sag, vegetable, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bháju, a section of Newars in Darjiling; also a pet name for a Newar child.
BHAJU CHAKWAR.

Bhaju Chakwar, a section of Babhans in Behar.

BHAKAT.

Bhakt, Bhagat. This term properly denotes a worshipper, and particularly Vaishnavas of the middle and lower castes, who from religious motives abstain from meat, fish, and spirituous liquors. It is used as a title of Vaishnavas generally, of the Jaiswar and Biyáhut sub-castes of Kalwárs, and of Támbulis in Behar, of Kasarwání Baniyás, and of those members of the Kasodhan sub-caste of Baniyás who refrain from eating fish. In Manbhum and Hazaribagh Bhakats are very numerous, and have in their hands most of the business of the chattis or halting places along the Grand Trunk Road.

The word Bhakat also denotes a sub-tribe of the Oraons, which has been formed on the same basis of religious asceticism as the Kharwar or Safa-hor division of the Santálás. These Bhakats acknowledge themselves to be Oraons, and admit disciples from the tribe, which indeed forms their only source of recruits, but they will not intermarry with their unconverted brethren, nor take cooked food or water from their hands. They abstain from all flesh except that of goats which have been sacrificed to one of the Hindu gods, nor do they drink spirits. Fish, however, is not prohibited, and sweetmeats may be eaten with Oraons, Mundas, and Telis. Tobacco they will only smoke among themselves or out of the hukka of their own guru or spiritual guide.

The favourite deities of the Bhakat-Oraons, as of most recently Hinduised aborigines, are Mahádeva and Káli, to whom goats, ghi, sweetmeats, etc., are offered on Wednesdays and Sundays, the offerings being eaten by the worshippers and their families. They employ Brahmanas as gurus, but these Brahmanas do not officiate as their priests, and the sacrificial victims are slain by any influential person among themselves who happens to be acquainted with the ritual. In marriages again, while the attempt is to imitate the Hindu ceremony, the purohit who officiates is not a Brahman, but a Bhakat, and the binding portion of the ceremony is the payment of the bride-price, which consists of a pair of bullocks, or Rs. 5 to Rs. 10 in cash.

Along with this striving after conformity with the externals of Hinduism, we find the Bhakats retaining in their entirety the totemistic exogamous sections characteristic of the Oraons, and observing the same prohibited degrees. They show at present no signs of carrying their asceticism into the domain of marriage. Like the Oraons, they marry their girls as adults, usually between the ages of twelve and sixteen. Unrestricted courtship is permitted before marriage, and sexual intercourse is tolerated, it being understood that if a girl becomes pregnant she will name the father of her child, and the two will get married. Polygamy is permitted, but is not usually resorted to unless the first wife is barren. Widows are allowed to marry again, but no ceremony is performed on such occasions, and the transaction is deemed to be complete when a few maunds of grain have been paid to the relatives of the woman. Divorce is easy and very common; a woman runs away from her husband with any man who suits her fancy, a man turns out his wife and takes up with another woman. In either case the parties may marry again and thus render the divorce final, but this may also be effected without remarriage by refunding to the husband the bride-price which he paid in the first instance for his wife.

In the disposal of the dead the usages of the Bhakats do not differ materially from those of the Oraons. The rule is to burn the body, preserving some of the ashes and bones for burial, at the time of the haddiphor festival, in the bhumiadviri village of the deceased, that is to say in the village from the first founders of which he believes himself to be descended. At this festival pigs and great quantities of rice are offered for the benefit of departed ancestors, who are also held in continual remembrance by fragments of rice or dal cast on the ground at every meal, and by a pinch of tobacco sprinkled whenever a man prepares his pipe. The bodies of women who die within fifteen days after child-birth are buried, and fowls offered over the grave. People who die during the rainy season are also buried, but the remains are exhumed and burned when the dry season sets in.

Bhakta, animal, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Bháklun, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Bhakta, a title of Kaibarttas and Sunris in Bengal; a sect of Vaishnavas in Behar.

Bhalauniár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Bhale, a section of the Chhajáti sub-caste of Khatris in Behar.

Bhálkiá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Bhalráit, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bhal Sultán, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhásbasrá, a section of Goélás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Bhandári, Nápit, Hajám, the barber caste of Orissa. The name Bhandári or store-keeper is supposed to have reference to the position of trust and influence which the barber often occupies in the household of a Hindu landholder. In Orissa the caste claim to be the modern representatives of the Sudras of early Indian tradition; but they are usually classed among the mixed castes, and believed to be the offspring of a Kshatriya father and a Sudra mother. There are seven sub-castes—Bangáli, Dakhini, Desi, Khariá, Khurda, Golá, and Hátuá. Of these, the Bangáli and Dakhini are immigrants from Bengal and Madras respectively, the Desi are indigenous to Orissa, and Khurda are supposed to have come from the estate of that name in Puri district. The Khariá and Háruá sub-castes are found in Cuttack, the former being barbers who have for the most part given up their traditional occupation and taken to making salt and letting out pack-bullocks for hire; while the latter are an itinerant class of barbers who are attached to no particular village, but wander about plying their trade wherever they can find customers. The sections of the caste, which are shown in the Appendix, appear to have been borrowed from the Brahmanical system.

Bhandáris marry their daughters as infants, and regard it as a breach of a distinct religious obligation if a girl remains unmarried at the age of puberty. Such cases, however, do occur sometimes, when a girl's parents are poor or when some personal blemish renders it difficult to procure a husband for her. The ceremony is supposed to be identical with the prajápatya form referred to by Manu. Its essential portion is hastagánthi, or binding together the hands of the bride and bridegroom with a wisp of kusa grass. Polygamy is permitted to the extent that a man may take a second wife if the first is barren, suffers from an incurable disease, or has certain specified physical defects. A widow is allowed to marry again, and is generally expected to marry her late husband's younger brother if there is one. She may, however, marry any member of the caste outside the prohibited degrees of kinship. The ceremony in use at the marriage of a widow is called thai, 'change of place,' and is performed under the supervision of the bridegroom's family priest, who receives dakshina for his services. It commences with the worship of an earthen vessel filled with water, and is completed by putting shell and brass bracelets (sankha and katuri) on the bride's wrists and smearing vermilion on her forehead. The status of a widow thus married, though clearly distinguished from that of a mere concubine, is deemed inferior to that of a woman who has been married as a virgin by the full prajápatya ritual. The caste council (pancháyat) may grant a divorce (chharda-patra) to a husband if it be proved before them that his wife has committed adultery. Pending the decision of the case the husband is held to be unclean, and he must burn a kusa grass figure of his wife and give a feast to the pancháyat before he can be again admitted to social intercourse. Divorced wives get alimony for six months, and may marry again by the form used at the remarriage of a widow, but they must first perform an expiatory ceremony of the same general character as that demanded from a husband who applies for a divorce.

All Bhandáris are Vaishnavas, and conform in the course of their regular worship to the precepts of that sect. They also regard Visvakarma as the patron of their craft, and on the fourth day of the Durga Pujá the razors, scissors, and the mirror, which they deem the special emblem of their caste, are laid before his image with offerings of sweetmeats and flowers, while for three days all members of the caste rest from their usual avocations. In this, as in other religious offices performed in honour of the regular Hindu gods, Bhandáris employ Brahmans, who are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. The village goddess, Grám-devatí, on the other hand, is worshipped by the heads of households, unassisted by Brahmans, with offerings of fruits, sweetmeats, and parched grain. No special day is set apart for these sacrifices, but Sundays, Tuesdays, Saturdays, and the first day of every month are believed to be auspicious times for approaching the goddess. Some Bhandários are sesáyats or secular priests of Grám-devatí, and in this capacity hold small grants of rent-free land.

The dead are usually burned, but the bodies of children and women who die in child-birth are buried. When a pregnant woman dies before delivery, her body is cut open and the child taken out, both corpses being then buried in the same grave. Sráddh is performed in the regular fashion on the eleventh day after death. Offerings are also made on the anniversary of the death of near relatives, and a sráddh is performed for remote ancestors at the Mahálaya festival and on the night of the Kálí Pujá.

The social standing of the caste is respectable. A Brahman will not only take water from the hands of a Bhandári, but will go to his house as a guest and partake there of any food that has been cooked by a Brahman. Their own practice in matters of diet is in accordance with that of orthodox Hindus. They eat pakki food with members of the Nabasákhi only, and will only take the leavings of their own spiritual guide (guru). As a rule they practise their hereditary profession, and hold their homestead lands rent-free in consideration of the services rendered by them to the village community. Others, again, have special tenures (hajámí jágír) created by the former rulers of the country. Comparatively few have regularly taken to agriculture, and most of these are tháni raiyats with rights of occupancy. Zemindárs, however, and lákhirájrárs, are occasionally met with among them.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Bhandários in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>29,494</td>
<td>35,955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>17,887</td>
<td>21,761</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>15,733</td>
<td>18,589</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>14,372</td>
<td>16,288</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bhandári, a treasurer, a store-keeper. In Sylhet, a servant, an outdoor servant: in other parts of Bengal, a steward: in Orissa, a barber; an honorary title of Káyasths and Nápits in Bengal; a title of Sudras in Eastern Bengal; a title of Kahárs, Kewats, and of Gánjwár Sunris in Behar; a section of Mális, and a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhándí, a synonym for Bhát, q.v.

Bhandsálí, a grain-storer.
BHANDSÁR, see Aṛhatívā.

Bhanduwál, a mul of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmins in Behar.

Bhangá Kshatriya, Bhanga, a title assumed by the Paliyas and Rajbansis of Northern and Eastern Bengal which has reference to the legend of the Kochh tribe that they are an outlying branch of the Kshatriyas who took refuge in Kochh Behar when the caste was destroyed by Parasu Rám.

Bhangá-Kulin, a hypergamous group of Rárhí Brahmans in Bengal.

Bhángar, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Bhangerá, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Bháng-farosh, a seller of bháng (cannabis sativus), generally a Brahman.

Bhanj, a sub-caste of so-called Rajputs in Singbhum and the Tributary States of Orissa.

Bhar, a small Dravidian caste of Western Bengal and Chota Nagpur, most of whom are cultivators, while a few occupy the position of hereditary personal servants to the Rájás of Pachete. The Bhars are divided into two sub-castes, Magháyá and Bangáli, the members of which do not intermarry. Their sections show a curious mixture of the totemistic and eponymous types, which may perhaps indicate that the caste is undergoing the process of gradual conversion to Hinduism and incorporation into the regular caste system. This view is borne out, on the whole, by their domestic institutions, which appear to be in a similar state of transition. Thus the remarriage of widows has been discarded, and the license of divorce, conceded so freely by the non-Aryan races, entirely done away with; while adult-marriage still survives as a relic of the past, side by side with the growing usage of infant-marriage. It deserves notice that in this respect the Bhars form an exception to the usual course of development. It may be laid down as a general rule that the adoption of infant-marriage is the first step taken in the direction of conformity to orthodox usage, while the prohibition of widow-marriage usually follows as a later stage. The Bhars, however, have completely given up widow-marriage, while still recognizing the marriage of adults as permissible for those who cannot afford to marry their daughters as infants.

For the rest they appear in all respects to follow the usages of orthodox Hindus: professing the Hindu religion, employing Brahmans, burning their dead, and performing their śrāddh on the thirtieth day after death. In the matter of inheritance they deviate slightly from the standard school, in that they give the eldest son an extra share (jeth-angs) of the property. This, however, is not uncommon in Western Bengal, and we may hazard the conjecture that it has some connexion with the custom of primogeniture which governs the succession to many of the large estates in that part of the country. The connexion of the Bhars with the Pachete family has probably tended to raise their general social position. They rank in Manbhum with Tamolis and Mairas, and the higher castes can take water from their hands.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Bhars in the Lower Provinces in 1872 and 1881. It includes the Bhars of Behar, a Hinduised branch of the original stock, who disown all connexion with the Bhars of Western Bengal, and claim affinity with the Bhars of the North-Western Provinces. A full account of the latter is given in Mr. Crooke's Ethnographical Hand-book.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>39</td>
<td></td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>Simshabad</td>
<td>5,079</td>
<td>5,986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>33</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tirhut {Darbhanga}</td>
<td>255</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>7,047</td>
<td>8,207</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>6,945</td>
<td>2,113</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshedebad</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>Monglyr</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinapur</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>Bhagapur</td>
<td></td>
<td>263</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Buxpur</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>Purniah</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barga</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>Maideh</td>
<td></td>
<td>1,060</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td></td>
<td>8</td>
<td>Hastaribagh</td>
<td>5,938</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Narjina</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>Lohardagá</td>
<td>1,006</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koch Behar</td>
<td>27</td>
<td></td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>10,917</td>
<td>1,238</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Farrupur</td>
<td>14</td>
<td></td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansing</td>
<td>52</td>
<td></td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td></td>
<td>8</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>23</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bhar, a title of Tántis in Bengal.

Bharadwája, a Brahmanical section of Khatris and Rajputs in Behar; of Káyasthas in Bengal; and of Karans and Khandás in Orissa; a gotra or section of Bábhans in Behar, borrowed from the Brahmanical system and superadded to the original exogamous groups (kula) characteristic of the caste; a gotra or section of Brahmans, Baidyas, Aguris, Bháts, Gaudhabauiks, Goálás, Kámárs, Madhunápits, Mayárs, and Tántis in Bengal.

Bharadwáji, a section of Cháins in Behar.

Bharáit, a mui or section of the Kamarkalla sub-caste of Sonás and of the Maghayá sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Bharan-rási, a section of Málós in Eastern Bengal.

Bharari, a title of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.
Bharari, a member of the Basishtha gotra of Nepali Brahmans.

Bhārata, a title of Brahmans and of Bhāts.

Bhārath, a section of the Sātmuliā Maghayā sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Bhārathi, Bhārati, (i) a worshipper of Siva; (ii) a name of Saraswati, Goddess of Learning, used as a title by Kāyasths: (iii) a name of one of the ten orders of Dasnāmi ascetics.

Bhārati, a tenant, a renter.

Bhārauli, a mul or section of the Timuliā Madheśi sub-caste of Halwāis in Behar.

Bhar-Bhunjā, grain-parher or fryer. The name of a sub-caste of Kándus who are employed in parching and frying different sorts of grain, pulse, etc. They are said to spring from a Kahār father and Sudra mother, and pretend to be divided into seven tribes, which do not intermarry. There is also a class of Kāyasths in Behar, distinct from these, who follow the same business. A synonym for Kándu in Behar.

Bhar-Chhutār, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in the Santāl Parganas.

Bharchuihā, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhardur, a mul or section of the Sātmuliā or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goālās in Behar.

Bhardwār, a mul or section of the Ayodhiābāī sub-caste of Sonārs in Behar.

Bhargava, a section of Brahmans.

Bharhe, a mul of the Kāsyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bhāriyā, a metal-caster, a brazier, foundryman.

Bharotāt, a section of the Ariā sub-caste of Bais Baniyās in Behar.

Bharpāik, a section of Kanauji Hájāms in Behar.

Bharsahr, a section of Bhojpuri Halwās in Behar.

Bharsārwala, Bhandārwalā, a grain-storer or corn-factor.

Bharsi-Misr, a title of Bābhans in Behar.

Bharsuriā, a sept of the Suryabansi Rajputs in Behar.

Bharti, Bhartari, a sub-sect of Saivite religious mendicants who go about begging, singing, and playing on the sarīsī, said to be descendants of Rājā Bhartari of Dhārānagar.

Bharthi, a synonym for Bhārati, q.v.

Bhartkul, one of the branches of the Gaur-Brahmans.

Bhartri-Hari-Jogi, an order of Hindu mendicants who profess to have been instituted by Bharthi, the brother of Vikramāditya, in the century before Christ.

Bharwe, a section of Sunris in Behar.

Bhāskar, a small caste of stone-cutters, who make idols of stone, wood, or metal, and occupy about the same social position as the Dhobis.
Bhāṭ (Sansk. bhatta, a title of respect, probably connected with bhartri, a ‘supporter or master’), a caste of genealogists and family bards, usually supposed to have sprung from the intercourse of a Kshatriya with a Brahman widow. Others believe them to be the modern representatives of the Māgadha spoken of in Manu, x, 17, as the offspring of a Vaisya father and a Kshatriya mother. Lassen regards this mythical pedigree as merely a theoretical explanation of the fact that the professional singers of the praises of great men had come by Manu’s time to be looked upon as a distinct class.1 Zimmer, on the other hand, seems to take the tradition more seriously, and speaks of the Māgadha as a “mixed caste, out of which, as we learn from numerous passages in later writings, a guild of singers arose, who, devoting themselves to the deeds of the Kosala-Videha and Kuru-Panchala, may have laid the foundation of the epic poems.”2 Other authorities say that they were produced to amuse Pārvati from the drops of sweat on Siva’s brow, but as they chose to sing his praises rather than hers, they were expelled from heaven and condemned to live a wandering life as bards on earth. Sir John Malcolm, Central India, vol. ii, p. 132, says:——“According to the fable of their origin, Mahādeva first created Bhāts to attend his lion and bull; but the former killing the latter every day gave him infinite vexation and trouble in creating new ones. He therefore formed the Chāran, equally devout as the Bhāt, but of bolder spirit, and gave him in charge these favourite animals. From that period no bull was ever destroyed by the lion.”3 In his brief view of the caste system of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh, Mr. J. C. Nesfield propounds the original view that the Bhāts are an offshoot “from those secularised Brahmans who frequented the courts of princes and the camps of warriors, recited their praises in public, and kept records of their genealogies. Such, without much variation, is the function of the Bhāt at the present day. The ancient epic known as the Mahābhārata speaks of a band of bards and eulogists marching in front of Yudhishthira as he made his progress from the field of Kuru-Kshetra towards Hastināpur. But these very men are spoken of in the same poem as Brahmanas. Nothing could be more natural than that, as time went on, these courtier priests should have become hereditary bards, who receded from the parent stem and founded a new caste bound together by mutual interests and sympathies.” In support of this theory of the origin of the caste Mr. Nesfield refers to the facts that one of the sub-castes is called Baram-Bhāt; that some Gaur-Brahmans still act as bards and genealogists; that the Bhāt still wears the sacred thread, and is addressed by the lower classes as Mahārāj—an honour generally only accorded to Brahmanas; and lastly, that by an obvious survival of 1 Lassen, Ind. Alt. i, 777.

Brahmanical titles the Bhát's employer is called \textit{jejmán}, 'he who gives the sacrifice,' while the Bhát himself is called \textit{jagvād, jājak}, or \textit{jāčak}, 'the priest by whom the sacrifice is performed.'

Strong testimony in favour of Mr. Nesfield's view comes to us from Eastern Bengal, where, according to Dr. Wise, the Bháts repudiate the traditional descent from a Kshatriya and a Brahman widow, and claim to be the offspring of the aboriginal Brahmans employed as ghataks or marriage-brokers by the other members of the sacred order. They say that they retired or were driven to the borders of Bengal for refusing to accept the reforms of Ballál Sen. In Silhet the Ráhri Brahmans still eat with the Bháts, but in Dacca the latter are reckoned unclean; and in Tipperah, having fallen in rank, they earn a precarious livelihood by making umbrellas. It is a curious fact that the Bhát would consider himself dishonoured by acting as a \textit{pujādri} or priest of a temple, or as a purohit.

Admitting the force of this evidence, and fully recognising how great an advance Mr. Nesfield has made on the traditional methods of dealing with such questions, I find some difficulty in reconciling his theory as stated above with the internal structure of the Bhát caste. If the Bháts of the present day are descended solely from a class of degraded Brahmans—if, in other words, they are a homogeneous offshoot from the priestly caste—how do they come to have a number of sections, which are certainly not Brahmanical, and which appear rather to resemble the territorial exogamous groups common among the Rajputs? Brahmans, however degraded, hold fast to their characteristic series of eponymous sections, and I know of no case in which it can be shown that they have adopted section-names of a different type. On the other hand, there is nothing specially improbable in the conjecture that Rajputs may have taken up the profession of bard to the chiefs of their tribe, and thus may in course of time have become incorporated in the Bhát caste. It will be seen that this solution of the difficulty in no way conflicts with Mr. Nesfield's view, but merely modifies it by introducing a second factor into the formation of the caste. Mr. Nesfield regards the Bháts as a homogeneous functional group thrown off by the Brahmans. I look upon them as a heterogeneous group made up of Brahmans and Rajputs welded together into one caste in virtue of their exercising similar functions. I may add, however, that the inviolability of the Bhát's person, which was admitted in Western India towards the end of the last century, makes rather for Mr. Nesfield's view than for mine; while the theory of Roth and Zimmer, that the first germ of the Brahman caste is to be sought in the singers of Vedic times, may perhaps be deemed to tell in the same direction.

The sections of the caste are shown in Appendix I. A man may not marry a woman of his own section, nor any one descended from his sister, paternal \textsuperscript{1} Zimmer, \textit{Alt-Indisches Leben}, p. 168. See also art. Brahman below.

aunt, paternal grandmother, maternal aunt, maternal grandfather, and maternal great-grandfather (mother’s mother’s father) as long as any relationship can be traced. The endogamous divisions of the caste are somewhat obscure. Two sub-castes appear to be known in Behar—Rajbhét and Baram-Bhát. To these may be added the Turk-Bhát, who are converts to Islám and perform the same functions in Mahomedan households as the Hindu Bháts for men of their own religion. The wives of Mahomedan Bháts sing in public on certain occasions. There seems to be no marked difference of occupation between the Rajbháts and Baram-Bháts, but I understand that they do not intermarry. Regarding the Bháts of the North-West Provinces Sir Henry Elliot says:—“By some tribes the Bhát and Jága are considered synonymous; but those who pretend to greater accuracy distinguish them by calling the former Birmbhát or Badí, and the latter Jágabhát. The former recite the deeds of ancestors at weddings and other festive occasions; the latter keep the family record, particularly of Rajputs, and are entitled by right of succession to retain the office, whereas the Birmbháts are hired and paid for the particular occasion. Jágabháts pay visits to their constituents every two or three years, and receive the perquisites to which they are entitled. After having recorded all the births which have taken place since their last tour, they are remunerated with rupees, cattle, or clothes, according to the ability of the registering party.” In another place Sir Henry Elliot mentions a number of subdivisions of the caste, which are shown in a note in Appendix I.

Bháts usually marry their daughters between the ages of nine and twelve; but in exceptional cases, where a girl’s parents are poor, it may happen that she is not married until after the age of puberty. The marriage ceremony is of the orthodox type, and kanyādān, or the presentation of the bride to the bridegroom and his acceptance of the gift, is reckoned to be the essential and binding portion of the ritual. Polygamy is not supposed to be allowed, but a man may take a second wife if the first is barren or suffers from an incurable disease. Widows are not allowed to marry again, nor is divorce recognised. An adulterous wife is turned out of the caste and ceases thenceforth to be a member of respectable society.

In questions concerning the devolution of property, the caste are guided for the most part by the standard Hindu law recognised in the area where they live; that is to say, in Bengal they follow the Dáyabhága, and in Behar the Mitákshará Code. In one point, however, they observe a peculiar usage of their own. Where under the ordinary law a daughter’s son would succeed, Bhát custom holds him to be excluded by the nearest male relative of the same section. It is the more remarkable that this custom should have survived, as the Bháts are not governed by pancháyat or caste councils to the same extent as the lower castes, and thus lack the most effective machinery for preserving peculiar usages, which the courts tend on the whole to destroy.
The religion of the Bháts of Behar differs little from that of the average middle-class Hindu. Representatives of all the regular sects are found among their numbers, and the caste cannot be said to favour the tenets of any particular body. In Eastern Bengal, on the other hand, they are said to be mostly Sakti worshippers, and to be greatly addicted to intemperance. They employ Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, who are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. Their minor gods are Bandi or Sanvardhir and Bariji, who are worshipped on the 22nd Srávan and the 24th Chait with offerings of he-goats, wheaten cakes, tilchaauri made of rice and molasses, coloured cloths, and vermillion. The eatable portion of the offerings is divided among the members of the household. The dead are burned, and the ceremony of sráddha is performed on the thirteenth day after death.

In point of social precedence Bháts rank immediately below Káyaasts. They wear the sacred thread (janeo), and Brahmans take water from their hands. Their own rules concerning diet are the same as are observed by the higher castes, and, like them, they will take water and certain sweetmeats from Kurmis, Kahars, and castes of corresponding status.

The characteristic profession of the Bháts has an ancient and distinguished history. The literature of both Greece and India owes the preservation of its oldest treasures to the singers, who recited poems in the households of the chief, and doubtless helped in some measure to shape the masterpieces which they handed down. Their place was one of marked distinction. In the days when writing was unknown, the man who could remember many verses was held in high honour by the tribal chief, who depended upon the memory of his bard for his personal amusement, for the record of his own and his ancestors’ prowess, and for the maintenance of the genealogy which established the purity of his descent. The bard, like the herald, was not lightly to be slain, and even Odysseus, in the heat of his vengeance, spares the doócês Pheumis, “who sang among the wooers of necessity.” Possibly the duties of bard and herald may often have been discharged by the same person. However this may be, it is curious to find that about the middle of the sixteenth century the person of a Bhát was deemed inviolable by highway robbers in Rajputana and Guzerat, so that a member of that caste could protect a caravan of traders from attack by threatening to kill himself if they were molested; while as late as 1775 many of them made their living by pledging themselves as hostages for the payment of revenue, the performance of treaties and bonds, and the general good behaviour of princes or private individuals.

1 Odyssey, xxii, 331.
2 Yule, Anglo-Indian Glossary, s.v. Bhát.
In most parts of modern India, except perhaps in Rajputana, the Bhéts have fallen from their former state, and are now the tawdriest parody on the Homeric ἀσκος. Mr. Nesfield describes them as "rapacious and conceited mendicants, too proud to work, but not too proud to beg." Mr. Sherring says they "are notorious for their rapacity as beggars, and are much dreaded by their employers on account of the power they have of distorting family history at public recitations if they choose to do so, and of subjecting any member to general ridicule." Dr. Wise's notes contain a telling sketch of the Bhét of Eastern Bengal:—"In January they leave their homes, travelling to all parts of Eastern Bengal, and, being in great request, are fully engaged during the subsequent Hindu matrimonial season. Each company receives a fixed yearly sum from every Hindu household within a definite area, amounting usually to eight annas. In return they are expected to visit the house and recite Kavítas, or songs extolling the worth and renown of the family. Satirical songs are great favourites with Hindus, and none win more applause than those laying bare the foibles and well-intentioned vagaries of the English rule or the eccentricities and irascibility of some local magnate. Very few bards can sing extemporary songs, their effusions, usually composed by one and learned off by heart by the others, being always metrical, often humorous, and generally seasoned with puns and equivocal words. Their sole occupation is the recital of verses, unaccompanied by instrumental music. They are met with everywhere when Hindu families celebrate a festival or domestic event, appearing on such occasions uninvited, and exacting by their noisy importunity a share of the food and charity that is being doled to the poor. Their shamelessness in this respect is incredible. During the Durga Pújá they force their way into respectable houses and make such a horrid uproar by shouting and singing that the inmates gladly pay something to be rid of them. Should this persecution have no effect on the rich man inside, they by means of a brass lotá and an iron rod madden the most phlegmatic Bébu, who pays liberally for their departure. The Bengali Bhét is as a rule uneducated, and very few know Sanskrit."

At weddings in Behar it is one of the duties of the Bhét to march out several miles to meet the bridegroom's procession, bearing with him a letter of welcome from the bride's father, and to conduct them to the bride's house. For these services, and for reciting verses and making himself generally useful, he receives presents of money and clothes. In some Behar districts and in parts of Chota Nagpur Bhéts hold small parcels of land, usually about three or four bighás in extent, rent-free under the tenure known as bhátottar. Such grants are mostly of rather ancient date, and are regarded with disfavour by the landholders of to-day, who look more to Government as the fountain of honour, and do not make much account of the Bhét. A few Bhéts have risen to be zamindars or tenure-holders, but the bulk of the caste are occupancy raiyats, cultivating by means of hired labourers and disdaining to touch the plough themselves.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Bhats in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>369</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>140</td>
<td>1,361</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>1,484</td>
<td>1,151</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hozarh</td>
<td>176</td>
<td>227</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>E. Parganas</td>
<td>117</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>113</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munsoreadabad</td>
<td>155</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahi</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>173</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Begusar</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>64</td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>370</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koch Behar</td>
<td>125</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansingh</td>
<td>137</td>
<td>623</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,983</td>
<td>3,888</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>7,863</td>
<td>4,968</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bahadur</td>
<td>7,181</td>
<td>12,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>5,368</td>
<td>5,388</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Messnerpur</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>18,062</td>
<td>15,944</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>5,153</td>
<td>6,988</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>1,752</td>
<td>2,041</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Basalpur</td>
<td>2,975</td>
<td>2,464</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>1,159</td>
<td>1,988</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mailah</td>
<td>158</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>759</td>
<td>879</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>4,699</td>
<td>5,016</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>102</td>
<td>131</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Salanore</td>
<td>876</td>
<td>288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>331</td>
<td>924</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>1,152</td>
<td>976</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardagri</td>
<td>1,184</td>
<td>9,988</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>99</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Machhbul</td>
<td>678</td>
<td>1,146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>469</td>
<td>1,035</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bhát, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Bhatá, brinjal, a totemistic sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Bhatan, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bhátásan, a mul or section of the Naomulí or Goriá sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Bháter, Bhátes, a section of the Sámulí Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Bhatgaián, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bháthidár, a manufacturer or seller of spirituous liquor; a title of Kalwárs in Behar.

Bhátiárá, probably from bhát, 'boiled rice,' a class of Mahomedans who keep inns or eating-houses and also sell tobacco. Their female relatives are often of indifferent character.

Bhátipa, a low mendicant caste in Bengal who live by dancing, juggling, and singing.

Bhátnágár, a sub-caste of Káyasts and of Nágars in Behar.

Bhatore, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bhátpárá, a samáj or local group of the Páschátya Baidik Brahmans in the 24-Parganas.

Bhatihrári, a religious group of Jugis.

Bhatt or Bhatta, a learned Brahman. In some parts of India it specially designates a Brahman who professes a knowledge of the Vedas or belongs to a family in which they have been taught.

Bhátta, a gáin of the Káyasa gotra of Ráhí Brahmans in Bengal. A title of Brahmans who officiate as priests for the Sukli caste.

Bháttácháírj, Bháttácháírjí, a learned Brahman who teaches any branch of Sanskrit literature. In Bengal it is also applied to any respectable Brahman performing the functions of a priest.

Bhatta Misra, a group of the Srotriya sub-caste of Utka Brahmans in Orissa.

Bhatta Rāi, a thar of the Bāsishtha gotra of Nepāli Brahmans.

Bhattasarí, a gāin of the Bātṣya gotra of Bārendra Brahmanas in Bengal.

Bhattavā, a thar or section of Nepāli Brahmanas.

Bhatuntara, a sub-caste of Karans in Orissa.

Bhaumik, a title of Brahmanas and Kochhs; also conferred on petty landholders by the Nawabs of Dacca.

Bhaunrajpurī, a section of Sonāras in Behar.

Bhawanīá, a section of the Bāranvār sub-caste of Baniyās in Behar.

Bhedbakārār, a pur or section of Sākadwipi Brahmanas.

Bhekh, a mul or section of the Kanaujia sub-caste of Sonāras in Behar.

Bheloriā, a section of Bāhans in Behar.

Bheludih, a mul or section of the Naomuliā or Majraut sub-caste of Goālās in Behar.

Bhengra, a horse, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bherápákri, a pur or section of Sākadwipi Brahmanas in Behar.

Bhetti, Bhertiā, a synonym for Gareri, the shepherd caste of Behar, who also weave and sell blankets.

Bhikhāri, a mendicant, a beggar.

Bhilār, a section of Kamārkalla Sonāras in Behar.

Bhimkālī, a gāin of the Bātṣya gotra of Bārendra Brahmanas in Bengal.

Bhin, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Bhināsa, S. binda, destroyed, occupier of a deserted village, a sub-sept of the Nah-pá sept of Sherpa Bhotias of Nepal.

Bhind, a synonym for Bind.

Bhindhini, a synonym for Kāmar in Singbhum.

Bhindowār, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goālās in Behar.

Bhingraj, king crow, a totemistic sept of Chiks, Lohars, Mundas, and Pátors in Chota Nagpur.

Bhinjo, a yellow bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bhishak, a synonym for Bai-dya in Bengal.

Bhogā, a sub-caste of Goālās in Bengal who castrate bulls.

Bhogta, Bhogtā, a sub-caste of Bhuiyās in Behar, engaged in service and agriculture. They worship Masān, Dāk, and other inferior gods. In Chota Nagpur, a sub-caste of Goālās; a title of Goālās in Behar. A sub-tribe of Kharwārs in Southern Lohardagā; a title and a sept of Kharwars and a section of Rajwārs in Chota Nagpur.
Bhojpura, a section of Oraons in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Bhojpuri, a sub-caste of Beldars, Dosadh, Halwais, Nuniyas, Sonars, Rajputs, and Tamlulis in Behar; also a group of the Raut Mehtar sub-caste of Dom; a section of the Bhuiyans and Kharidhá Kalwars, and of Pachainyas Doms in Behar.

Bhojraj, a kind of medicine, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Bhojyak, a synonym for Sákadwipi Brahman.

Bhokwár, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Bhalak, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahman in Behar.

Bhomápoli, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bhora, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhoti, a mull or section of the Naomulía or Majrút sub-caste of Gosális in Behar.

Bhownrá, a hornet, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bhritta, a hired servant or labourer.

Bhuá, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Bhuan, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Bhubankuri, a hypergamous group of Kaibarttas in Bakarganj.

Bhudeva, a synonym for Brahman.

Bhughi, a mull or section of the Magháy sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Bhui, Bhuin, a title of Dakshin-Ráhí and Bangaja Káyasths.

Bhuíá, a title of Kewats in Orissa.

Bhuián, a tribe, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bhuídhar, Bhuinsundar, a synonym for Bhuinmáli, q.v.

Bhuihara, a title of Maithil Brahman in Behar.

Bhui Kaibarta, a synonym for Haliá Kaibartta, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas who have taken to agriculture.

Bhuínhr, a synonym for Bábhan.

Bhuinhár, Bhuíyá, a title of the Bhumij tribe in Manbhum, and of Mundas and Oraons in Chota Nagpur, denoting their status as tenants of bhujnhar lands.

Bhuínhar-Munda, a sub-tribe of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bhuinkora, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Bhuiñmáli, Bhusundar, a cultivating, palanquin-bearing, and menial caste of Eastern Bengal, generally considered to be the remnant of an aboriginal tribe which embraced Hinduism, and accepted a servile position in relation to the Hindus of Eastern Bengal. This is likely enough, as instances are not wanting where it can be shown that the demand for labour in servile occupations, such as palanquin-bearing, was met by admitting aborigines to limited participation in the privileges of Hindus. In Dinajpur the names Harì and Bhúinmáli are used as synonyms, and it seems probable that the Bhúinmális of the east are really the Harís of other parts of Bengal disguised under a more high-sounding name. According to Dr. Wise, the Dacca Bhúinmális assert that they were originally Súdras, degraded in consequence of the following absurd incident: Parvatí obtained permission from her husband, Siva, to give a feast to her worshippers on earth. All castes were assembled at the entertainment, and in the midst of the enjoyment a luckless Bhúinmáli was overheard saying, “If I had such a beautiful woman in my house, I would cheerfully perform the most menial offices for her.” Siva did not allow the speaker to retract what he said, but gave him a beautiful wife and made him her sweeper. In confirmation of this legend a Bengali proverb defines the Bhúinmáli as the only Hindu ever degraded for love of garbage.

The Bhúinmáli caste has two main sub-castes, the Bāra-bhágiyā and Chhotta-bhágiyā, who never intermarry or hold social intercourse with each other. The former are chiefly cultivators, musicians, and palki-bearers; the latter scavengers, looking down with contempt on the Dom, Mehtar, and Halálkhors, who, after work, enter their houses without bathing, and allow their females to labour at the same offensive trade. At Sarálí, in Tipperah, Bhúinmális keep swine, but these recreants are not acknowledged as brethren. In certain villages the Bhúinmális has ceased to be a professional musician and become a chaukidār, or watchman. No member of the caste ever keeps a shop, as he would have no customers, while want of capital precludes him from engaging in trade. A third division of the Bhúinmáli caste is known as Mitra Seni Beháras, tracing their descent from Mitra Sen, the reputed son or relative of Ballál Sen, and claiming to be the original bearers of Bengal. They cultivate the soil, and are in great request as household servants by Hindu families. Although the same Brahman officiates, the cultivating Bará-bhágiyá despises the cultivating Mitra Sení, and declines to eat with them. These palanquin-bearers, again, will not carry torches, and look down upon those who do.

Although the caste has split up into divisions, following special occupations, the Bhúinmáli is properly one of the village servants employed in cutting down brushwood, repairing footpaths, sweeping the outside of the zamindár’s house, removing carcases from the village, and preparing the maroṣcha or marriage area, for doing which he receives one rupee, if the marriage is that of a village boy, and eight annas if that of a girl. He is likewise the masálichi engaged to carry the torch at Hindu weddings. A Bhúinmáli sweeper never enters a Hindu house to pollute it; but a maiden, called dásī or ohhokri, is engaged to sweep the floors of rooms and passages. Bhúinmális women are sometimes employed as midwives or domestic servants.

The Bhúinmális levels the space where the śrēddha is held, constructs the small shed in which the votive offerings are placed, and, when a sacrifice is to be made, smeers the ground with cowdung.
If the victim is killed in the morning, the flesh is distributed among Brahmans and clean Súdras; but if it is a sandhyá or evening sacrifice, everything, including the cloth by which the animal is bound, becomes the perquisite of the Bhuínmáli. He also prepares and plasters the mound on which the Vástú Puja is celebrated, receiving the ram as his remuneration, and, whenever a new house is built, he smears cowdung over the sides only, as he would lose caste if he touched the interior. Hindus of all castes smear the inside and steps of their own houses, but never those of others. The Bhuínmáli is the only native who will bedaub a strange house.

The gotras among the Bhuínmáli of Dacca are Parásara and Aliman, the latter being only found along the banks of the old Brahmaputra. Both have clearly been borrowed from the higher castes. Marriage within the gotra is not prohibited. The caste has a degraded Brahman as urohi, and their washermen and barbers are members of the caste. The Bhuínmáli generally worship Krishna, and celebrate all the popular Hindu festivals. Along the Lakhya "Káwaj," who is probably the same as Kwázah Khizr, is invoked, as is also Pir Badr. Like the Hindu and Muhammedan peasantry generally, the Bhuínmáli abstains from work during the three days known as "Ambuváchá," which last from the tenth to the thirteenth of the waning moon of Ashár (June–July), when the earth is believed to be impure and no Hindu can dig, plough, or even touch it.

Although most anxious to represent themselves as Súdras, by aping the prejudices of the higher ranks, the Bhuínmáli are contemned, and obliged to live on the outskirts of villages apart from the Hindus, and to perform any menial work that is required of them. Like other low castes, the Bhuínmáli now-a-days have abjured pork. Until the last twenty years they associated on friendly terms with the Chandals, and would eat in a Chandal’s house. They now decline to eat with, or even to work for, members of this caste, although they serve others quite as low.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Bhuínmális in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>.....</td>
<td>.....</td>
<td>Jalsígori</td>
<td>178</td>
<td>483</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>78</td>
<td>453</td>
<td>Kuchí Sahar</td>
<td>361</td>
<td>261</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>92</td>
<td>381</td>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>7,067</td>
<td>12,282</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>91</td>
<td>Baripdpur</td>
<td>1,255</td>
<td>2,283</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>3,666</td>
<td>3,825</td>
<td>Bararganj</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>4,236</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>603</td>
<td>600</td>
<td>Málmanáth</td>
<td>633</td>
<td>19,484</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>Chitagong</td>
<td>1,418</td>
<td>1,418</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshuda-bad</td>
<td>2,428</td>
<td>2,428</td>
<td>Noakháli</td>
<td>1,943</td>
<td>9,354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>729</td>
<td>5,022</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>5,472</td>
<td>12,490</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahiy</td>
<td>1,195</td>
<td>1,195</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>2,100</td>
<td>2,878</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Seangpur</td>
<td>3,771</td>
<td>5,083</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boera</td>
<td>658</td>
<td>654</td>
<td>Mámblána</td>
<td>683</td>
<td>683</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>6,408</td>
<td>6,408</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bhulpurán, a title of Purans Bhuinputra, a title of Kaibart-tas in Moharbanj. Bhuinputra, a title of Kaibart-tas in Bengal.
BHUIST.

BHUIYA.

BHUIST. a synonym for Sáñadwipi Brahmanas.

Bhuiyá, Bhuiyá, Bhuiyán, Bhuihá, Bhumiá, Mushá, Naik Khandáyát, Khandáyát-Pák, Ghatwál, Ghatédá, Tákáyát, Purán, Rajédá, Rai, Rai-Bhuiyá, Ber-Bhuiyá, Sardár. The bewildering array of synonyms which stands at the head of this article suggests a problem of great importance to ethnological research in India — the question what value can properly be attached to the names of tribes and castes as we find them at the present day. Are such names mainly fortuitous, deriving their origin from such accidents as locality, occupation, habit, and the like; or do they take us back to periods of remote antiquity and furnish clues that may safely be followed to the actual descent and true affinities of the human aggregates which they now serve to distinguish? Take, for example, the name Bhuiyá. Are we to regard this as the original designation of a tribe, once compact, which has now spread into the ends of the earth and disguised itself — ταλαίων ονομάτων ἐπάνωμος — under a variety of titles, which in course of time have come to be the badges of distinct endogamous groups; or, should we rather say, that the word Bhuiyá is itself no tribal name at all, but a mere title conferred on or assumed by many groups of men in different parts of India, on the strength in each case of their real or supposed claim to be deemed the original settlers and first clearers of the soil? If we adopt the former view, we are led to infer that all tribes or castes calling themselves Bhuiyá are offshoots from one original stock; while the latter theory points to no such general conclusion, and leaves us to account for the various groups which use this title in a more or less pronounced and exclusive fashion. Most of the authorities who have written about the Bhuiyás have assumed at starting that the name must be a genuine tribal designation of very ancient date, and have thus been led into speculations which in my judgment rest on a very scanty foundation of ascertained fact. Thus Buchanan, finding in Bhagalpur, Behar, and Dinajpur a number of people calling themselves Bhuniyas, seems to take it for granted that they all come of one stock. His line of argument on this point is not free from obscurity, but it certainly goes perilously near to identifying the distinctly non-Aryan Bhuiyás of North Bhagalpur and Dinajpur with the highly Aryan Bábhans of Behar, who assume the title Bhuniyá or Bhuhá with reference to their claims upon the land. Sir George Campbell travels still further afield, and suggests that the Bhuiyás of Bengal are connected with the Buis of Madras and the Central Provinces. Colonel Dalton thinks this opinion probable, adding that the Bhuiyá features are on the whole of a Tamulian cast, and that the tribe is found in its greatest strength and purity on the southern frontier of Bengal. The reference to the Bárah Bhuiyás of Assam, which 1 Eastern India, vol. ii, p. 426. Buchanan spells the name Bhungiys, but this is obviously an attempt to transliterate the nasal n with which the word is usually written.

---

2 Ethnology, p. 139.
follows, leaves it uncertain whether Colonel Dalton looked upon them also as an offshoot of the same stock as the Bhuiyás of Bengal; but it is clear from several passages in his account of the latter that he regarded them as a distinct tribe extending from Eastern and Northern Bengal to the southern borders of Chota Nagpur. His remark that "there are grounds for supposing that some of the noblest families in Bengal are sprung from this race, and they still hold high positions in the Jungle and Tributary Maháls" may even be taken to imply acceptance of Buchanan's identification of Bhuiyás and Bhunihár-Bábhans, but this point is not entirely clear.

It seems to me that the history of the Bárah Bhuiyás of Assam and Eastern Bengal should of itself be sufficient to throw suspicion on a theory which admittedly rests on the basis of a mere resemblance of names. In an article published in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, the late Dr. James Wise worked out with the patience and thoroughness which mark all his researches the obscure history of these twelve Bhuiyás or landlords, and showed that their designation had so little of a tribal character about it that at least one of them was a Mahomedan. They were in fact merely territorial chiefs of portions of Eastern Bengal or Assam. Nor is this state of things confined to the twelve historical Bhuiyás. The title survives in Assam at the present day as the designation of several forms of landholding rights. So in Chota Nagpur the Bhumij of Manbhum and the Oraons and Mundas of Lohardaga habitually use the term to denote a certain class of tenants who claim to hold large areas of land at privileged rates of rent in consideration of their being the descendants of the first clearers of the soil. In the Tributary States of Gángpur and Bonai the leading vassals of the chief are called Bhuiyás, both as members of a distinct tribe and in virtue of their status in connexion with the land; in Behar we find the high-caste Bábhan and the despised Musahar alike styling themselves Bhuiyá or Bhuinhár, though the latter have at the present day no special status in relation to the land. Lastly, in Rajputáná the term Bhumí or Bhuiyá denotes Rajputs who hold land on a tribal tenure in virtue of their descent through a particular line.

Seeing, then, how wide is the area over which the term Bhuiyá is distributed; that it ranges from Assam to Rajputáná and from Behar to Madras; and that its use is elastic enough to include Rajputs and Bhumij, Mahomedans and Oraons, we should, I think, hesitate and demand some independent evidence of affinity before we pronounce it to be an original tribal designation, and accept the conclusion that all tribes which bear the name at the present day are sprung from a common stock. Further doubt is thrown upon this inference by the fact that the word Bhuiyá is itself a Sanskrit derivative, and is always associated with some sort of claim to the privileged tenure of land. Were it a genuine tribal name, we might expect that its etymology would be traceable to one of the non-Aryan languages, and that it would attach to groups defined rather by descent than by territorial status.

Although, however, the evidence, taken as a whole, goes to show that the title Bhuiyá does not necessarily denote a large original circle of tribal affinity, embracing all manner of men who now belong to separate groups, it by no means follows that there are no distinct tribes bearing the name. Among the Dravidian races of Western Bengal and Chota Nagpur large endogamous groups are certainly found who call themselves Bhuiyã and believe this to be their original designation. It may well be doubted whether their belief is correct, but the point is not very material for our present purpose. Among a considerable proportion of the non-Aryan tribes of Bengal a Sanskrit derivative has displaced the original tribal name so completely that in some cases no trace of the latter can now be discerned; and as often as not it happens that the name now sanctioned by actual usage may plausibly be referred to locality or to supposed rights in respect of the land. It is easy to see how this might happen. The advanced guard of the Aryan immigrants pressing forward in quest of land, and seeking a name for the alien races whom they found in possession of scanty clearings in the forest-clad tract of Central India, whither they had themselves been driven, would naturally ignore the tribal names of the groups with which they came in contact, and would call the strangers Bhuiyã or children of the soil. In course of time, as the Aryan domination grew, the name conferred by the conquering race would abide, and the older savage designations would pass away and be forgotten. But wherever the title of Bhuiyã, conferred in this rough general fashion by the new settlers on all the non-Aryans whom they came across, chanced to be adopted by a compact tribe, it would become the tribal name of that aggregate, and would be used by them for the purpose of describing themselves collectively. Thus, it would seem, may have arisen the distinction, well known in most parts of Chota Nagpur, between a ‘Bhuiyã by tribe’ and a ‘Bhuiyã by title.’ The Bhuiyãs of Bonai and Keunjhar described by Colonel Dalton belong to the former category; the Bhumij, Mundas, and Oraons to the latter. The distinction will be made somewhat clearer if it is explained that every ‘tribal Bhuiyã’ will as a matter of course describe himself as Bhuiyã, while a member of the other tribes mentioned in the last sentence will only call himself Bhuiyã if he is speaking with reference to a question of land, or desires for some special reason to lay stress on his status as a landholder or agriculturist.

It is a plausible conjecture that the tribal Bhuiyãs, properly so called, as distinguished from the titular Bhuiyãs of other tribes or castes, may have had their original settlements in the Tributary States to the south of the Chota Nagpur plateau. In Gangpur, Bonai, Keunjhar, and Bamra the organisation of the tribe is more complete than elsewhere, and the name Bhuiyã is unequivocally recognised as the tribal designation. They form also a substantial proportion of the population of Singbhum, but their position there is less assured than in the Tributary States, and tradition avers that in the western and southern parts of the district they were subjugated by the Hos. Further north they seem to have been displaced in Lohardaga by the Mundas and Oraons, and in Manbhum by the Bhumij, for in those districts their settlements are scattered and weak. In Hazaribagh the tribe again gathers strength, and in Southern Behar we meet with Bhuiyas in large numbers bearing the opprobrious name of Musahar or rat-eater, but invariably calling themselves by their original tribal designation, which in Behar at any rate is not associated with any claim to hold land on privileged terms. The present distribution of the tribe seems in fact to accord fairly well with the hypothesis that the south of the Chota Nagpur country may have been their original centre of distribution. Spreading from that point, their social fortunes seem to have been determined by the character of the people with whom they came in contact. The stronger non-Aryan tribes—Mundas, Hos, and Santals—cut like a wedge through the line of the Bhuiya advance towards the north; a small number successfully established themselves in Hazaribagh beyond the range of Mundas, while those who travelled furthest in this direction fell under the domination of Hindus in Behar, and were reduced to the servile status which the Musahars now occupy. Travelling southward from the assumed centre, the conditions appear to have been more favourable, and the tendency has been for the Bhuiyas to rise rather than to decline in social status. Some of their leading families have come to be chiefs of the petty States of Orissa, and have merged their identity in the claim to quasi-Rajput descent. The main body of the southern colonists furnished the tribal militia of Orissa, and have now sunk the Bhuiya in the Khandait or Swordsman—a caste of admitted respectability in Orissa, and likely in course of time to transform itself into some variety of Rajput.

Writing of the Bhuiyas of Gangpur and Bonai, Colonel Dalton says:—

“They are a dark-brown, well-proportioned race, with black straight hair, plentiful on the head, but scant on the face; of middle height, figures well-knit and capable of enduring great fatigue, but light-framed like the Hindu, rather than presenting the usual muscular development of a hill-man. The features are very much of the same cast throughout. The cheek and jaw-bones are projecting, so as to give a breadth and squareness to the face. The nose is but slightly elevated, still neither so depressed nor so broad at the root as the generality of Turanian noses, and rather of a retroussé type; mouths and teeth well formed, and the facial angle generally good. The eyes well shaped and straight, but never very large or deep set.”

The Keunjhar Hill Bhuiyas, on the other hand, “are rather of an exaggerated Turanian type; very large mouths, thick and somewhat projecting lips, foreheads narrow and low but not receding, eyes dark, but well-shaped, hair plentiful on the head, though rather frizzly and generally scanty on face, but to this there are notable exceptions; short of stature, averaging about five feet two inches, round shouldered, and many of them with the lump that is produced by the displacement of the muscles in carrying loads banghy fashion. The colour of the skin varies from a deep chocolate, the predominating tint, to tawny.” Further north, again, in the country round Pàramnáth Hill, the landholders, though pretending to be Kshatriyas, are believed by Colonel Dalton to be Bhuiyás, and are described as swarthy, almost black in complexion, and with coarse, Negro-like features.

The traditions of the tribe vary greatly in different parts of the country, and in many cases refer merely to local migrations of recent date, which give no clue to their real affinities. Colonel Dalton says that the Bhuiyás to the south of Singbhum call themselves Pawan bane, 'the children of the wind,' to this day; and connecting this with Hanumán’s title Pawan-ka-pat, 'son of the wind,' suggests that the Bhuiyás are the veritable apes of the Rámáyana. The coincidence no doubt is curious, but can hardly be pressed to the point of associating a particular tribe with the epithet by which the early Aryans indicated their sense of the marked racial difference between themselves and the non-Aryans of Central India. With a single exception, their other traditions are valueless. This is the fact that all Bhuiyás, from the Musahars of Behar to the Khandait-Paiks of Southern Lohardagá, affect great reverence for the memory of Rikhmun or Rikhíasan, whom they regard, some as a patron deity, others as a mythical ancestor, whose name distinguishes one of the divisions of the tribe. It seems probable that in the earliest stage of belief Rikhmun was the bear-totem of a sept of the tribe, that later on he was transformed into an ancestral hero, and finally promoted to the rank of a tribal god. However this may be, his cult is peculiar to the Bhuiyás, and serves to link together the scattered branches of the tribe.

The internal structure of the Bhuiyás is intricate and confusing, and illustrates the disorganisation which sets in when a tribe becomes scattered over a wide range of country, and is exposed to different religious and social influences. An examination of the groups into which they have now been broken up may throw some light upon the causes which work towards the disintegration of tribes and the formation of castes out of their fragments. The Bhuiyás of the Tributary States may be taken to represent the original nucleus of the tribe. They form at present a compact body, marrying among themselves, and secure in the possession of the ancestral landed tenures. Some of the chiefs have transformed themselves into Rajputs, but the memory of the tribal bond between them and their Bhuiyá vassal is preserved by the usage, described in detail below, which requires the former to seek investiture at the hands of the principal Bhuiyá.

In Orissa and parts of Lohardagá the practice of military service paid for in land has become the distinctive characteristic, and an offshoot of the Bhuiyá tribe has parted from the parent body and assumed an independent existence as the Khandait caste. The social conditions of Orissa and the comparative weakness of its caste system seem to have favoured this development, so that the Khandaits now occupy rather a high place in the scale of precedence, and many of them look down upon the original stock and disown the tribal name.

In Behar the converse process has been at work. The Bhuiyá colonists of that part of the country fell under the domination of people stronger than themselves. Unlike their brethren in Orissa, they were in no demand as soldiers, while the swords of Rajputs and Bāḥans were to be had for the asking. So the Bhuiyās found their level as landless workers in the fields; serving the men of the sword, who would not touch the plough; and their Hindu masters named them Musahars, from their non-Aryan practice of eating field-mice. Cut off geographically from the original nucleus of the tribe, and socially degraded by their unclean habits of food, they have now finally taken rank among the low castes of Behar. Known to the Hindus as Musahar or mouse-eater, they still treasure among themselves, as a sort of distinction, the old tribal name of Bhuiyā, which, as we have seen above, the Khandaits of Orissa are eager to cast off. These two groups—the Musahar caste of Behar and the Khandaī caste of Orissa—mark for the Bhuiyā tribe the extremes of geographical and social displacement. Both are castes in the strict sense of the word, occupying a definite place in the systems to which they belong. One ranks high in the Orissa system, and tends on the whole to rise; the other is near the bottom of the social scale in Behar, and its prospects are not likely to improve.

"The Bhuiyās in Keonjhir," says Colonel Dalton, "are divided into four clans—the Māl or Desh Bhuiyās (they call themselves, and are called, the Desh-lok, or the people of the country), the Dandsena, the Khatī, and the Rājkūli Bhuiyās. The latter, as connected with the royal line, I should have placed first, but I give them in the order assigned to them by my informants. The Bhuiyās, it is said, twenty-seven generations ago stole a child of the Mohurbhanj Rājā's family, brought it up amongst them, and made it their Rājā. He was freely admitted to intercourse with Bhuiyā girls, and the children of this intimacy are the progenitors of the Rājkūli. But they are not considered first among Bhuiyās, because they are not of pure Bhuiyā descent."

The other divisions of the Bhuiyās need only be briefly noticed. The Ghatwél-Bhuiyās of Hazaribagh and the Santāl Parganas hold service tenures, and the Tikait-Bhuiyās are usually small zamindars. Both affect to be endogamous, reject the name Bhuiyā, and represent themselves as belonging to independent landholding castes, and both will probably sooner or later gain admission into the large and miscellaneous community of local Rajputs. In the Santāl Parganas Hāi-Bhuiyā and Ber or Bhar-Bhuiyā and Deswāli-Bhuiyā are mentioned as sub-castes; but it is not clear that these are anything more than titular distinctions, which may or may not have an occasional bearing upon marriage. In Manbhum, on the other hand, the Kāṭrās-Bhuiyā, Musahar-Bhuiyā, and Dhorā-Bhuiyā seem to be true sub-castes.

Our information regarding the exogamous system of the tribe is unfortunately rather incomplete. We know nothing of the rules followed by the Bhuiyās of the Tributary States, where we might look for the closest adherence to primitive usage. In Singbhum a number of exogamous groups are recognised, and a man may not marry a woman belonging to his own group. Beyond this circle marriage is regulated by the ordinary method of counting prohibited degrees from the generation of the parents. The Musahar-Bhuiyás, too, who are shown in Appendix I as a distinct caste under the heading Musahar, have a long list of exogamous sections to which the ordinary rules apply. But among the Bhuiyás of Lohardagá and Hazaribagh the common tribal system of exogamy appears to be falling into disuse, and many groups which were at one time exogamous now admit of marriage within the group. I have endeavoured to represent the complex and obscure relations of the various divisions of the tribe in the Table given under the heading Bhuiyá in Appendix I, but the data available were in many cases far from perfect.

Among the Bhuiyás of the Tributary States, a girl rarely marries before she is fully grown up. Great freedom of courtship is allowed, and “slips of morality, so long as they are confined to the tribe, are not much heeded.” Colonel Dalton describes a curious and graceful custom by which the young men of one village pay a visit of courtship to the maidens of another, offering presents and receiving a meal, after which they spend the night in dancing and singing. He also mentions the fact that the bachelors always sleep together in a large house set apart for that purpose, and that in some villages the girls also have a house to themselves, where they spend the night with no one to look after them. In Singbhum these Arca-dian habits seem to have died out, and infant-marriage, though by no means universal, is said to be gaining ground among the tribe. Khandaita, Tikaita, Ghatwals, and for the most part all landholding Bhuiyás in Hindu surroundings, marry their daughters as infants when they can get husbands for them. The two latter groups, however, are comparatively small, and their members are put to some difficulty in finding husbands within their own class; so that with them, as with the pseudo-Rajputs of Chota Nagpúr, girls often remain unmarried until they have long passed the age of puberty. Musahars, on the other hand, still hold to adult-marriage.

Polygamy is allowed, and, in theory at least, a man may have as many wives as he can maintain. Few, however, can afford the luxury of more than one, and custom does not favour the taking of a second wife except when the first is barren. A widow may marry again by the sagai form, and it is usual, though not compulsory, for her to marry her late husband’s younger brother. If she marries an outsider, her children by her late husband belong as of right to his family, although children at the breast are usually left in her charge till they are big enough to be independent of their mother. Marriage with an elder brother is strictly forbidden.

Divorce is permitted, with the sanction of the pancháyat of the tribe, if the wife be proved unchaste, if the husband neglect to maintain her, or if either party suffer from an incurable disease, such as leprosy or impotence. A divorced woman may marry again by the sagai form, unless she has been guilty of a liaison with a man of a lower caste, in which case any Bhuiyá who married her would render himself liable to expulsion from the community. An intrigue

1 Dalton’s Ethnology, p. 143.
within the tribe or with a man of respectable caste admits of being condoned by a fine, and does not operate as a bar to remarriage.

Colonel Dalton has the following remarks on the religion of the Bhuiyas in the Tributary State of Bonai:

"They have their own priests, called deoris, and their sacred groves, called 'deota sara,' dedicated to four deities—Dásúm Pát, Bámóní Pát, Koisar Pát, and Borám. The three first are brethren, but there was some difference of opinion as to whether Bámóní was male or female.
Borám is the sun, also worshipped under the name of Dharm Deota, as with the Orsoms. The three minor deities are represented by stones in the sara, but Borám has no representation. Borám, as the first and greatest of gods and as the creator, is invoked at the sowing season with the offering of a white cook. In cases of sickness goats are offered to Dásúm Pát and his brethren. On such occasions the goat is given by the owner of the house in which the sick person resides. On other occasions the victim is provided by the community.
The sacrifices are all offered at the foot of trees in the sara; only men partake of the meat. The deori gets the head."

The Bhuiyés of Southern Lohardagá have advanced somewhat further on the path of orthodox Hinduism, but do not regularly employ Bráhmans, except, as has been stated above, at the marriage ceremony. On certain occasions, however, Bráhmans are called in to recite mantras, and the tendency towards conformity with Hindu usage will doubtless go on spreading as the country is opened up by the gradual improvement of communications. Already Thakuráni Mái, the 'bloodthirsty tutelary goddess' to whom, only twenty years ago,¹ the Hill Bhuiyés of Keonjhar offered the head of the obnoxious Dewan of their chief, has been transformed, in Singbhum and Lohardagá, into the Hindu Dúrgá, to whom a Bhuiyá priest makes offerings of goats, sheep, etc., which are afterwards partaken of by the worshippers. Changes of this sort raise an impassable barrier against researches into the origin of things, so that vestiges of the earlier beliefs of the people must be sought rather among the gods of the village and of the family than among the recognised at majores of popular worship. Thus the communal ghosts Darógá, Kudrá, Kudrí, Dáño, Pacheriá, Haserwár, Pakáhi, with their ill-defined functions and general capacity for mischief and malevolence, are clearly akin to the host of evil spirits which people the world of the Munda and Oron. To appease these ghosts by occasional offerings of fowls and rice, and thus to guarantee the community against the consequences of their ill-will, is the special function of the village Pahan, who levies small subscriptions for this sort of spiritual insurance. The tribal deities Ríkhmun and Tulsibir belong to a different and less primitive type. Ríkhmun, as has been mentioned above, is believed to be the original ancestor of the tribe; while Tulsibir was a restless and valorous Bhuiyá, who made war upon the gods until they appeased his wrath by admitting him to divine honours. I venture the conjecture that both Ríkhmun and Tulsibir are merely transmuted

¹ 1st May 1868. Dalton's Ethnology, p. 147.
totems, in the hope that further enquiries among the more primitive Bhuiyás may bring out evidence on this point. Neither of these gods has special priests; their worship is conducted by any elder of the tribe. Sheep, goats, pigs, sweetmeats, and wine are the usual offerings, which afterwards furnish a feast for the assembled votaries. Snakes are only worshipped by those families which have lost one of their members by snake-bite. A certain herb, known as gandhari sāv, and used as condiment, must be worshipped once a year, and can only be eaten if this rule is complied with. The custom suggests that the herb must once have been a totem of the tribe, but this cannot be certainly ascertained to be the case.

The following table shows the number and distribution of Bhuiyás in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>1,615</td>
<td>1,197</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>234</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>277</td>
<td>2,031</td>
<td>Tribhut</td>
<td>1,908</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>270</td>
<td>700</td>
<td>Sarkar</td>
<td>63</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>11,558</td>
<td>7,923</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>113</td>
<td>227</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>Monastery</td>
<td>6,993</td>
<td>4,378</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24 Parganas</td>
<td>817</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>Bhawalpur</td>
<td>33,135</td>
<td>29,507</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>786</td>
<td>701</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>177</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jansore</td>
<td>338</td>
<td>78</td>
<td>Maidan</td>
<td>104</td>
<td>298</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>940</td>
<td>153</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>81,848</td>
<td>71,725</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajabahye</td>
<td>77</td>
<td>258</td>
<td>Faizabad</td>
<td>572</td>
<td>528</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankpore</td>
<td>191</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>30,734</td>
<td>36,583</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>138</td>
<td>Harrison</td>
<td>157</td>
<td>151,043</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>40,008</td>
<td>20,189</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>Sylhet</td>
<td>15,978</td>
<td>9,673</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainaminit</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>Manchhum</td>
<td>31,661</td>
<td>35,597</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>21,458</td>
<td>34,274</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>90,869</td>
<td>3,735</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bhuiyá, a synonym for Kádar, a title of Báiis, Kapális, and Sunris in Bengal; a sept of Bhumíjas.

Bhuiyá-Páik, a synonym for Khandáit.

Bhujá, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Bhujári, a synonym for Kándu.

Bhukhar, a group of the Aoghar sect of Saiva ascetics founded in Guzerat by a Dasnámi mendicant named Brahma-giri. See Aogar.

Bhuktuá, a section of the Mahili-Munda sub-caste of Mahilas in Chota Nagpur.

Bhulá, a mul or section of the Naiyá caste in Behar.

Bhulúá, a sub-caste of Bhuin-mális, Dhubás, Júgis, Nápís, and of Kumbhás found in Noakhálí.

Bhulúá, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Noakhálí.

Bhumár, a sept of the Tung-jainya sub-tribe of Chakmas in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Bhumíá, a landlord, a proprietor of the soil; descendant of the founder of a village.

Bhumíj, a non-Aryan tribe of Manchhum, Singbhum, and Western Bengal, classed by Dalton and others, mainly on linguistic grounds, as Kolarian. There can be no doubt that the Bhumij are closely allied to, if not identical with, the Mundas; but there is little to show that they ever had a distinct language of their own. In 1850 Hodgson published a short vocabulary prepared by Captain Haughton, then in political charge of Singbhum; but most of the words in this appear to be merely Ho. The most recent observer, Herr Nottrott, of Gossner's Mission, says that the Bhumij resemble the Mundas most closely in speech and manners, but gives no specimens of their language, and does not say whether it differs sufficiently from Mundari to be regarded as a separate dialect. I am inclined myself to believe that the Bhumij are nothing more than a branch of the Mundas, who have spread to the eastward, mingled with the Hindus, and thus for the most part severed their connexion with the parent tribe. This hypothesis seems on the whole to be borne out by the facts observable at the present day. The Bhumij of Western Maubhnm are doubt pure Mundas. They inhabit the tract of the country which lies on both sides of the Subarnarekhá river, bounded on the west by the edge of the Chota Nagpur plateau, on the east by the hill range of which Ajodhya is the crowning peak, on the south by the Singbhum hills, and on the north by the hills forming the boundary between Lohardaga, Hazaribagh, and Manbhum districts. This region contains an enormous number of Mundari graveyards, and may fairly be considered one of the very earliest settlements of the Munda race. The present inhabitants use the Mundari language, call themselves Mundas, or, as the name is usually pronounced in Manbhum, Muras, and observe all the customs current among their brethren on the plateau of Chota Nagpur proper. Thus, like all the Kolarsians, they build no temples, but worship Burn in the form of a stone smeared with vermillion, which is set up in a sarna or sacred grove near the village. A sarna is invariably composed of purely jungle trees, such as sáñ and others, and can therefore be recognised with certainty as a fragment of the primeval forest, left standing to form an abiding place for the aboriginal deities. They observe the sarhul festival at the same time and in the same way as their kindred in Lohardaga and Singbhum, and the lâyá or priest is a recognised village official. Marriages take place when both parties are of mature age, and the betrothal of children is unknown. Like the Mundas of the plateau, they first burn their dead and then bury the remains under gravestones, some of which are of enormous size. On certain feast days small supplies of food and money are placed under these big stones to regale the dead, and are abstracted early the next morning by low-caste Hindus.

On the eastern side of the Ajodhya range, which forms a complete barrier to ordinary communication, all is changed. Both the Mundari language and the title of Munda have dropped out of use, and the aborigines of this eastern tract call themselves

---

2 Grammatik der Kóth-Sprache, p. 4.
Bhumij or Sardar, and talk Bengali. The physical characteristics of the race, however, remain the same; and although they have adopted Hindu customs and are fast becoming Hindus, there can be no doubt that they are the descendants of the Mundas who first settled in the country, and were given the name of Bhumij (autochthon) by the Hindu immigrants who found them in possession of the soil.

The early history of the tribe and its general characteristics are sketched by Colonel Dalton in the following passages:

"The Bhumij of the Jungle Mahals were once, under the nickname of chudri (robbers), the terror of the surrounding districts, and their various out-breaks were called chudris. On several occasions since they came under the British rule they have shown how readily a chudri may be improvised on very slight provocation. I do not know that on any occasion they rose, like the Mundaris, simply to redress their own wrongs. It was sometimes in support of a turbulent chief ambitious of obtaining power to which, according to the courts of law, he was not entitled; and it was sometimes to oppose the Government in a policy which they did not approve, though they may have had very little personal interest in the matter. Thus, in the year A.D. 1798, when the Panchet estate was sold for arrears of revenue, they rose and violently disturbed the peace of the country till the sale was cancelled. After hostilities had continued for some time, in reply to a very pacific message sent to them by the officer commanding the troops, they asked if the Government were going to sell any more estates. I do not think that the settlement of any one of the Bhumij Jungle Mahals was effected without a fight. In Dhalbhum the Raja resisted the interference of the British power, and the Government set up a rival; but after various failures to establish his authority they set him aside and made terms with the rebel. In Barabhum there was at one time a disputed succession. The courts decided that the eldest born of Raja Viviká Narayan, though the son of the second wife, should succeed in preference to the son of the first wife, the Pat Rani. The Bhumij did not approve of the decision, and it was found necessary to send a military force to carry it out. This was the origin of the last disturbance, known as Gangá Narayan's rebellion, which broke out in 1832. Lakshman, the son of the Pat Rani alluded to above, continuing to oppose his brother, was arrested, and died in jail, leaving a son, Gangá Narayan. On the death of Raja Raghunáth Singh he also was succeeded by the son of his second Rani, who was declared by the Supreme Court to be heir, in opposition to a claim again set up by Mádhab Singh, the younger son, but the son of the Pat Rani; but failing in his suit, Mádhab Singh resigned himself to his fate, and was consolated by being appointed diván, or prime minister, to his brother. In this capacity he made himself thoroughly unpopular, more especially by becoming an usurious money-lender and extortionate grain-dealer, and soon Gangá Narayan found that, in opposing a man so detested, a majority of the people would side with him. Accordingly, in the month of April 1832 he, at the head of a large force of ghátwdls, made an attack on Mádhab Sinh and slew him. This foul crime was committed with great deliberation, cunning, and cruelty. Mádhab was seized and carried off to the hills to be sacrificed. Ganga Náráyan himself first smote him with his battle-axe, then each sardár ghátwdl was compelled to discharge an arrow at him, and thus all the leading ghátwdls became implicated in the plot. A system of plundering was then commenced, which soon drew to his standard all the chûârs—that is, all the Bhúmij of Barábhúm and adjoining estates. He attacked Barábázár, where the Rájá lived, burned the Munsí’s káchári and the police station, from which the police had fled, but three unfortunate peons (runners) of the Munsí’s court were caught and killed. The officials and the police fell back on Bardwan, and for some time Gangé Nárayán had the country at his mercy. He sacked every place worth plundering; but in November following a force was collected, consisting of three regiments of Native Infantry and eight guns, and military operations against the insurgents commenced. They were soon driven to take refuge in the hills, but being pressed there also Gangé Nárayán fled into Singbhóm, and endeavoured to enlist in his favour the reputed invincible and irrepressible Lárkás. They were just then at issue with one of the chiefs, who claimed supremacy over a portion of them, the Thákur of Kharsáwán; and though they were not unwilling to join in the row, they wished, before they committed themselves to Gangé Nárayán’s leadership, to test his capacity to lead. They therefore demanded that he should in the first place make an attack on the fort of the Thákur of Kharsáwán. In complying with this request he was killed, and the Thákur had the pleasure of sending his head to Captain Wilkinson with a letter quite in the style of Falstaff.

1 Ethnology of Bengal, p. 174.

“I have not been able to discover that the Bhúmij possess any independent traditions of migrations. Those who live in proximity to Chutiá Nángpur recognise no distinction between themselves and the Mundas. They intermarry and associate and coalesce in all matters indicating identity of race; for, though it may be said that they are not much troubled with caste prejudices, there is no portion of the old Indian population which is quite free from it. The Bhúmij farther east have become too Hinduised to acknowledge the relationship. The Dhalbúm Bhúmij consider themselves autochthones, and will not admit that they are in any way connected with the Mundas, Hos, or Santás. It is pretty certain that the sâminâdârs of all these estates are of the same race as their people, though the only man among them whom I found sensible enough to acknowledge this was the Rájá of Bághmúnd; the others all call themselves Kshattriyás or Rajputas, but they are not acknowledged as such by any true scion of that illustrious stock. In claiming to be Rajputs they do not attempt to connect themselves with any of the recognised families of the tribe, but each family has its own special legend of miraculous production. The family legend of the Rájá of Barábhúm may be given as a specimen of their skill in making pedigrees:—Nath Varáha and Kes Varáha, two brothers, quarrelled with their father, the Rája of Virát, and settled at the Court of Vikramáditya. (This has some connection with the tradition of the adjoining estate of Pótkum, the Rája of which claims descent from Vikramáditya.) Kes, the younger brother, was sawn into two pieces; and with his blood Vikram gave a tiká or mark on the forehead to the elder brother, and a pair of umbrellas, and told him that all the country he could ride round in a day and night should be his. Nath mounted his steed and accomplished a circuit of eight yojanas within the time specified in what is now Barábhum; and this must be all true, as the prints of his horse’s hoofs are still visible on the southern slopes of the hills. With one or two exceptions all the ghátwáls (captains of the border and their men) of the Bhumíj part of Mánbhúm and Singbhúm districts are Bhumíj, which is a sure indication of their being the earliest settlers. They were the people (like the Mundá Bhúinhárs in Chutiá Nágpur, the Bhuyáns in Bonáí, Gángpur, Keunjhár, etc., and Gonds in Sargújá and Udaipur) to whom the defence of the country was entrusted. The Bhumíj ghátwáls in Mánbhúm have now, after all their escapades, settled down steadily to work as guardians of the peace. The Rája of the extensive samíndári of Dhalbhúm is no doubt of Bhumíj extraction, but for him the Heralds’ College of the period failed to manipulate a Rájput descent. His ancestor was a washerman, who afforded refuge to the goddess Káli when, as Rankíni, she fled from a demon in Pánchet. The goddess, in gratitude, gave the washerman a young Brahmaní, a ward of her own, to wife, and the Rájas of Dhalbhúm are the descendants of this union. The origin of the story appears to be that a Bhumíj chief of Dhalbhúm, probably at the instigation of a Bráhman, stole from its shrine in Pánchet an image of Rankíni and set it up as his own tutelary deity. The shrine from which the image was abstracted is shown at the village of Párá, near Purúliá in Mánbhúm, and it became the popular object of worship in Dhalbhúm for all classes of people there. Rankíni especially rejoiced in human sacrifices. It is freely admitted that in former years children were frequently kidnapped and sacrificed at her shrine; and it cannot be very positively asserted that the practice of offering such victims has long been discontinued. At the shrine of this goddess a very cruel scene was enacted every year till 1885, when, with the concurrence of the samíndári, it was put a stop to. It was called the Bindaparab; and Gangá Náráyan probably had it in his mind when he so cruelly disposed of Mándhab Sinh. At this parab two male buffaloes are driven into a small enclosure, and on a raised stage adjoining and overlooking it the Rája and suite take up their position. After some ceremonies the Rája and his purohit or family priest discharge arrows at the buffaloes, others follow their example, and the tormented and enraged beasts fall to and gore each other, whilst arrow after arrow is discharged. When the animals are past doing very much mischief, the people rush in and hack at them with battle-axes till they are dead. The Santális and wild Kharríás, it is said, took delight in this festival; but I have not heard a murmur at its discontinuance, and this shows it had no great hold on the minds of the people. Many of the Bhúmi tribe are well off. Some of them, who are sardór ghátudála, are in virtue of their office proprietors of estates, comprising each from one to twenty manors; but as the most substantial tenants under them are also hereditary ghátudála rendering service and paying besides but a very low fixed rent, these ghátudáli estates are not so valuable to the proprietor as villages on the ordinary tenure would be. The Bhúmi live in commodious, well-built houses, and have all about them the comforts to which the better class of cultivators in Bengal are accustomed. Those who live quite amongst the Bengalis have retained few of their ancient customs; none, perhaps, except the great national amusement, the gay meetings for dance and song both at their villages and at játaras, which are characteristic of all Kols. In appearance they are inferior to the Hos of Singbhúm and to the best of the Mundas of Chutiá Nágpur. They are short of stature, but strongly built, and, like the Santálás, rather inclined to fleshiness. In complexion they are variable, like the Mundás, ranging from a dark chocolate to a light brown colour; they observe many of the Hindu festivals, but retain their sacred groves, in which they still sacrifice to the old gods. They have generally left off eating cow's flesh, in which their unreformed brethren in Singbhúm and Chutiá Nágpur indulge, but eat fowls. The Bhúmi have in a great degree lost the simplicity and truthfulness of character for which their cognates are generally distinguished. They have acquired from the Bengali Hindus the propensity to lie, but they have not the same assurance or powers of invention, and their lies are so transparent that they are easily detected."

The internal structure of the Bhúmi tribe is shown in Appendix I. The sub-tribes are numerous, and vary greatly in different districts. With the possible exception of the iron-smelting Shelo in Manbhum, the names of these groups seem to have reference to their supposed original settlements. It deserves notice that the tendency to form endogamous divisions seems to be stronger in outlying districts than it is at the recognised head-quarters of the tribe. Thus in Manbhum and Singbhúm we find only one sub-tribe Shelo, which obviously got detached from the parent group by reason of its members adopting, or perhaps declining to abandon, the comparatively degraded occupation of iron-smelting. In Midnapur, on the other hand, where the Bhúmi settlements are of comparatively recent date, we find five territorial sub-tribes in addition to the functional group of Shelo. The reason seems to be that when the stream of emigration is not absolutely continuous, successive sections of immigrants into distant parts of the country are affected in various degrees by the novel social influences to which they are exposed. Some groups become more rapidly Hinduised than others, and thus there arise divergences of usage in matters of food and drink, which constitute a bar to intermarriage, and in time lead to the formation of sub-tribes. These divisions often outlast the differences of custom and ritual from which they took their origin, and in some cases the prohibition of intermarriage comes to be withdrawn, and the names alone remain to show that such a prohibition was once in force. The exogamous divisions of the tribe are totemistic, and closely resemble those met with among the Mundas. The rule of exogamy is simple. A man may not marry a woman of his own sept, nor a woman who comes within the standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees, calculated as a rule to three generations in the descending line, but sometimes extended to five where bhaiyddi or mutual recognition of kinship has been maintained between the families.

The aboriginal usage of adult-marriage still holds its ground among the Bhumij, though the wealthier members of the tribe prefer to marry their daughters as infants. The extreme view of the urgent necessity of early marriage is unknown among them, and it is thought no shame for a man to have a grown-up daughter unmarried in his house. Sexual intercourse before marriage is more or less recognised, it being understood that if a girl becomes pregnant arrangements will at once be made to marry her to the father of her child. Brides are bought for a price ranging usually from Rs. 3 to Rs. 12, and the wedding may take place, according to arrangement, at the house of either party. When, as is more usual, it is celebrated at the bride's house, a square space (marua) is prepared in the courtyard (angan) by daubing the ground with rice-water. In the centre of this space branches of mahua and sidha trees are planted, bound together with five cowrie shells (Cypraea moneta) and five pieces of turmeric, and at the corners are set four earthen water-vessels connected by a cotton thread, which marks the boundary of the square. Each vessel is half filled with pulse, and covered with a concave lid, in which a small lamp burns. On the arrival of the bridegroom with his following of friends, he is led at once to the marua and made to sit on a bit of board (pira). The bride is then brought in and given a similar seat on his left hand. A sort of mimetic resistance to the introduction of the bride is often offered by her more distant female relatives and friends, who receive trifling presents for allowing her to pass.

After the bride has taken her seat and certain mantras or mystic formulas have been pronounced by the priest, usually a Bengal Brahman, the bridegroom proceeds to light the lamps at the corners of the square. As fast as each lamp is lighted the bride blows it out, and this is repeated three, five, or seven times, as the case may be. The couple then return to their seats, and the bride is formally given to the bridegroom, appropriate mantras being recited at the time, and their right hands being joined together by the officiating priest. Last of all, the bridegroom smears vermilion on the bride's forehead, and his clothes are knotted to hers, the knot being kept intact for three, four, five, seven, or ten days, according to the custom of the family. At the end of that time they must rub themselves with turmeric and bathe, and the knot is solemnly untied in the presence of the bridegroom's relations. No priest is present on this occasion.
The Bhumij recognise polygamy, and in theory at least impose no limitation on the number of wives a man may have. The tribe, however, are for the most part poor, and their meagre standard of living proves an effectual bar to excessive indulgence in the luxury of polygamy. When a man has no children by his first wife, he usually marries again if he can afford to do so; and it frequently happens that the second wife is a young widow, whom he marries by the sanga ritual, paying a nominal bride-price and incurring far less expenditure than would be necessary in the event of his marrying a virgin. Widow-marriage is freely permitted by the sanga ritual, in which a widow smears on the bride's forehead vermillion which the bridegroom has previously touched with his great toe. It is deemed right for a widow to marry her late husband's younger brother or cousin, if such an arrangement be feasible; and in the event of her marrying an outsider, she forfeits all claim to a share in her late husband's property and to the custody of any children she may have had by him. Traces of the growth of a sentiment adverse to the practice of widow-marriages may perhaps be discerned in the fact that the children of widows by their second husbands experience some difficulty in getting married, and tend rather to form a class by themselves.

The Bhumij of Manbhum allow divorce only when a woman has been guilty of adultery. A council of relations is called, who hear the evidence and determine whether the charge has been proved. If their finding is against the woman, her husband solemnly draws from her wrist the iron ring, which is the visible sign of wedlock. Water is then poured on a sal leaf, and the husband tears the wet leaf in two to symbolise separation. This ceremony is called pât páni chirá, 'the wet leaf rent,' and besides making the divorce absolute, relieves the husband from any claim by the wife for maintenance. He is himself socially impure after the ceremony until he has shaved and performed certain expiatory rites, the most important of which appears to be giving a feast to the relatives who came together to adjudicate on the case. A woman has no right to divorce her husband, and if neglected or ill-treated her only remedy is to run away with another man. Divorced wives may marry again by the sanga ritual, but their offspring by their second husbands are at the same social disadvantage in respect of marriage as has been noticed above in referring to the children of widows. In both cases the sentiment is unquestionably due to the influence of Hinduism in modifying the original usages of the tribe.

In matters of inheritance and succession the tribe usually affect to follow the school of Hindu law in vogue in their neighbourhood, and hardly any vestiges of special tribal custom can now be traced. Almost all Bhumij, however, give the eldest son an extra share (jethanges or bara ange) when the property is divided; and the ghatsadda members of the tribe follow the local custom of primogeniture, the younger sons being provided for by small maintenance grants.
If a man leaves no children, his widow takes a life-interest on the property.

The religion of the Bhumij varies, within certain limits, according to the social position and territorial status of the individuals concerned. Zamindars and well-to-do tenure-holders employ Brahmans as their family priests, and offer sacrifices to Kali or Mahamaya. The mass of the people revere the sun under the names of Sing-Bonga and Dharm, as the giver of harvests to men and the cause of all changes of seasons affecting their agricultural fortunes. They also worship a host of minor gods, among whom the following deserve special mention:

(1) Jahir-Buru, worshipped in the sacred grove of the village (jahir-thán) with offerings of goats, fowls, rice, and ghee at the Sarhul festival in the months of Baisakh (April-May) and Phalgun (January-February). The layá presides at the sacrifice, and the offerings are divided between him and the worshippers. Jahir-Buru is supposed to be capable of blasting the crops if not duly propitiated, and her worship is a necessary preliminary to the commencement of the agricultural operations of the year. (2) Kárikátá, (Kará = ‘buffalo,’ and Kátá = ‘to cut’) another agricultural deity, to whom buffaloes and goats are offered towards the commencement of the rains. The skin of the buffalo is taken by the worshippers; the horns form the perquisite of the layá; while the Doms, who make music at the sacrifice, are allowed to carry off the flesh. In the case of goats, the layá’s share is one-third of the flesh. If Kárikátá is neglected, it is believed there will be a failure of the rains. The cult of this deity, however, is not so universal as that of Jahir-Buru. (3) Bághut or Bágh-Bhut, who protects his votaries from tigers, is worshipped in Kartick (October-November) on the night of the Amábasyé or the day preceding it. The offerings are goats, fowls, ghee, rice, etc., which may be presented either in the homestead or on the high land (tánr) close to the village. In the former case the head of the family officiates as priest; in the latter the layá’s services are enlisted, and he can claim a share of the offerings. (4) Grám-Decota and Deoshálí, gods of village life, who ward off sickness and watch over the supply of water for drinking and irrigation of the crops. They are propitiated in Ashár (July-August) with offerings of goats, fowls, and rice, at which layás preside. (5) Buru, a mountain deity associated with many different hills throughout the Bhumij country, and worshipped for recovery from sickness and general prosperity on the first or second Mág. The head of the family or the layá serves as priest. (6) Kudra and Bisaychandi are malignant ghosts of cannibalistic propensities, whom the layás propitiate in the interests of the community. Private individuals do not worship them. (7) Páncabhahini and Báradelá are local deities worshipped by the Bankura Bhumij in much the same fashion as Jahir-Buru, the chief difference being that the offerings to Páncbhahini are she-goats and a kind of scent called máthághashá, while only fowls are presented to Báradelá.

With the Bhumij, as with other non-Aryan tribes of Chota Nagpur, the Karam festival, Colonel Dalton’s description of which is quoted in the article...
Oraon, seems to be especially popular. The Bhumij of Bankura district celebrate this feast in the latter half of the month Bhādṛa, corresponding roughly to the first half of September. A branch of the karam-tree (Nauclea parvifolia) is planted by the layā in the centre of the village dancing ground (ākhrā). At the foot of this branch is a vessel partly filled with earth, into which, on the first day of the festival, the unmarried girls of the village throw various kinds of seed grain. These are carefully tended and watered from time to time so as to germinate by the Sankrānti, or last day of the month, when the girls give the sprouting blades to each other, and wear them in their hair at the dance, which usually lasts the whole of that night.

The sacerdotal arrangements of the tribe have already been incidentally referred to. The upper classes employ Brahmans of their own, and ignore the cult of the earlier gods; while the mass of the tribe are guided in their regular observances by the teachings of the layās or priests of the forest gods, and only call in the assistance of Brahmans on the comparatively rare occasions when it is deemed necessary to propitiate one of the standard Hindu deities. But the Brahman who serves the Bhumij zamindar or tenure-holder as a family priest takes a higher place in the local community of Brahmans than the casual Brahman who ministers to the spiritual needs of the ordinary cultivator. The former will call himself a Rarhi Kulin, and will be received on equal terms by all other members of the sacred order; while the latter belongs to a much lower class, and associates with the comparatively degraded Brahmans who work for Kurmis and Dhobas.

The funeral rites of the Bhumij are characteristic, and lend strong support to the opinion that the tribe is merely a branch of the Mundas. On the death of a Bhumij his body is laid with the head to the south on a funeral pyre, which is kindled by his male relatives. When the pyre is well alight, the males go home, and the wife, sister, or other female relative of the deceased comes to the burning-place, carrying an earthen vessel of water. There she waits till the fire has burned down, quenches the ashes with water, and picks out and places in the vessel the fragmentsof bone left unconsumed. Some of these fragments are interred at the foot of a tulsi plant (Ocimum sanctum) in the courtyard of the dead man's house, others are taken in the vessel to the original cemetery of his family. There a hole is dug and the vessel of bones placed 1 The theory is that the bones should be taken to the village in which the ancestors of the deceased had the status of bhūmikādēra or first clearers of the soil; but this is not invariably acted up to, and the rule is held to be sufficiently complied with if a man's bones are buried in a village where he or his ancestors have been settled for a tolerably long time. It deserves notice that the Tamārhi Bhumij of Midnapur transport the bones of their dead to the great Munda cemetery at Chokahatu, the place of mourning in pargana Tamār of Lohardāga. No stronger proof could well be given of the identity of the Bhumij with the Mundas. The Desi Bhumij of Midnapur go to Kuchong, in Singhbhum, and some of the Singbhum Bhumij to Sūisā, in Bagmundi of Manbhum.

---

inside, supported by three stones. The earth is then filled in, and a large flat stone laid over all, on which a fowl is sacrificed to ensure the repose of the dead. The spirits of those whose bones rest in the same place are solemnly informed that another has been added to their number, and are enjoined not to quarrel, but to abide peacefully in the land of the dead. The survivors then partake of a feast of rice, dāl, and other vegetables prepared by the more distant relatives of the deceased. This strictly non-Aryan ritual has of late years been to some extent overlaid by observances borrowed from the regular Hindu srāddh. On the tenth day the mourners are shaved, and on the eleventh balls (pinda) of rice, sesame, molasses, and plantain are offered to ancestors under the supervision of a Brahman, who receives such presents as the means of the family permit them to give. A more primitive mode of appeasing the departed spirit is met with among the Shelo Bhumij. On the eleventh day after death the chief mourner beats a bell-metal drinking-vessel with a stick, while another relation, standing by his side, calls loudly on the name of the dead. After a while a third man, unconnected with the family, and often a láyā, comes forward to personate the deceased, by whose name he is addressed, and asked what he wants to eat. Acting thus as the dead man’s proxy, he mentions various articles of food, which are put before him. After making a regular meal he goes away, and the spirit of the deceased is believed to go with him. The relatives then finish the food prepared for the occasion.

Mention is made in the article on the Mundas of the custom by which the graves of the bhūinhārs, or representatives of those who first cleared the soil and founded the village, are marked by an upright stone pillar in addition to the horizontal slab which covers the bones of an ordinary raiyat not descended with one of these pioneer families. Precisely the same distinction is made among the Bhumij ghautāls of Manbhum between village sārdārs, or holders of entire ghautāli tenures, and the tābidārs, or rural constables, who make up the rank and file of the ghautāli force. The graves of the former are invariably distinguished by an upright monolith, sometimes bearing traces of rude attempts at ornamental shaping, while the tombs of the latter consist merely of a slab laid flush with the ground. This singular correspondence of funeral usage, coupled with the fact that many of the Manbhum ghautāls call themselves by the title bhūinhār or bhūinyā, suggests the conjecture that the ghautāli tenures in the south of that district are a survival under different names and changed conditions of the ancient tribal holdings known in Lohardagā as bhūinhāri. Personal service of various kinds is one of the oldest incidents of the bhūinhāri tenure, and it is not difficult to see how in a border district like Manbhum the character of this service might gradually be changed in accordance with local necessities until it came to take the form of the petty police functions which the ghautāls perform, or are supposed to perform, at the present day. Their duties, it is true, are now discharged under the orders of Government, and not at the will of the zamindar, but this change has been brought about gradually, and is due partly to local disturbances, in which the Bhumij took the lead, and partly to the fact that the zamindars of Barabhum, originally the heads of the Bhumij community, have within the last hundred years assumed the style of Rajputs, and have spared no effort to sever their connexion with their own tribe. The antagonism thus set up between the chief and his retainers showed itself on his side by constant endeavours to resume their privileged tenures, and on theirs by steady resistance to his authority and assertion of their direct subordination to the Magistrate of the district. Thus in course of time it has come about that a number of very ancient tenures, representing in their inception the tribal rights of the first clearers of the soil, have been transformed into police jāgīrs, and have recently been surveyed and demarcated at the cost of Government in the interest of the executive administration of the Manbhum district.

The original occupation of the Manbhum Bhumij is believed by themselves to have been military service, and there can be little doubt that the bands of Chuàrs or plunderers, who repeatedly overran the Midnapur district towards the end of last century, were largely recruited from this tribe. The circumstance, however, that they took a more or less prominent part in a series of marauding attacks on an unarmed and unwarlike population affords no ground for a belief in the existence among them of any real military instinct; and in fact they are conspicuous for the dislike of discipline, which is one of the prominent characteristics of the Kolarian races. For many years past agriculture has been the sole profession of all the sub-tribes except the iron-smelting Shelo. A few have engaged in petty trade, and some have emigrated to the tea districts of Assam. Their relations to the land are various. The zamindars of Barabhum, Dhalbhum, Manbhum, Patkum, and Bagmundi probably belong to the Bhumij tribe, though they now call themselves Rajputs. Next to them rank the sardar ghatwals of the large service-tenures known in Manbhum as tarafis. Three of these admit themselves to be Bhumij, while the fourth, Mannmohan Singh, of Taraf Satarakháni, now claims to be a Rajput, regardless of the fact that a few years ago his grandfather wrote himself down in public documents as Bhumij. I mention this instance as an illustration of the facility with which brevet rank as a self-made Rajput may be obtained. Mannmohan Singh keeps a Brahman to support his pretensions, and professes to be very particular in all matters of ceremonial observance. His descendants will doubtless obtain unquestioning recognition as local Rajputs, and will intermarry with families who have undergone the same process of transformation as themselves. The great bulk of the Bhumij, who are simple cultivators and labourers, stand on a far lower social level than the landholding members of the tribe. They rank somewhat below the Kurmi, and members of the higher castes will not take water from their hands. In their turn the Bhumij, though eating fowls and drinking spirituous liquors, look down upon Bauris, Bagdiás, Doms, and Ghásis as more unclean feeders than themselves.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Bhumij tribe in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>295</td>
<td></td>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td></td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>1,460</td>
<td>18,652</td>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burdwan</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>192</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>35,344</td>
<td>24,839</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td></td>
<td>326</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli with Howrah</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>320</td>
<td>Maidah</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25 Parganas</td>
<td>640</td>
<td>5,541</td>
<td>Santali Parganas</td>
<td></td>
<td>2,969</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>150</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>116</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>2,169</td>
<td>2,456</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>99</td>
<td>78</td>
<td>Tributary Mahals</td>
<td>26,568</td>
<td>19,061</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marshallabad</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>152</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>6,879</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>92</td>
<td>667</td>
<td>Singhbum</td>
<td>37,383</td>
<td>43,864</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajabat yee</td>
<td>3</td>
<td></td>
<td>Mahibhum</td>
<td>90,201</td>
<td>104,568</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajgarh</td>
<td>124</td>
<td>526</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>680</td>
<td>12,596</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bhumik, a title of Kaibarttas and Bangaja Káyasaths in Bengal.

Bhumiká, a title of Korás in Western Bengal.

Bhumjan, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Bhumphor, a title of the Mál sub-caste of Maulika in Chota Nagpur.

Bhunangali, ‘plougher of the soil,’ a title of the cultivating castes; a title of Kaibarttas.

Bhunári, Bhumía, Bhuniválá, a grain-parcher. See Kándu.

Bhunáswámi, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bhunáwalá, Bhunári, up-country men who sell parched grain. In Behar the profession is followed by the Dhanuk and Kándu castes.

Bhuniá, the head of a village. In Cuttack, one of the former petty chiefs holding lands by tenure of military service.

Bhunjá, a synonym for Kándu.

Bhunja, Bhujá, a dealer in fried grain. See Bharbhunja.

Bhunjá-Teli, a sub-caste of Telis in Eastern Bengal.

Bhupál, a synonym for Rajput.

Bhupáti, a prince, a sovereign, a landholder; a synonym for Rajput.

Bhuputra, Bhubuto, a title of Brahmans.

Bhuri, a gén of the Kásyapa gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Bhurji, a synonym for Kándu, a castor-oil maker.

Bhurswa, a sept of the Suryabansí sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhurtyál, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Bhusáwalá or Bhusiwlá, a dealer in chaff—chopped straw—and bran of gram and pulses, who goes to villages and buys up the chaff at the threshing floors by the khárá or kut. Khárá is a net-like basket, containing from a maund to a maund and five seers; kut is ‘valuation’ or ‘guess.’
Bhusbarát, a section of Bábhans in Behar, which may possibly be of totemistic origin.

Bhushbaré, a kūl or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bhushná, a sub-caste of Kumhárs in Jessore; a pathi or hypergamous sub-group of Bárrendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Bhusiwár, a sub-group of Maghaiyá Telis in Behar.

Bhuskulía, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálas in Behar.

Bhusnápati, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Eastern Bengal.

Bhusundá, a synonym for Bhúnmáli.

Bhusur, a synonym for Brahman and Rajput.

Bhusuwal, a thar or sept of Dánis in Darjiling, whose chief profession is sewing.

Bhuswámi, a landholder, proprietor, prince, sovereign.

Bhuswáre, a mul of the Krishnan section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Bhut, a title of Dakshin-Rárho and Bangaja Káyastha.

Bhútán, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs.

Bhútání, a native of Bhútán.

Bhúthá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bhútkuar, a sept of Lohars and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Biáhut, Biáhut, a sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar who do not sell liquor and do not permit widows to remarry; a sub-caste of Kumbárs and Telis in Behar.

See Biyáhut.

Biállisgrámmi, a sub-caste of Támubílís in Bengal.

Biáár, a section of Sunris in Behar.

Bibarhiá, a section of Sonárs
in Behar.

Bích, a group of the Sundí sub-caste of Sunris in Western Bengal, who are distillers.

Bíchhu, a section of Sunris in Behar.

Bíchila, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bíchwar, a centipede, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Bid, a title of Baniyás.

Bidhiyá, a workman who perforates precious stones, pearls, coral, etc.

Bidrisáé, a maker of bidri or inlaid work in silver on a basis of inferior metal.

Bidyábágis, a literary title of Brahmans in Bengal.

Bidyadhari, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Bidyáratna, a literary title of Brahmans in Bengal.

Bidyárti, a seeker after learning, a student.

Bidyásuloki, a seeker after knowledge.

Bigahíá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.
Biha or Binjha, a fish, a totemistic sept of Bedyás in Chota Nagpur.

Bihan, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bihlái, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáház Kaláwás in Behar.

Bihishti, a water-bearer, generally Mahomedans.

Bijái, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá-Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Bijaibanáras, a mul or section of the Tinmuliá Madhesiá and of Bhójpuriá Halwáis and Kándus in Behar.

Bijalpuriá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Bijayapanditi, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Bijnuníá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bijnunja, a gán of the Kásyapa gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Bikauwá, a class of Maithil or Tírhutiya Brahmans in Behar who derive their name from the practice of selling themselves or their sons in marriage to the daughters of the lower classes of Maithil Brahmans. Some Bikauwá Brahmans have as many as forty or fifty wives under this system. The wives live with their own parents, and are visited at intervals by their husbands.

Bikauwá Brahmans who have married into the lower classes are not received on equal terms by the members of their own class, but the women whom they marry consider themselves raised by the alliance.

Bikrál, a thar or section of Nepálí Brahmans.

Bikhampur, a sub-caste of Telis in Eastern Bengal; a section of the Pácháníyya sub-caste of Doms.

Bilár, a section of Sónárs in Behar.

Bilár, cat, a section of Kurmí in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Bilauría, a section of Ayodhíá-báí Sónárs in Behar.

Bilkharia, a sept of Rajputs of the Bachgoti Chauhan sub-tribe, so named from Bilkhar, in Oudh.

Bilsar, a mul or section of the Ayodhíá sub-caste of Hajzáms in Behar.

Bilung, earth-salt, a totemistic section of Kharias in Chota Nagpur.

Bilwár, a section of the Amashá Káyasths in Behar.

Bilwár or Baháhcár, a sub-caste of Dosáhs in Behar.

Bin, a sub-caste of Máláhs in Behar; a sub-caste of Binds in Eastern Bengal.

Bind, Bin, Bhind, Bindu, a large non-Aryan caste of Behar an Upper India, employed in agriculture, earthwork, fishing, hunting, making saltpetre, and collecting indigenous drugs. Traditions current among the caste profess to trace their origin to the Vindhya Hills of Central India; and one of these legends tells how a traveller passing by the foot of the hills heard a strange flute-like sound coming out of a clump of bamboos. He cut a shoot and took from it a fleshy substance, which afterwards grew into a man, the supposed ancestor of the Binds. The myth seems to be of a totemistic character, but other traces of totemism are not forthcoming. Another story says that the Binds and Nunias were formerly all Binds, and that the present Nunias are the descendants of a Bind who consented to dig a grave for a Mahomedan king and was outcasted for doing so. Mr. Sherring treats the Binds as a branch of the Nunias; others regard the Nunias as a sub-caste of the Binds. The two castes are probably related in some way, but the evidence at present available does not enable us to determine with any approach to certainty which should be considered the parent group. It seems not improbable that the Binds may be a true aboriginal tribe, and the Nunias a functional group differentiated by taking to the manufacture of earth-salt. But this is mainly conjecture.

The Binds of Behar are divided into two sub-castes—Khariyat and Gondh. These again are broken up into the mus or sections shown in the Appendix. The sections go by the male side, and the rule which forbids a man to marry a woman of his own section is supplemented by the standard formula manerä, chacherä, etc., prohibiting intermarriage within certain degrees of collateral relationship. Binds admit both infant and adult-marriage, but the former is deemed more respectable, and all who can afford to do so endeavour to get their daughters married before they attain the age of puberty. Polygamy is permitted, but only to the limited extent that a man may marry a second wife in the event of the first proving barren. A widow is allowed to marry again by the sagai form, but is expected to marry her deceased husband’s younger brother or younger cousin, should such a relative exist. Under no circumstances may she marry her late husband’s elder brother or elder cousin. For the rest she is subject to the same table of prohibited degrees that would have regulated her marriage as a virgin. Divorce is not allowed. If a woman goes wrong with a man of another caste, she is summarily turned adrift and becomes a prostitute, turns Mahomedan, or joins some religious sect of dubious morality. Indiscretions within the caste are, however, more leniently dealt with, and admit of being atoned for by certain modes of penance. In such cases the woman, after having made amends for her offence, returns to her husband. It should be added that the morals of the Bind woman are said to be by no means above reproach.

The marriage ceremony of the Binds presents no features of special interest, and has obviously been modelled in most points on the orthodox Hindu ritual. After the first negotiations have passed between the parents of the bride and bridegroom, the headman (manjan) and the caste council (panchéyat) are consulted on the important question of prohibited degrees. This being settled, the next step is ghardekhâ, an exchange of visits, at which the bridegroom’s people see the bride, and vice versa. In the course of the ghardekhâ a date is fixed for tilak, when the bride’s relatives come to the bridegroom's house and present to him a rupee, a new cloth, some cooking utensils, some betel leaves and areca-nut, and fix in the presence of the headman and some representatives of the caste council an auspicious date for the celebration of the marriage. The ceremony itself is substantially the same as that described by Mr. Grierson at pages 362 seq. of Bihár Peasant Life.

The religion of the Binds, so far at least as it is concerned with the greater gods of the Hindu pantheon, is equally wanting in individual character, and differs in no material particulars from the vulgar Hinduism of the lower castes of Behar. The external observances of Brahmanism have been copied more or less accurately, while the esoteric doctrine, on which the whole body of symbolism depends, is entirely unknown to the votaries of the popular religion. Brahmans of the Maithil sub-caste preside at the worship of Siva as Bhagavat and of his consort as Jagadamba. Hanumán and the Narsingh avatár of Vishnú are also held in reverence. But these greater gods are worshipped at comparatively rare intervals, and far greater attention is paid to rural godlings, such as Bandí, Sokhá and Goraiyá, to whom goats, boiled rice, cakes, and sweetmeats of various kinds are offered every Wednesday by the men of each household; the offerings being eaten afterwards by the members of the family and the _deodi_ relatives who are connected with the family by reason of their sharing in the same domestic worship. On Mondays and Fridays, in the months of Baisakh and Asár, the earth-god Bhuíai is appeased with sacrifices of goats, sheep, and rice boiled in milk. In Srávan the Páncch Pir receive cakes and rice from the men, women, and children of the caste. Widows, however, may take no part in this rite. Mírá Sáhib, a Mahomedan saint, and Lúkmáí, a vengeful goddess, who burns men's houses with fire, are also worshipped in due season. Twice a year the entire caste make offerings to Tarturwárá of _achchhat_ rice, flowers, betel leaves, and sweetmeats, which are afterwards divided among the caste brethren. The _kúl devátí_, or patron deity of all Binds, is Kási Bábá, about whom the following story is told:—A mysterious epidemic was carrying off the herds on the banks of the Ganges, and the ordinary expiatory sacrifices were ineffectual. One evening a clownish Ahír on going to the river saw a figure rinsing its mouth from time to time and making an unearthly sound with a conch shell. The lout, concluding that this must be the demon causing the epidemic, crept up and clubbed the unsuspecting bather. Kási Náth was the name of the murdered Brahman; and as the cessation of the murrain coincided with his death, the low Hindustani castes have ever since regarded Kási Bábá as the maleficent spirit that sends disease among their cattle. Now-a-days he is propitiated by the following curious ceremony:—As soon as an infectious disease breaks forth, the village cattle are massed together and cotton seed sprinkled over them. The fattest and sleekest animal being singled out is severely beaten with rods. The herd, scared by the noise, scamper off to the nearest shelter, followed by the scape bull; and by this means it is thought the murrain is stayed. In ordinary times the Binds worship Kási Bábá in a simpler fashion, each man in his own house, by presenting flowers, perfumes, and sweetmeats. The latter, after having done duty before the god, are eaten by his votary. Kási Bába no doubt was an actual person who came by his end, if not exactly as told in the legend, at least in some tragic fashion which led to his being elevated to the rank of a god. In some of the other objects of the rural worship we may perhaps see survivals of the primitive animism which formed the religion of the aborigines of India before their insensible conversion to Brahmanism. Some of the tribal deities were, as we know, promoted to seats in the Hindu pantheon; others, whose position was less prominent and whose hold on the mind of the people was weaker, got thrust into the background as patrons of various rural events.

Some of the Binds in Behar possess occupancy holdings, but for the most part they are non-occupancy raiyats or landless day-labourers paid in cash or kind. Fishing, well-sinking, building mud walls, mat and basket-making, preparing saltpetre, and doing earthwork on roads and tanks, are among their chief occupations. A few of the more enterprising members of the caste have risen to be traders, and visit Bengal during the cold season with boat-loads of wheat, pulse, and gram. Binds, or Rawats as they are commonly addressed, rank socially with Koiris, Gangotas, etc., and have Maithil Brahmans for their priests. In Ghazipur, says Dr. Wise, they are considered a pure caste, and in Sháhábád they are employed by Brahmans as water-carriers.

Scattered colonies of Binds are also found along the great rivers of Central and Eastern Bengal. In Dacca they recognise three subdivisions—Jutaut Binds, Nún Binds, and Bin. The first is the most aristocratic, while those belonging to the second are degraded from working as palanquin-bearers, manufacturers of salt (nún), diggers, and, it is said, grave-diggers. Representatives of the Bin division are rarely met with, and I am inclined to doubt its existence. These settlers, who are distinguished by the title Chaudhri, lead an irregular life, eating pork and drinking spirits freely. Being debarred by reason of having settled in Bengal from intermarriage with the Binds of Behar and Upper India, they often find it difficult to procure wives from the small expatriated communities along the Padma. Some cultivate the soil, others kill mullet with the harpoon or catch them with súrki screens, like the berúá. Another occupation is cutting tamarisk (jhú) on the sandbanks of the Padma and selling it for firewood. By Binds, too, are made the best mud brasiers or chúthás, used on board all native boats for cooking. Many are cunning sportsmen, and during December and January net great numbers of wild fowl and snipe. After the rice harvest the Binds wander about the country, digging up the stores of rice accumulated by field-rats in their burrows. From four to six pounds of grain are usually found, but even this quantity is sometimes exceeded. It is said that the Binds feast on the rats; but this they deny, explaining that to do so would be to reduce the next year's find of grain.

A Damámi Gosín periodically visits the Dacca Binds, acting as their Guru, while a degraded Kanaujia Brahman officiates as purohit. Many of the Bengali Binds belong to the Panch Piriya sect, others worship Siva, and at the Mahádáli festival sacrifice a ram instead of the usual he-goat. At the Ganga Pója a swine is offered to Jalka Devi, the popular goddess of the Chamarás. Kárámát Ali and the Farásí Manávás have of late years converted many of these outcaste Binds, but the village Muhammadans will not as yet associate with them. These converts are usually styled by the peasantry Chaylí, from the Bengali word for the berá, or fish-trap.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Bind caste in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>76</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>Maimansinh</td>
<td>37</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>213</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>130</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>3,459</td>
<td>3,576</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>265</td>
<td>265</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>64</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>21,388</td>
<td>24,848</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parganas</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>19,183</td>
<td>25,839</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>1,012</td>
<td>1,061</td>
<td>Tirhut</td>
<td>21,577</td>
<td>21,577</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>22,485</td>
<td>15,157</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>92</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>25,290</td>
<td>25,290</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>877</td>
<td>877</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>16,106</td>
<td>16,106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>117</td>
<td>117</td>
<td>Bhagalpura</td>
<td>2,460</td>
<td>2,460</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmahadey</td>
<td>718</td>
<td>718</td>
<td>Pursheh</td>
<td>7,760</td>
<td>7,760</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bangpur</td>
<td>1,400</td>
<td>1,400</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>6,508</td>
<td>7,547</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>190</td>
<td>190</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>5,684</td>
<td>5,684</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purna</td>
<td>1,100</td>
<td>1,100</td>
<td>Hazaribag</td>
<td>7,340</td>
<td>7,340</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>91</td>
<td>91</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>183</td>
<td>187</td>
<td>Singhbum</td>
<td>153</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>131</td>
<td>131</td>
<td>Manibhum</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bindu, a synonym for Bind.

Bindu, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Káyasths.

Bindumbo, a rúi or sept of Dejong Lhorís, whose ancestors had emigrated from Bhótán.

Bindya, a resident of Brin-dában.

Binha, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Binjhiá, Birjíá, Brijíá, Binjhwár, an agricultural and landholding tribe found in the south of the Lohardágá district, in Palámau, and in the Tributary States of Gánghápur and Sargujá in Bengál and Patna in the Central Provinces. The Binjhiá of the south are peculiar in that within their own households they speak Uriya, their language for ordinary purposes being the jargon of Hindi current in Chota Nagpur. Mr. W. H. P. Driver describes them as a quiet, unwarlike people, flat-faced and black, but of good physique, and wearing their hair in matted locks. He considers them nearly allied to the Asuras or Agarias. Like many similar tribes, they are divided into two sub-tribes—the Paháriya Binjhiás and Dánd-Binjhiás, so called from living respectively in the hills and in the plains. Their traditions, like those of the Binds, associate them with the Vindhya Hills, where the god Mahadeo is supposed to have created them by breathing life into a scare-crow, and the present representatives of the caste in Chota Nagpur say that Ratanpur, in the Central Provinces, was their original habitat. From Ratanpur they moved eastward to Borásmar, thence to Keonjhar, and thence to Nagra in Gángpur. From this place a branch of them found their way, some twenty generations ago, to the plateau of Chota Nagpur, where they are now settled, the bulk of them as occupancy raiyats, and the chief men of the caste as tenure-holders of the second or third degree claiming khunt káti rights under the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur.

The Rand-Binjhiás have four exogamous septs:—Nág, the snake; Dácul; Bhair, supposed to be short for Bhairava; and Kási. The first two are clearly totemistic, and the members of these septs reverence the animals whose names they bear. The sept name goes by the male side. The prohibited degrees are the same as in the case of the Rautias. The hill Binjhiás have no septs, or rather the village takes the place of the sept; the rule being that a man must get his wife from a strange village. A man may marry two sisters, provided he marries the elder of the two first, but not otherwise; a wife's elder sister (jeth sá) being regarded by the husband in the light of a mother. Among the Dánd-Binjhiás, girls are married either as infants or after they have attained the age of puberty, the marriage being arranged between the parents by a male broker or bintí; but the Paháriya-Binjhiás still adhere to adult-marriage. The usual bride-price is Rs. 4. Polygamy is permitted without any theoretical limit on the number of wives. It is unusual, however, to find a man with more than two wives, and the largest number ever heard of is six. Mr. Driver says three is the outside limit, but I suspect this statement represents little more than the improvised reply of his informants to a question which they had never considered. At all events one would be curious to know on what principle this particular number was fixed. With the Binjhiás, as with all polygamous castes, the standard of living sets impassable bounds to the indulgence of caprice in the matter of wives. Widows are allowed to marry again by the sagií form. It is considered the right thing for a widow to marry her husband's younger brother (devar) if there is one; but she may marry any one outside of her father's section and her original circle of prohibited degrees. Divorce is permitted on the ground of adultery by the wife or the inability of the parties to get on together. Either husband or wife may take the initiative, and the bride-price and marriage expenses are supposed to be repaid.

The marriage ceremony of the Dánd-Binjhiá is differs little from that in vogue among the Rautias. Sindurá, or the smearing of vermilion on the bride's forehead, and knotting the clothes of the bride and bridegroom together, are the essential portions of the rite. Sometimes the parties are married first to a mango-tree, but this practice is not universal or necessary. The hill Binjhiá use oil instead of vermilion.

In matters of religion the more civilised Dánd-Binjhiá of the south profess to be orthodox Hindus, and worship Devi under the name Vindhu-báíiní, 'the dweller in the Vindhyas,' as the ishtadevata or patron goddess of the caste. They also reverence Jagannáth. Their minor deities are Chadri Devi and Grám-sri, the goddesses who preside over villages. To both goats are sacrificed, but those offered to the former must be black. The gods of the Paháríyá-Binjhiá are Debi, Sing-Bonga or the Sun, Nind-Bongá or the Moon, and Mahadeo, who are worshipped by a Binjhiá priest called the Baigá-Pášan and his assistant the Dewar, who offer the sacrifices, while the Pujaí or consulting priest determines what the sacrifice should be. Brahmans are employed in the worship of the greater gods and in the propitiation of dead ancestors, whom they call muá. These Brahmans incur no social degradation by serving Binjhiá. The dead are burned or buried. In the latter case the grave is dug deep and a cairn of large stones set with thorn bushes made up to keep off jackals and hyenas. Wealthy men make a merit of taking some of the ashes from the funeral pyre and casting them into the Ganges at Benares; but in fact this is rarely done, and the pretence of doing it is a mere imitation of the customs of the higher castes. Sráddh is performed by those who wish to make a parade of their orthodoxy; but even in these cases I am informed that some of the essential portions of the standard ceremony are omitted. The festivals of the tribe are the Phágú in February, the Sarhul in April, the Chíná-parab or sowing-feast in June or July, the Kárma in October, and the Arwá or Kharway (harvest-home) in November, when a sacrifice is offered to Mahadeo.

Binjhiá do not follow the Mitákshárá, which is the personal law of most Hindus residing in Lohardágá. Succession. Succession among them is governed by a tribal custom of their own, which gives the bulk of a man's estate to his eldest son, subject to the obligation to make life-grants from the property for the maintenance of his younger brothers. Daughters do not share in the inheritance; but the eldest son is expected to maintain them in the paternal house and to get them married. In the order of succession a younger son by a wife who was married by the full marriage ceremony (byáh) excludes an elder son by a sagai wife, but the latter is entitled to maintenance—a right which is denied to the son of a concubine. These customs are recognised by the courts.
For the decision of questions of caste usage, the Binjhiás have a representative assembly consisting of delegates from every household in the community. The president, whose office is hereditary, is called kartáhá. The rules of debate are, as might be supposed, highly primitive. After enough talking has been done to enable the president to gather the sense of the assembly, he states his own view, and the decision, as in Homeric times, goes by acclamation.

Notwithstanding that they eat fowls and wild pig, both abominable in the eyes of the orthodox, the Dánd-Binjhiás of the south are deemed to be Hindus, and enjoy much the same social rank as the Rautias. They will take cooked food only from the hands of known Brahmans; sweetmeats, etc., from Rajputs; and water from Rautias, Orha, Kumhárs, Ahírs, Khandáits, and Zamindar-Jhorás, but not Kharwárs or Bhogtás. The hill Binjhiás, according to Mr. Driver, eat buffaloes, cows, and the dhámán snake, but monkeys, frogs, and ordinary snakes are forbidden food.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Binjhiás in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Lohardagá</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>2,665</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>2,706</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Binjwádr, a synonym for Binjhiá.

Binjoar, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Binjuar, an eel, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Binriá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Binsaiyá, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Bipra, a synonym for Brahman in Bengal.

Biráji, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Birar, cat, a totemistic sept of Tántis in Chota Nagpur.

Birbansá, a title of Doms.

Birbhairab, a section of Jugís.

Birbhumiá, a sub-caste of Lohárs in the Santál Parganas.

Bireri, a section of Maghayá Kándus in Behar.

Birho or Birhor, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Birhor, 'wood-man,' a small Dravidian tribe of Chota Nagpur, who live in the jungle in tiny huts made of branches of trees and leaves, and eke out a miserable living by snaring hares and monkeys, and collecting jungle products, especially the bark of the chób creeper (Banhínia scandens), from which a coarse kind of rope is made. They claim to be of the same race as the Kharwárs, and to come from Khairagarh in the Kaimur hills, but this legend, like similar stories Origin. told by the Santál and Oraons, can hardly be deemed to possess any historical value, and probably refers to a migration of comparatively recent date. A list of the Birhor septs is given in Appendix I. Two at least are totemistic; the others appear to be local or territorial. One of them, Hemrom, is found also among the Santál, but with them it means a horse, while the Birhors say it is a kind of fish.

Primitive as the habits of the Birhors are, they seem to have been to some extent affected by the influence of Hindu ideas. Marriage is a case in point.
The free courtship in vogue among the compact Dravidian tribes has fallen into disuse, and parents arrange the marriage of their daughters at an early age. Three rupees is the standard bride-price.
The tribe does not employ Brahmans, nor have they any special priests of their own. The marriage ceremony is therefore very simple, its essential and binding portion consisting in the process of drawing blood from the little fingers of the bride and bridegroom and smearing it on each of them. The bride stays two days in her husband’s hut, and then goes back to her father’s until she is grown up.

The Birhor religion is, as might be expected, a mixture of Animism and Hinduism. If questioned on the subject, the Birhors themselves will endeavour in their replies to give prominence to the Hindu elements, and to make themselves out more orthodox than they are, and with singular ingenuity they seek to harmonize the two systems by assigning to Devi the chief place in their Pantheon, and making out the animistic godlings, to borrow Mr. Ibbetson’s expressive word, to be her daughters and granddaughters. Thus, according to Colonel Dalton, an oblong piece of wood, painted red, stands for Mahá Máyá, Devi’s daughter; a small piece of white stone daubed with vermilion for her granddaughter, Buria Mái, and an arrow head for Dudha Mái, Buría’s daughter. A trident, painted red, represents Hanumān, who carries out Devi’s orders. The minor gods, whose animistic character has not as yet been disguised by any veneer of Hinduism, are Biru Bhut, worshipped in the form of a raised semi-globe of earth, and Darhá, a Mundári-Oraon deity, represented by a piece of split bamboo some three feet high, stuck slantwise in the ground. The latter is also known as the sipahi or sentry, a term not uncommonly applied to minor gods of this type, and is supposed to be the immediate guardian of the place. A small round piece of wood about a foot long, with the upper part painted red, is called Banhi, goddess of the jungles. Another similar emblem stands for Sugu, a big hill in the south of the Hazaribagh district. Sets of these symbols are placed on either side of their huts to scare off evil spirits, snakes, tigers, and misfortune generally. When a Birhor dies, his body is burned and the remnant thrown, as Birhors say, into the Ganges, but really into any stream that may happen to be handy. For ten days the relatives show their grief by not shaving. On the eleventh they shave and have a feast. Birhors have been accused of eating their dead relations, but the evidence on this point is not convincing, and Colonel Dalton says he has no faith in the story.
Birhorichopdár, a title of those members of the Birhor caste who make string (chop) from the bark of trees, as distinguished from Birhors proper, who collect honey and wax from the jungle and make sikas for carrying burdens.

Birinjári, a variant of Banjárá, q.v.

Birj, a section of the Panchjáti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Birjía, a sub-tribe of Asuras and Goáláś in Chota Nagpur.

Birnáwar, a section of the Amashta Káyaasts in Behar.

Birtiá, a Brahman who lives on a grant made to him for religious service or as a Kathak or reciter of sacred poems.

Birúa, a sept of Hos in Singhbhum.

Birwá, a sept of the Suryabánsi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Birwál, a sub-caste of Bhuiyás in Singhbhum.

Birwár, a sept of the Chandrabansí sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Bisá or Birádarí Rájá, a sub-caste of Agarwáls who hold a degraded position on account of their alleged illegitimate descent.

Bisání, a sept of the Sursajbansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar. They cannot intermarry with persons of the Chaubhan and Maharaur septs, being supposed to be descended from the same ancestor.

Bisaiwár-Nánhpur, a mul of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmins in Behar. extent as a bar to intermarriage. In fact, no systematic use appears to be made of these Brahmanical exogamous designations; for the sub-caste has no less than 360 sections (muś and diśa) of the ancestral or local type. The adoption of the tutelary god of the caste as the eponym of a section is an instance of a practice noticed by Professor W. Robertson Smith as common among the early Arabs. A gotra bearing the name Viswakaruna is also found among the Maghayā Barhis of Behar.

Bisokia, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Bisra, hawk, a totemistic sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur. The word is apparently a variant of Bera, q.v.

Bisrot, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bisru, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bissi or Bisshayi, the chief of a district in Orissa collecting the Government revenue and exercising police and judicial authority.

Biswál, a title of Uriyā Brahmans.

Biswámitra, a section of Brahmans, Káyasths, and of Tántis in Bengal.

Biswás, a title of Bárnis, Chásadhobás, Jugis, Kaibarttas, Kewats, Kumhars, Nápitas, and Pods, and an honorary title of Káyasths in Bengal; a section of the Maghayā sub-caste of Kumhars, and a title of Nágars in Behar.

Biswa-Madak, a sub-caste of Madhunápites in Bengal.

Bit, a title of Tántis in Bengal.

Bitál, a sub-sept of the Murmu sept of Santáls.

Bitár, a title of Doms in Behar.

Bitwár, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Biyáhot, Biyahutá, a sub-caste of Hajjáms in Behar who do not permit the marriage of widows.

Biyáhut, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar who do not allow widow marriage: they are grain-dealers and shopkeepers; a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar who do not permit widows to marry again. It is often used in contradistinction to Sagahut.

Biyáhut or Bhojpuri, a sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar.

Biyáhuta, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar who do not allow widows to remarry.

Boár, fish, a sub-sept of the Murmu sept of Santáls.

Bocho, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bod, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Bodo, a sub-tribe of the Kochh tribe in Northern and Eastern Bengal.

Bodra, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur whose ancestors neglected to wash their mouths after eating.

Bodrá, a sept of Lohars in Chota Nagpur.

Bodru, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Boga, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.
Bohandié, a cultivator who has not a plough of his own and either works with a hoe or a borrowed plough.

Bohit, a title of the Dhusiá sub-caste of Chamárs in Behar.

Bojra, a kind of grass, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpuri.

Bokhime, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Bolá, a sept of the Tungjainya sub-tribe of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Bomjan, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Bon-Gonju, a title of Nágewars in Chota Nagpuri.

Bonthárua, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Bora, a kind of snake, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Borál, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Bordí, a section of Tántis in Chota Nagpuri.

Borhá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Borhgrémi, a gáin of the Bátaya gotra of Bórondra Brahmans in Bengal.

Boriá, a group of Maghaiyá Telis in Behar.

Borosánáp, a section of Mauliks in Chota Nagpuri.

Borsege, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Bosmáthá, a sept of the Agniá sub-tribe of Meches in the Darjiling Terai.

Bot, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Boyong, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Brahma, a title of Dakshin-Rárhí and Bangaja Káyastha.

Brahmachári, a youth of either of the three first pure classes during his pupilage and while studying the Vedas. A mendicant who professes to have prolonged the period of studentship and to observe through life the practice of study, poverty, and continence. In general, however, an ignorant vagrant; a Brahman reclusé; a title of Brahmans.

Brahman, Bámán, Bipra, Ducija, Thákur, Sarmá, Deva-Sarmá, Bhudeca, Bhusur, Agraña, Maháráji, Bábáji, Gosáinji, the highest of the three twice-born castes, originally the priests of the Aryan community, and now engaged in various professions and following all respectable means of livelihood, except those involving personal or ceremonial pollution. Concerning the origin of the caste there has been much discussion, and it is hardly possible to speak of it without to some extent touching upon the vexed question of the origin and development of the caste system itself. Orthodox tradition as expressed in the so-called Institutes of Manu, in the Mahábhárata, in the Puránas, and in the Játimala or Garland of Castes, refers the evolution of the four original castes to a special act of creation, whereby from the mouth of the Supreme Being proceeded the Brahmán, from his arms the Kshatriya, from his thighs the Vaisya, and from his foot the Sudra. Each of these orders had their special function in life assigned to them according to their natural aptitudes. To the Brâhman the knowledge and teaching of things divine; to the Kshatriya defence of the land from its enemies; to the Vaisyas pasture and tillage of the soil; and to the Sudra the duty of doing willing service to the higher ranks. In the Purusha-Sûktam hymn of the Rig Veda we find a more fanciful and mystic variant of the same legend. The gods drag the primeval man (purusha), regarded apparently as the microcosm or type of all mankind, to the sacrifice, and hew him into four pieces, which, according to the dignity of the members as in the former legend, become the four castes. Another account of the matter is given in the Mahâbhârata:—In the beginning, says Bhrigu, there was no distinction of castes or colour. All men were Brâhmans. Created by Brahmá on one model, their own actions served to divide them. Brâhmans who yielded to the desires of the senses, who gave themselves up to anger and pride,—these, reddened by anger, became Kshatriyas; others who followed after pasture and agriculture grew yellow and were Vaisyas; others again, hasty, mendacious, and immoral, wholly lost their pristine purity, became black, and were turned into Sudras. A third legend seeks to bring the rise of the caste system into some sort of genealogical relation with the heads of ancient tribes and families of the Vedic era. This story represents the mythical Manu as the father of all mankind, and ascribes to his sons or grandsons the formation of the four castes. Members of the race of the Sun are mentioned, who became Brâhmans—"Kshatriya by birth, Brâhman by profession"—as the legend puts it; while the Saunaka of the race of the Moon, the descendants of Pururavas, became Brâhmans, Kshatriyas, or Vaisyas, according to their degree of personal merit. In another place we hear of a mighty king, named Bali, to whom Brahmá delegated authority to found the caste system.

These and similar legends, however destitute of historical accuracy, serve nevertheless to throw some light upon the probable origin of the caste system generally, and of the Brâhman caste in particular. They make it clear that early Indian tradition assumes the substantial unity of the Aryan race; that it looks upon kings and priests as men fashioned of the same substance, and on the distinctions of caste as having been gradually evolved rather than created before the beginning of time.

Caste then, at least in the rigid form in which we now know it, is an institution of comparatively late origin. During Vedic times, though the germ of Brâhmanism may be traced in the relations between the purohita and the magharân, the separation of classes was no sharper than naturally arose from differences of occupation; and with the exception of a single hymn of later origin, the testimony of the whole body of Vedic literature as interpreted by modern scholars is adverse to the existence of a clearly-defined hierarchy of endogamous castes. Even in the Epic era the system had not hardened into its later form. Marriages between members of different castes were possible. We hear of Vidura the Kshattar, son of a Brāhman father and Sudra mother, of Yuyutsu the Karan, son of Dhritarāṣṭra by a Vaisya wife, and we are told that the former took a prominent part in public business, while the latter was conspicuous in battle. Finally, in the statement that among the impious Aryans of the Panjab only the eldest son of a Brāhman becomes a Brāhman, we may surely find a survival of an earlier order of ideas, of the belief that all Aryans are of one blood, and that Brāhmanhood is a matter of personal qualities and aptitudes rather than of descent.

The best modern opinion seems disposed to find the germ of the Brāhman caste in the bards, ministers, and family priests who were attached to the king's household in Vedic times. Different stages of this institution may be observed. In the earliest ages the head of every Aryan household was his own priest, and even a king would himself perform the sacrifices which were appropriate to his rank. By degrees families or guilds of priestly singers arose, who sought service under the kings, and were rewarded by rich presents for the hymns of praise and prayer recited and sacrifices offered by them on behalf of their masters. As time went on, the sacrifices became more numerous and more elaborate, and the mass of ritual grew to such an extent that the king could no longer cope with it unaided. The employment of purohīts or family priests, formerly optional, now became a sacred duty if the sacrifices were not to fall into disuse. The Brāhman obtained a monopoly of priestly functions, and a race of sacerdotal specialists arose which tended continually to close its ranks against the intrusion of outsiders. The idea that virtue made the Brāhman gave place to the believin the efficacy of birth. Intermarriage with other ranks of the Aryan community was first discouraged and then wholly prohibited, and thus by degrees was developed the rigid law of endogamy which distinguishes the Indian caste system from other apparently similar forms of social gradation.

The Brāhman caste is commonly divided into ten large classes, according to their locality: five on the north and five on the south of the Vindhyā range. The classes are thus arranged in a Sanskrit mnemonic stanza quoted by Dr. Wilson—

Internal structure.

(1) The five Drávidas, south of the Vindhyā range:—

(1) The Mahārāṣtras, of the country of the Marathi language.
(2) The Andhrar or Tailangas, of the country of the Telugu language.
(3) The Drāvidas, of the country of the Drāvidian or Tamil language.
(4) The Kārnātas, of the Karnātika, the country of the Canarese language.
(5) The Gurjaras, of Gurjarāṣṭra, or the country of the Gujarāti language.
The five Gauras, north of the Vindhya range:

1. The Śārasvatīs, so called from the country watered by the river Saraswati.
2. The Kānyakubjas, so called from the Kānawakubja or Kanauj country.
3. The Gauras, so called from Gaur, or the country of the Lower Ganges.
4. The Utkalas, of the province of Utkala or Orissa (Oriya).
5. The Mathītas, of the province of Mithila (Tirhut).

The Brahmans found in the Lower Provinces of Bengal belong to one or other of the Gaura groups. A tabular scheme of their subdivisions, which are extremely intricate, will be found in the Appendix. In the following brief description it will be convenient to deal first with the Brahmans of Bengal Proper, then with those of Behar, and lastly with the Utkal or Orissa Brahmans. The Bengal Brahmans are divided into five main sub-castes—Rārhi, Bārendra, Vaidik, Saptasati, and Madhyasreni.

The Rārhi Brahmans derive their name from the Rārhi, or the high-lying alluvial tract on the west bank of the river Bhagirathi. Their claim to be of comparatively pure Aryan descent is to some extent borne out by the results of the anthropometric inquiries recorded in another volume of this work. The current tradition is that early in the eleventh century A.D., Adisura or Adisvara, King of Bengal, finding the Brahmans then settled in Bengal too ignorant to perform for him certain Vedic ceremonies, applied to the Rāja of Kanauj for priests thoroughly conversant with the sacred ritual of the Aryans. In answer to this request five Brahmans of Kanauj were sent to him—Bhatta Nārayana of the Sândilya section or gotra; Daksha of the Kasyapa gotra; Vedagarva or Vidagarbha of the Vatsa gotra, or, as other accounts say, from the family of Brigu; Chandra or Chhandara of the Svārṇa gotra; and Śrīharsa of the Bharadwaja gotra. They brought with them their wives, their sacred fire, and their sacrificial implements. It is said that Adisura was at first disposed to treat them with scanty respect, but he was soon compelled to acknowledge his mistake and to beg the Brahmans to forgive him. He then made over to them five populous villages, where they lived for a year. Meanwhile the king was so impressed with the superhuman virtue of Bhatta Nārāyana, who was a son of Kshitiṣa, King of Kanauj, that he offered him several more villages. The Brāhmaṇa, however, declined to take these as a gift, but bought them, as the story goes, at a low price. They were annexed to the village already in Bhatta Nārāyana's possession, and the whole area was relieved from payment of revenue for twenty-four years. Thus tradition chronicles an early Brahmottar grant, the first it may be of the long series of similar transactions which have played so important a part in the history of land 1 This statement seems doubtful, see p. 167 below.

---

tenures, in the development of castes, and in promoting the spread of orthodox Hinduism throughout Bengal. Adisura did what the Rajās of outlying tracts of country have constantly done since and are doing still. A local chief, far removed from the great centres of Brāhmaṇical lore, somehow becomes aware of his ceremonial shortcomings. Probably, as is narrated of Adisura himself, a wandering Brāhmaṇ brings home to him that his local ritual is not up to the orthodox standard. He sends for Brāhmans, gives them grants of land near his own residence, and proceeds with their assistance to reform his ways on the model of the devout kings whom Brāhmaṇical literature holds up as the ideal for a Rajā to follow after. The Brāhmans find for him a pedigree of respectable antiquity or provide him with a family legend, and in course of time he succeeds in getting himself recognised as a member of some branch of the great Rajput community.

Although the immigrant Brāhmans brought their wives with them, tradition says that they contracted second marriages with the women of Bengal, and that their children by the latter were the ancestors of the Barendra Brāhmans. The Barendra, on the other hand, claim to represent the offsprings from the original Hindustani wives, and allege that the Rāhī Brāhmans themselves spring from the mēkshāṁrīcā contract in Bengal.

By the middle of the eleventh century, when Bāllāl Sen, the second of the Sen kings of Bengal, instituted his famous inquiry into the personal endowments of the Rāhī Brāhmans, their numbers seem to have increased greatly. They are represented as divided into 56 gāṁs or headships of villages, which were reserved for them, and might not be encroached upon by Brāhmans of other orders.

It is interesting to trace in Bāllāl Sen’s inquiry the survival or reassertion of the principle referred to above as recognised in ancient times, that the Brāhmaṇhood of the Brāhmaṇ depends not merely on birth, but also upon personal endowments. It is a question of virtue, not a question of descent. Bāllāl Sen, of course, could not go so far as this. The time had long passed when a Kshatriya could transform himself into a Brāhmaṇ by penance and self-denial. But the Sen monarch sought to reassert the ancient principle, so far as was then possible, by testing the qualifications of each Rāhī family for the priestly office, and classifying them, in the order of their virtue, according to the results of this examination. The following nine qualities were selected to serve as the touchstone of sacerdotal purity:—Achār, ceremonial purity; vinaya, discipline; vidyā, learning; pratisthā, reputation for purity; tirtha-darsana, zeal in pilgrimage; nīktha, piety; ērūṭti, observance of legal marriages; tapa, ascetic self-devotion; dāna, liberality.

Tradition is silent concerning the precise method in which Bāllāl Sen carried out his somewhat inquisitorial measures. It seems, however, to be certain that some kind of inquiry into the nine characteristic Brāhmaṇical qualities was held under his orders, and that the kul or social and ceremonial standing of each family was determined accordingly. Some say that twenty-two gāṁs were raised to the highest distinction. Lakshmana Sen discarded fourteen gāins on account of their misconduct, and they became gauna Kulin, an order which has now disappeared. Nineteen families belonging to the other eight gāins were made Kulin. The other families of these eight gāins were lost sight of. Thus two classes or grades of sacerdotal virtue were formed:—(1) the Kulin, being those who had observed the entire nine counsels of perfection; (2) the Srotriya, who, though regular students of the Vedas, had lost arvītī by intermarrying with families of inferior birth. The Srotriya were again subdivided into Siddha or perfect, Sādhyo or capable of attaining purity, and Kashta or difficult. The last-named group was also called Ari or enemy, because a Kulin marrying a daughter of that group was disgraced.

The relations of these three classes in respect of marriage were regulated by the principle laid down in the Institutes of Manu for members of the three twice-born castes, a principle for which Mr. Denzil Ibbetson has adopted the convenient and expressive name of hypergamy. The rule was that a man of the Kulin class could marry a woman of his own class or of the two higher Srotriyas classes; a Siddha Srotriya could marry in his own group or in the Sādhyo Srotriya group; while the Sādhyo and Kashta Srotriyas might take wives only within the limits of their own classes. Conversely, women of the Sādhyo Srotriya class could marry in their own class or the two classes above them; Siddha Srotriyas women in their own class or in the Kulin class; while Kulin women at one end of the scale and Kashta women at the other were restricted in their choice of husbands to the Kulin and Kashta groups. Unequal or irregular marriages involved loss of reputation and forfeiture of rank. On the other hand, the marriage of a girl into a good Kulin house conferred a sort of reflected honour on her own family, and in course of time this idea was developed into the doctrine known as kula-gotra, whereby the reputation of a family depended upon the character of the marriages made by its female members.

This singular and artificial organization deranged the natural balance of the sexes, and set up a vigorous competition for husbands among the women of the higher groups. The Bansajas are those Kulinis who lost their distinction on account of misconduct, i.e., their want of charity, discipline, and due observance of marriage law, three qualities which in later times constituted Kulinism.

The growth of the Bansaja class introduced a further element of complication. In the struggle for husbands, Kulin girls who had no brothers or whose mothers were widows were often given to the sons of Bansaja parents; but families resorting to this device were excluded from the recognised cadre. Thus the brothers of a girl who married beneath her at once became Bansaja, but this degradation did not extend to her uncles. If an original Kulin married a Bansaja maiden, he himself became a Swakrita Bhanga or broken Brāhman. His descendants in the second generation were known as Dwipurusha, in the third as Tripurusha, and in the fourth as Chaturthapurusha. After this stage special designations were dropped, and the branch was merged in the Bansaja class. Although in theory these lower branches were completely cut off from the original hierarchy formed by Ballal Sen, natural instincts could not be wholly eradicated from a number of closely related families, and girls of the Bhanga and Bansaja groups used to marry their cousins of the elder branch. It might perhaps have been expected that these groups would have been admitted to the same privileges as the Srotriya, but this was not the case.

The invasion of Bengal by the Muhammadans in 1203 and the instant collapse of the Hindu kingdom was not without its effect upon the matrimonial organization of the Ráhí Bráhmans. Ballal Sen's reforms had been imposed upon the caste by the order of a Hindu ruler, and their observance depended upon the maintenance of his supervising authority. When this check was removed, the system could no longer hold together, and soon showed signs of breaking up completely. Artificial restrictions had been introduced; the natural balance of the sexes had been disturbed, and a disastrous competition for husbands had set in among the three original groups. New and inferior groups had sprung up, and their natural ambitions still further swelled the demand for Kulin husbands. The pressure of necessity soon showed itself too strong for the rules. Poor Kulins sold their family rank and honour for the bridegroom-price, which had taken the place of the bride-price of earlier times; they added to the number of their wives without regard to the respectability of the families from which they came; and they raised their prices as the supply of suitable husbands diminished and competition ran higher for a Kulin bridegroom.

The reforms undertaken in the fourteenth century by Devi Vara, a ghatak or genealogist of Jessore, extended only to the Kulins. These were divided into three grades—(i) Swabháva or original Kulins, (ii) Bhanga, (iii) Bansaja. The Swabháva grade was further subdivided into 36 melas or endogamous groups,* each bearing the name of the original ancestor of the clan or of his village. This restriction of the marriages of Kulins to their own mela was the leading feature of Devi Vara's reform. Its principle was adopted and extended, it is believed, by the Kulins themselves, in the singular arrangement known as Pálti-Prakriti, or preservation of the type, by which families of equal rank were formed into triple groups as it were, for matrimonial purposes, and bound to observe a sort of reciprocity. Thus Mukhuti families were bound to marry their sons to the daughters of the Chatterji and Banerji families, and vice versa. All kinds of complications are said to have arisen

---

* The names of the mela are as follows:—Phuliya, Khardaha, Sarvvanandi, Ballabhí, Surai, Āchárya Sekhari, Pandit Ratni, Bangala, Gopala Ghataki, Cháyanandri, Pramadani, Dasaratha Ghátaki, Subharsajakhání, Neriya, Rayá, Bhattachárví, Décáti, Cháyi, Vijáya Pandit, Chádáí, Madháí, Bídási Ram, Párihaí, Sri Nangabhatti, Máiádkará Kháí, Káumví, Hari Majumádáí, Sri Bandháni, Dáharáva Ghatáki, Achambita, Dharádáhi, Vále, Kághava Ghausáli, Sungo Sarvvanandi, Sadananda Kháí, Chandraváti.
from this understanding. If, for example, the Mukhuti had only one marriageable son and the Chatterji or Banerji ten daughters approaching puberty, the former must marry all ten or all must remain spinsters. Meantime the rush of competition for Kulin husbands on the part of Bhangas, Bansajas, and Srotriya classes was as strong as before, while the proportionate number of pure Kulins had been reduced by the loss of those who had become Bhangas and Bansajas. In order to dispose of the surplus of women in the higher groups polygamy was introduced, and was resorted to on a very large scale. It was popular with the Kulins because it enabled them to make a handsome income by the accident of their birth; and it was accepted by the parents of the girls concerned as offering the only means of complying with the requirements of the Hindu religion. Tempted by a pan or premium, which often reached the sum of two thousand rupees, Swabháva Kulins made light of their kul and its obligations, and married Bansaja girls, whom they left after the ceremony to be taken care of by their parents. Matrimony became a sort of profession, and the honour of marrying a daughter to a Bhangas Kulin is said to have been so highly valued in Eastern Bengal that as soon as a boy was ten years old his friends began to discuss his matrimonial prospects, and before he was twenty he had become the husband of many wives of ages varying from five to fifty.

With the spread of education among the upper classes of Bengal an advance in social morality has been made and the grosser forms of polygamy have fallen into disrepute. But the artificial organization of the caste still presses hard on a Kulin father who is unlucky enough to have a large family of daughters. These must be married before they attain puberty, or disgrace will fall on the family, and three generations of ancestors will be dishonoured. But a Kulin bridegroom can only be obtained by paying a heavy premium, many of the meli instituted by Devi Vara have died out, and in such cases, reciprocal marriage being no longer possible, the son of a family left without a corresponding mel must marry the only daughter of a widow; while the daughter of a Kulin widow, for whom no husband of equal birth can be procured, may be married to a Srotriya, and a premium accepted without endangering the family prestige. According to Dr. Wise, a Kulin father in Eastern Bengal could only preserve his kul intact in one of three ways:—By giving her to a Kulin of equal rank; by making an effigy (kusa-kanya) of her with kusa grass and giving it in symbolic marriage to a Kulin; by saying to a Kulin in the presence of ghatak witnesses:—“I would give my daughter, if I had one, to you,” and putting on his forehead the tilak or distinguishing mark which a married woman wears.

The marriage ceremonies of the Bengal Brahmans comprise five important stages, viz.—

1. Purba-biddha, consisting of—(1) The anointment, called tel halud. After preliminaries have been settled, and the patra karan, or formal intimation of the consent of the parties, or rather of their guardians on both sides, has been drawn up, an auspicious day is fixed for anointing both the bridegroom and the bride with turmeric. The process must be undergone by both on the same day—the bride a little while after the bridegroom, each in their own house. Usually a part of the turmeric prepared for the bridegroom is sent by his guardian for the use of the bride, but if the couple live at a distance, this is not deemed essential. In any case the time at which the ceremony should be performed is fixed by letter. Those who can afford to do so distribute oil and turmeric among their neighbours on this occasion.

(2) The entertainment, thubara or äyubriiddhānna. From the day of the anointment until the day of the marriage the betrothed couple are daily entertained by their friends and neighbours, a piece of new cloth being presented at the same time. Presents of sweetmeats and cloth are sent to their houses by friends, and well-to-do people with a large circle of acquaintances often prolong the interval between the anointing with turmeric and the wedding from two or three days to a month. The rule is that after the anointing the first entertainment is given by the parents, and after that neither the bride nor the bridegroom should again eat in their own homes until they are married.

(3) The divine invocation or adhibās. On the night before the wedding some married ladies, the neighbours and relations of the bride and bridegroom are entertained with a repast, and given presents of betel leaves and areca nuts. This is supposed to render the occasion auspicious, and to draw down the blessing of the gods through the goodwill of the ladies entertained, who are looked upon as a sort of fairy god-mothers.

(4) The propitiation of ancestors, Nándimukh or briddhi srādhh, is an ordinary srādhh performed at noon on the wedding day in order to procure the blessing of the deceased ancestors on the couple. Four ancestors on the father's and three on the mother's side of both parties are thus invoked: if the father and grandfather of the intended bride or bridegroom be living, then only their two immediate (deceased) predecessors, and if only the father be living, then his three immediate predecessors only. The srādhh is performed by the father, or in his absence by the brother, or failing him again by a gyåti (agnate) of the bride or the bridegroom as the case may be. If a gyåti be not procurable, then the family priest may officiate.

(5) The bridal procession (bar-jåtri). In the evening or, if he lives at a distance, earlier, the bridegroom goes in procession accompanied by a kolbar, or best man, who is usually his younger brother, and by a number of his relations, friends and neighbours to the house of the bride, where he is received as in a durbar, his approach being welcomed by the cry of ulu-ulu from the females of the bride's family. He sits on a masnad set apart for him in the centre of the hall, and there surrounded by those who accompanied him and by the bride's people (kamyåjåtri), he awaits the moment fixed by the astrologers as auspicious for the performance of the actual ceremony.
(6) Jāmatā-baran, or the bridegroom's welcome by the bride's father. When the proper time has come, the bridegroom is taken by the bride's father into the inner apartments of the house, and is made to stand on a piece of board painted with pounded or powdered rice stirred up with water. The bride's father then offers him water for washing his feet (pādiya argha) and also madhuparkya, a concoction of honey, in a small copper cup. These the bridegroom touches in token of acceptance.

(7) Strī-āchār, or woman's usage, commences with the welcome given to the bridegroom by the bride's mother by pouring some curds on his feet. This is followed by—

(a) Satusi or the seven lights of Hymen. Seven married ladies (including the bride's mother or, if she be a widow, one of the bride's aunts) in their best attire, each with a small torch made of chīta twig and cotton steeped in oil, go round the bridegroom in procession, led by the bride's mother, who carries on her head a kuli, or flat bamboo basket, on which are placed 21 small lights made of dhatura fruits. As they go round, they sprinkle libations of water, one of them blows a shell trumpet, and all vociferate the hymeneal cry of uulu-ululu. After going seven times round the bridegroom, the lights are thrown one by one over his head, so that they fall behind him. The kuli is then picked up and placed in front of the bridegroom, and the bride's mother takes her stand upon it and touches (baran) the forehead of the bridegroom with water, paddy and durba grass, betel and areca nut, white mustard seed, curds, white sandal paste, vermilion, a looking-glass, a comb, a bit of clay from the bed of the Ganges, a yak's tail, shells, a cluster of plantains, and certain other odds and ends, while the rest of the women keep up the cry of uulu-ululu. The bridegroom's height is measured with a thin thread which the bride's mother eats in a bit of plantain. She then places a weaver's shuttle (mōku) between his folded hands and ties them together with thread, and calls upon him, now that he has been bound hand and foot, to bleat once like a sheep to signify his humility and subjection. Last of all, she touches his breast with a padlock and turns the key, whereby the door of speech is closed to the passage of hard words against the bride.

(b) Sātpāk, or the seven rounds of the bride. The bride is now brought out attired in a red silk cloth, and seated on a painted board is carried by two men seven times round the bridegroom, who remains standing and then placed in front of him. As they face each other, a cloth or cover is thrown over them, and their natural shyness being thus for the moment hidden, they are supposed to snatch the subhadrishti or auspicious glance, which will secure their mutual happiness during their married life. Then follows—

(c) Mābyadān, or the exchange of garlands, when the bride and bridegroom give each other garlands of flowers.

II. Sampradān, or the gift and acceptance. The bride and bridegroom are next brought to a place set apart in the outer apartment or courtyard of the house, where the bride's party and the bridegroom's party can witness the formal gift of the bride and her formal acceptance by the bridegroom. The bride's father or guardian repeats the mantras recited by the family priest, and the bridegroom accepts the gift in these words:—“Who gave her? To whom did he give her? Love gave her. To love he gave her. Love is the giver. Love is the taker. Love pervades the ocean. With love I accept her. Love! may this be thine.”

At the same time wedding presents (dán or dán sámagri) are given to the bridegroom, and after this the father or guardian is required to bear witness to the contract entered into by the bridegroom by accepting the bride, and as a token of his assent to the marriage accepts a present of five haritaki fruits and a piece of cloth. This present is called the parihar.

III. Basara or the bridal wake. The bridegroom is next conducted along with the bride to a room in the inner apartment of the house, a corner of his chhádar being tied to a corner of her cloth. The pair are there received by a bevy of young ladies, who make it their business to tease the bridegroom and try to keep him awake for the rest of the night.

IV. Kusandiká includes the saptapadi gaman, or pacing of the seven steps, which may be deemed the essential and binding portion of the marriage ritual observed by the higher castes. A sacred fire is prepared and worshipped with oblations of ghi. On the north side of the fire seven points are marked off, and the bride setting her face westward walks along these points, placing her foot on each in turn. As she walks, her husband follows close behind her, touching her heel with his toe and reciting at each step mantras or sacred texts.

Saptapadi gaman is followed by gotra paribarttan, or the changing of the bride’s gotra for that of the bridegroom, and the sindur-dán, or the smearing of vermilion on the bride’s forehead and the parting of her hair. The latter ceremony is performed by the husband with his own hand.

Properly speaking, kusandiká ought to take place on the day following the marriage, but Tuesdays and Saturdays are considered unlucky days for the ceremony; and if the day after the wedding is Tuesday or Saturday, kusandiká is deferred till the day following that. It is usually performed at the house of the bridegroom, but if he lives a long way off, the ceremony is performed at the bride's father's house. The marriage proper ends with kusandiká, but certain minor ceremonies follow which may be briefly mentioned here.

V. The concluding ceremonies—

(a) Phul-sojáyá, or the bed of flowers. On the third night after the marriage, the married couple are laid together in a bed decorated with flowers.

(b) Ashta-mangala. On the eighth day the pair are made to enact with toys and cowrie shells a sort of pantomimic drama of their married life, playing the part of a faithful husband and wife, and affecting to bear with resignation the vicissitudes of fortunes.

(c) Baukhát or Páka-sparsa. All the gyádis, relations and friends of the bridegroom are entertained at his house. Their acceptance of the invitation is deemed an admission on their part that the marriage has been duly performed, and that the ceremonial purity of the bridegroom has in no wise been affected. In token of their recognition of this fact, they are supposed to eat rice prepared by the bride herself.

After the Páka-sparsa ceremony, the bride is sent back to her father's house until she attains puberty. When this time arrives it is the custom of some families to perform the ceremony known as garbhádháns (purification of the womb) or punarbibháha. This rite, to which some Hindu writers have attributed a sort of sacramental character, seems to be closely analogous to the practices observed by a number of savage races on a similar occasion. The idea seems to be, as Mr. J. G. Frazer¹ has pointed out, that dangerous influences emanate from a girl when passing through this physical change, and it is considered necessary to seclude her from the rest of the community, and subject her to a sort of penance which varies greatly in severity. Thus the Macusi tribe of British Guiana hang a girl in this state in a hammock at the top of the hut, and make her fast rigorously so long as the symptoms are at their height. When she gets well the pots and drinking vessels which she has used are broken; and after her first bath she must submit to be beaten by her mother with thin rods without uttering a cry. Another tribe, instead of beating girls who have just recovered from this state, expose them to certain large ants whose bite is very painful. The usage followed by the Ráhí Brahmans of Bengal is less severe, but of the same general character as the savage observances. Like the Australian blacks and the African Bushmen, they require a girl to live alone, and do not allow her to see the face of any male. During three days she is shut up in a dark room and is made to undergo certain penances. She must lead the life of a Brahmachári, that is, she must live upon dátar rice and ghee, fish and flesh being strictly interdicted, and she may not eat any sweetmeats. Where this ceremony is observed, it is held to be a necessary preliminary to the commencement of marital intercourse. By a recent change in the law it has been made criminal to have intercourse with a girl under twelve years of age.

It has been mentioned above that the Barendra Brahmans claim to be descended from the five Kanaujiya Brahmans imported by Adisura by their original or Hindustani wives. General tradition, however, rejects the latter portion of the claim, and holds that the Barendra are the offspring, not of the original wives, but of Bengali women whom the Kanaujiyas married after their settlement in Bengal. The sub-caste takes its name from the tract of country known as Barendra lying ¹ The Golden Bough, pp. 228-42.

north of the river Padma between the Kamarupa and Mahánanda rivers, and corresponding roughly to the districts of Pabna, Rajshahi, and Bogra. Ballal Sen reorganised the Barendra at the same time as the Rârhi Brahmans, and divided them into three hypergamous classes: (1) Kulin, (2) Suddha or pure Srotriya, (3) Kashta or bad Srotriya. The first class was subdivided into eight gâins or communes: Bhadra, Bhâdri, Bihari, Lahari, Maitra, Rudra-Vâgisi, Sâdhu-Vâgisi, and Santâmani or Sândilya; the second into seven groups of the same kind; Atharthi, Bhattasali, Champati, Kâmadev-ta, Karanjan, Nandavâsâi, and Navsi; and the third into eighty-four families, the names of which need not be enumerated here.
In addition to the gâins we find among the Kulins a further division into eight pâti or social grades: Atub-Kahini, Baini, Boenah, Janail, Kutb-Kahni, Nirahâl, Panchuria, Rahala. The object of this grouping is not very clear. Every gâin belongs to a pâti, but the pâti is not always identical with the gâin, for members of the same gâin sometimes marry into different pâtis. The gâins appear to be in theory endogamous. The system of reciprocal mariage (pâtî-prakriti) which prevails among Rârhi Brahmans is unknown in the Barendra group. The rules governing the three main classes permit a Kulin to marry a Suddha-Srotriya girl, and the children of such a marriage rank as Kulins. Should he marry a Kashta-Srotriya, he loses his kul and becomes a Kâp, an irregular group occupying much the same position as the Bansaja among Rârhi Brahmans. If a Barendra Kulin marries the daughter of a Kâp, he himself is degraded to the group to which his wife belongs, but his children hold somewhat higher rank, and are deemed eligible for marriage to Kulins. No Kulin girl may marry below her own class. If a suitable husband cannot be found, she goes through the form of symbolical marriage to a figure of kusa grass, and has red lead smeared upon her forehead to show that she is really a wife.
The gotras of the Barendra sub-caste are the same as those of the Rârhi, viz., Bharadwaja, Kasyapa, Sândilya, Savarna and Vatsya.
Their commonest titles are Bhattacharya, Bhumik, Chakravartti, Chaudhari, Majumdar, Parihal, and Sikhdar.

Concerning the origin of the Vaidik Brahmans some differences of opinion exist. All agree in honouring them for their adherence to Vedic rites, their zeal for Vedic studies, their social independence, and their rejection of polygamy. From the fact that some of the most important settlements of the sub-caste are found in the outlying districts of Orissa and Sylhet, some authorities have been led to describe them as descendants of the original Brahmans of Bengal who refused to accept the reforms of Ballal Sen, and took refuge in regions beyond his jurisdiction.
Genealogists of rival sub-castes maintain that Ballal Sen excluded them from his scheme on the ground that they did not come up to his standard of purity of descent. Buchanan mentions a tradition lingering among the Vaidik Brahmans of Dinajpur that they had been introduced into that district by Advaita Subuddhi Narayana, Râjâ of Sylhet. In Orissa, on the other hand, the representatives of this sub-caste are said to have come direct from Kanauj, and to have made their first settlement in Puri about the twelfth century A.D. This opinion derives support from Mr. Sherring's statement that the Kanaujiya Brahmans of Benares recognise the Vaidik as a branch of their own tribe who have settled in Bengal.

There are two main divisions of Vaidik Brahmans—(1) Paschatya or western, claiming to have come from Kanauj, and (2) Dakshinátya or southern, tracing their origin to the original Bengal stock. The Paschátya had originally eleven gotras, divided into two groups, known as the pancha and shash. The former included Bharadwája, Sándilya, Saunaka Savarna, and Vasishtha; the latter, Gautama, Kasyapa, Krishnátreya, Rathikara, Sunaka, and Vachyara. The Bharadwája gotra, however, became extinct, its place being taken by the Sunaka gotra of the Shash group. In course of time other gotras, Ghrita Kausiki, Maitrátali, Tuthikara, and Upamanyu, came to be formed, but the relations of these to the original eleven are not very precisely defined.

Vaidik Brahmans have no Kulins, and their phataks or genealogists are Brahmans of other sub-castes. Their titles are the same as those of other Bengal Brahmans: Bhaṭṭacharya, Chakravartti, and Thákur, are common designations among them. The Paschátya branch is said to have been formerly distributed in fourteen stháns or settlements. Three of these—Dadhícigré.m, Marícigrém, and Sántali—have now disappeared, and even their sites are unknown. Of the remaining eleven, Chandráwip, Kotélipáda, Sámanta Sára, are in Backergunge; Alambi, Brahma Paraka, Jayári in Raishahi; Akhara, Gauráli, Páni Kántaka in Faridpur; Madhyadesa in Jessore; and Navadvíp in Nuddea. In theory, these settlements seem to have been of the same character as the mela created for the Ráhari Brahmans by Deví Vara. It was intended that all Vaidik Brahmans should reside in one of these villages, and that marriage should be restricted to the local limits laid down. At the present day, however, many families live elsewhere and intermarry with families similarly situated. They can, however, rejoin the original Samáj or association of communes on payment of a heavy fine.

According to popular tradition, the Saptasati Brahmans are descended from the seven hundred ignorant Brahmans sent by Adisura to the Court of Kanauj for the purpose of learning their priestly duties. Others trace their origin to certain Brahmans who were exiled beyond the Brahmaputra river for resisting the innovations of Ballál Sen. It seems to be certain that they are peculiar to Bengal, and that they cannot claim connexion with any of the ten standard Brahmanical tribes. This view is borne out by the names of their gotras, which, as will be seen from the list given in the Appendix, differ entirely from the standard Brahmanical series, and appear to be of a local or territorial rather than of an eponymous type. The Saptasati themselves virtually admit their inferiority to the other orders of Brahmans. Men of education and respectability are reluctant to admit that they belong to this sub-caste, all distinctive practices are being abandoned, and the entire group seems likely to be absorbed in the Srotriya grade of Rarhi.
Brahmans. The Saptasati have no Kulins, nor do they keep ghataks for the purpose of maintaining genealogies. Notwithstanding this, they give their daughters in marriage to Kulins of the Rárhí sub-caste, and by paying a heavy dowry, often amounting to as much as one thousand rupees, may even obtain brides from families of the Srotiya class. It is further said that a Rárhí Kulin will eat and drink with the Saptasati, while a Bansaja, though of lower rank than a Kulin, would consider this a degradation. The ordinary title of the Saptasati is Sarma, not Dev-Sarma, as among the ten recognised tribes. Chakravartí, Chaudhuri, Ráí, and Sarkár are also common appellations.

The Madhyasreni Brahmans profess to derive their name from the fact of their original settlements being in the district of Midnapur, lying midway (Madhya-desa) between Bengal and Orissa. They say that their ancestors were Rárhí Brahmans who settled early in Ballál Sen’s reign in pargana Mayna in Midnapur. When Ballál Sen was engaged in classifying the Brahmans of the rest of Bengal according to their degree of virtue, he sent a ghatak or genealogist to the Brahmans settled in Mayna to include them in the scheme. They declined, however, to have anything to say to the institution of Kulinism, and there are no Kulins among them to this day. For their resistance to his orders, Ballál Sen ordered them to be cut off from the rest of the caste, and all intercourse between them and the Brahmans of Bengal Proper was strictly forbidden. The Rárhí Brahmans of the present day, with whom the Madhyasreni thus claim kinship, are by no means inclined to accept this legend as true. They point out that it is prima facie most unlikely that a colony of Rárhí Brahmans should have left their original seats for no particular reason, and have settled in an out-of-the-way place like pargana Mayna. Again, it is said, if the Madhyasreni were really Rárhí Brahmans, how is it that they have eight gotras, including Parásara, Gautama and Ghrita Kausika, while the true Rárhí have only five? Gautama and Ghrita Kausika are found among the Brahmans of Orissa, and Parásara is said to be characteristic of the Saptasati Brahmans of Bengal, whose ignorance of correct ritual compelled Adisura to import the ancestors of the Rárhí Brahmans from Kanaúj. On these grounds it is conjectured that the Madhyasreni Brahmans may be a composite group made up of members of the Rárhí, Utkal and Saptasati sub-castes, who for some reason broke off from their own classes, settled in an outlying district, and in course of time formed a new sub-caste. Some go so far as to suggest that the original Madhyasreni were expelled from their own sub-castes, and quote a local tradition attaching to them the name Madyadoshi, ‘guilty of drunkenness,’ in support of this view. Although the standard form of Kulinism is not recognised by the Madhyasreni, those families among them who bear the Rárhí Kulin names of Mukharji, Chatterji, Banerji, are specially sought after in marriage, which practically comes to much the same thing. Another curious form of hypergamy is also in force among them. People who live in the four villages (Bhamua in pargana Mayna Gokulnagar in Chetua, and Mahárájpur and Bhogdanda in Kedar) supposed to be the original seats of the caste are held in great honour, and residents of other villages who marry their daughters to them are expected to pay a heavy bridegroom-price.

Most of the Madhyasreni are worshippers of the Saktis, but in the matter of religion and ceremonial observances generally they do not depart materially from the practices of other Brahmans. It should be observed, however, that widows among them are allowed to eat uncooked food on the eleventh day of either fortnight of the moon, while the widows of other Brahmanical sub-castes are not allowed to touch even water on that day. Some Madhyasrenis again serve the Goalás or Gops as their family priests, and others are said to eat uncooked food at religious ceremonies performed by members of the Kaibartta caste, and to accept gifts from them on those occasions.

The most striking features in the organization of the Brahman caste in Behar are the great number of sub-castes and sections and the complexity of the system of exogamy which prevails among them. All recognise the classical traditions concerning the origin of Brahmans in general, and to these are superadded a number of more or less credible legends designed to account for the separation of particular groups from the main body.

The few Saráswata Brahmans who are found in Behar claim descent from the Aryan tribe of the Sáraswatas, who inhabited the banks of the Saraswati river in the Panjab. They rank as the first of the five Gauras living north of the Vindhya range. The Sáraswatas of the Panjab have a very large number of subdivisions, deriving their names from the places in which their ancestors had settled, or from nicknames given to individuals. Lists of these were collected by Pandit Radha Krishna for Dr. John Wilson, and are given in the second volume of the latter's work on Indian castes. No attempt, however, is made to distinguish the endogamous, exogamous, and hypergamous groups, and it is clear from an examination of the lists that sub-castes, sections, and titles denoting hypergamous classes have been mixed up together. The Sáraswat Brahmans of Behar, a comparatively small community living at a great distance from the main body of their tribe, have been unable to maintain the elaborate endogamous organization which is found among their brethren in the Panjab. They have no sub-castes, and the titles Sukul, Báipai, Awasthi, etc., which are found among them, do not appear to have any bearing upon marriage. Within the last few years they have begun to intermarry with the Gaur Brahmans.

The Kanya Kubja or Kanaujia Brahmans are counted among the five Gauras. Three main divisions of them are found in Behar: (1) Antarvrdi or Kanaujia proper, coming from the country between the Ganges and Jamna; (2) Sarjupári or Sarwaria, who are said to have settled on the east of the Sarju or Gogra in the time of Rájá Aja, grandfather of Ráma. Another story of the origin of the Sarwaria group is worth telling here for the light that it throws... upon the part which misunderstood names may play in the growth of popular tradition:—Once upon a time there were two brothers, Kanha and Kuhja. They lived at Kanauj, and their descendants were called Kanaujia Brahmans. Now Ram Chandra, King of Ajodhya, wished to perform the great sacrifice of a horse, and sent for the Kanaujia Brahmans to help him. When they were starting, their father made them promise not to take any present for what they were going to do. But it seems that the sacrifice was of no effect unless the Brahmans were duly rewarded. The Rájá knew this, and caused diamonds to be hidden in the packets of betel which he gave to the Brahmans. When they got home their father asked if they had taken any presents, and they said they had not.
But when the packets of betel were opened the diamonds were found, and those Brahmans were at once turned out of their caste. So they went back to the king, ready to curse him for his treachery.
But he appeased them with smooth words and with grants of land to dwell on, and the grants were made in this way. The king shot an arrow as far as he could, and the place where it fell was the boundary of the land. Now the name of an arrow is sar: so these Brahmans were called Sarwaria. (3) Sanaudhia or Sanaudhisi, a group of inferior status, concerning whom the following legend is told. It is said that Rams, King of Ajodhya, celebrated a sacrifice and made a great feast, to which he invi-et all the Kanaujia Brahmans. In order to test their orthodoxy he desired them to perform the sacrifice, and afterwards to partake of the feast fully clothed and not merely with a loin-cloth on, as is the custom of Brahmans. The Sarwaria and the Antarvedi deprecated to agree to this departure from established usage, but the Sanaudhia attended the feast and did as the king suggested. For this breach of Brahmanical etiquette they were cut off from communication with the orthodox, and degraded to a lower level of social and ceremonial purity. The Kanaujias as a class are tall and athletic, though wanting in the peculiar fineness of feature and intellectual cast of countenance which distinguishes the higher grades of Brahmans in other parts of India. Those of them who enlist in the Native Army are known as Purbiyas, or men of the east, in contradistinction to the people of the Panjab, and one of their titles, Pánre or Pánde, being originally a corruption of the word pandit, a learned man, became, under the form of Pandy, the generic designation of the mutineers of 1857. Their immoderate scruples concerning ceremonial purity in matters of food and drink are held up to ridicule in the well-known proverb Tin Kanaujıa tera chutha—"Three Kanaujias want thirteen fireplaces."

The Gaur Brahmans of Behar, like their brethren of the Delhi district, insist that their designation is derived from the ruined city of Gaur or Lakhnauti in Maldah, once the capital of Bengal. They say that their ancestors left Gaur in the days of the Pándavas at the commencement of the Kali Yuga, and settled in the country round Delhi. Another version of the same story is that Rájá Agar, the eponym of the Agarwal caste, sent for these Brahmans from Bengal, in the same way as Adisur summoned Brahmans from Kanauj. This tradition, reversing as it does the usual direction of the advance of the Brahmanical tribes, has been received with doubt by all writers on the subject of caste. General Cunningham’s opinion, that the Gaura Brahmans must have belonged originally to the district of Gonda and not to the medieval city of Gaur in Bengal seems to offer the best solution of the difficulty. The Gaur Brahmans serve the Agarwals as priests—a fact which is in keeping with, and may have given rise to, the legend noticed above. In Behar they recognise two sub-castes, ADI GAUR and MADHA GAUR. Many observers have remarked on the liberal spirit displayed by the Gaur Brahmans and on their freedom from that pedantry which the Kanaujias show in caste questions. We may perhaps claim as an illustration of these qualities the fact that within the last few years intermarriage between Gaur and Saraswata Brahmans has come to be recognised in Behar. On the other hand, it is equally probable that this relaxation of the strict rule of exogamy may have been the result of the numerical weakness of the two groups. The members of a small sub-caste, broken up, as such a group necessarily is, into a number of exogamous groups and scattered over a large area of country, are bound to find considerable difficulty in getting their daughters married. Whenever this difficulty occurs, the tendency will be to enlarge the matrimonial circle so as to increase the number of husbands available at a given time. The Gaur and Saraswata Brahmans, both immigrants into Behar from a distant part of India and separated from their original home by a number of intervening tribes, would be in much the same position as the Kāyasthas and Baidyas in the outlying districts of Eastern Bengal, and would, like them, be driven to modify the strict rules of caste in accordance with the dictates of social necessity.

The MAITHIL or TIRHUTIA Brahmans rank among the Panch Gaur. Their name is derived from Mithila, an ancient division of India, comprising the modern districts of Saran, Mozufferpur, Darbhanga, Purniah, and part of Nepal. Dr. Wilson, following Colebrooke, observes that fewer distinctions are recognised among the Maithil Brahmans than among any other of the great divisions of Brahmans in India. This statement needs to be qualified. It is true that the Maithil have no endogamous divisions, but their exogamous groups are peculiarly numerous and complex, and they have a complete hypergamous system. For the latter purpose the caste is divided into five groups—SROTRIYA or SOT, JOG, PANJIBADH, NAGAR, and JAIWAR—which take rank in this order. A man of the Srotriya group may take a wife from the lower groups and is usually paid a considerable sum of money for doing so, but he loses in social estimation by the match, and the children of such unions, though higher than the class from which their mothers came, are nevertheless not deemed to be socially equal to the members of their father’s class. The same rule applies to the other classes in descending order: each may take wives from the groups below it. The principle of this rule is the same as that followed by Manu in laying down the matrimonial relations of the four original castes, and in its earliest form it seems to have gone the full length of forbidding a woman of a higher group to marry a man of a lower group. It is important, however, to notice that in Behar the rule is now much less stringent and rigid than in Bengal. Although it is admitted to be the right thing for a girl to marry within her own group or in a higher group, it is not absolutely obligatory for her to do so, and cases do occur in which a girl of a higher class marries a man of a lower class in consideration of a substantial bride-price being paid to her parents. The comparative laxity of Behar usage in this respect may be due partly to the character of the people and partly to the fact that caste observances in that part of the country have never been laid down by a superior authority, such as Ballāl Sen, but have been settled by the people themselves at regular meetings held with that object. It is well known that the leading members of the Maithil sub-caste with their pandits, their pānjūrāis or genealogists, and their ghataks or marriage-brokers, come together at many places in Tirhut for the purpose of settling disputed questions of caste custom and of arranging marriages. A community which has five hypergamous classes and a double series of exogamous groups—one based on locality and the other on mythical ancestry—and at the same time attaches great importance to purity of blood, may well find it necessary to take stock of its arrangements from time to time and to see whether the rules are being observed.

Among the Maithil Brahmans of Behar, as among the Kulins of Bengal, the bride-price familiar to students of early tradition has given place to the bridegroom-price, which hypergamy necessarily tends to develop. Polygamy, formerly characteristic of the Bengal Kulin, is practised in Behar in much the same form by the Bikauwā or ‘vendor,’ a class of Maithil Brahmans who derive their name from the practice of selling themselves, or more rarely their minor sons, to the daughter of the lower groups of the series given above. Usually the Bikauwās belong to the Jog and Panjībaddh classes, and comparatively few of them are found among the Srotriya and Nagar groups. Some have as many as forty or fifty wives, who live with their own parents and are visited at intervals by their husbands. Bikauwā Brahmans who have married into the lower classes are not received on equal terms by the members of their own class, but the women whom they marry consider themselves raised by the alliance. The price paid for a Bikauwā varies according to the class to which he belongs and the means of the family of the girl whom he is to marry. It may be as little as Rs. 20: it has been known to rise as high as Rs. 6,000.

The Sākdwipi or Sakaldwipi Brahmans are supposed to have been brought by Rama from Ceylon for the purpose of practising medicine. According to another opinion they were the indigenous Brahmans of the ancient country of Magadha. Some say that it is for this reason that they were formerly called Magas. The name, however, has dropped into disuse, and the Sákadwipi themselves prefer the legend associating them with Rama’s famous invasion to that connecting them with a part of the country proverbial among Hindus for its ceremonial impurity. At the present day the bulk of the sub-caste are employed as priests in Rajput families; some are landholders, some practise Hindu medicine. It is a curious fact that, although the Sákadwipi have the standard eponymous gotras of the Brahman caste, their marriages are regulated not by these, but by ninety-five purus or divisions of the local or territorial type; that is to say, a Sákadwipi man may marry a woman of his own gotra who in theory is descended from the same mythical ancestor (rishi) as himself, but may not marry a woman whose forefathers are shown by the name of her pur to have come from the same village or the same tract of country as his own. To abandon the gotra altogether and to substitute for it exogamous divisions based on a wholly different order of facts involves so serious a departure from orthodox usage that one is inclined to doubt whether the Sákadwipi can ever have been organized on the regular lines. This doubt is borne out by the statement made by Mr. Sherring,* that “the test applied to a stranger pretending to be a Sákadwipi is to offer him what is called jhuthá pán, or water from a vessel from which another person has drunk—a custom prohibited by all strict sects of Hindus. Should the stranger not be a Sákadwipi, he will refuse the water, probably with some indignation, as, by drinking it, his caste, whatever it was, would be broken. If a Sákadwipi, however, he will take it readily.”

According to Mr. John Beames, the best living authority on all questions touching the history of Orissa:——

* Hindu Tribes and Castes, vol. i, p. 102.
BRAHMAN.

to the Veda whose ritual they profess to observe, and into gotras or exogamous groups. In addition to this, certain titles or upādhis are appropriated to particular gotras, for which they serve, as Mr. Beames points out, the purpose of surnames. It is perhaps due to this connexion with the gotra that the titles themselves are frequently used as exogamous divisions. The scheme of srenis, gotras, upādhis, and Vedio classes worked out by Mr. Beames is shown in the Appendix. Concerning the gotra names, he observes that they "are for the most part patronymics from well-known Rishis, and are identical with many of those still in use in the North-Western Provinces. This circumstance seems to add confirmation to the legend of the origin of this caste from Kanauj. A Rishi's name occurs also among upādhis in one instance; Sārangi being from Sankrit Sārangi, patronymic from Sringa Rishi."

The entire series of names offers an interesting illustration of the curious complexity of the internal structure of the Brahman caste. Starting with the two groups, DAKHINATYA and UTTARA, based upon territorial habitat, we find each of these broken up into smaller groups, taking their names from certain specialised functions, and also into groups tracing their descent from a mythical ancestor; while through the whole runs a fourth series of distinctive titles, indicating some form of personal merit, whether proficiency in religious knowledge, fullness of ascetic virtue, or it may be merely descent from famous ancestry. By making it possible to classify families in order as it were of hereditary merit, such titles are specially adapted to give rise to a system of hypergamy. Once let it be admitted and placed on record that a particular family has attained to a high degree of ceremonial purity, and it follows that marriages with members of that family will acquire a special value, which in course of time will take the form of a bride or bridegroom-price. But besides this, titular groups can also be used for exogamous purposes, and this is the case in Orissa, though it is extremely unusual among the higher castes. Lastly, I may draw attention to the remarkable fact that among the Brahmans of this part of the country unquestionable traces may be found of a survival of the totemistic beliefs which are common among the Dravidian and semi-Dravidian groups. Thus the Brahmans of the Batsasa gotra revere the calf as their original ancestor; the Bharadvaja claim descent not from the Vedic Rishi, but from a bird bearing the same name; the Atreya are the offspring of a deer, and will not eat that animal or sit upon its hide; the Kaushhas trace their lineage to a tortoise; and the Kaundinya commemorate their descent from the tiger by refusing to sit upon a tiger skin. No attempt can be made here to account for the prevalence of these superstitions. They may be a survival of ancient Aryan totemism; they may be due to the adoption by the immigrant Brahmans of Dravidian beliefs and observances; or, lastly, they may show that the Brahmans of Orissa are themselves Dravidians or have undergone a considerable infusion of Dravidian blood.

An attempt is made in the Appendix to reconcile Mr. Beames' account of the divisions of the Northern Orissa Brahmans with the structural divisions of the caste in Orissa generally.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Brahmins in 1872 and 1881:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>166,824</td>
<td>107,854</td>
<td>Neakhal</td>
<td>7,648</td>
<td>10,963</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>49,473</td>
<td>84,922</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>31,099</td>
<td>51,549</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>48,287</td>
<td>89,754</td>
<td>Chittagong Hill Tracts</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>101</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>118,700</td>
<td>117,414</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>39,978</td>
<td>47,041</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>107,554</td>
<td>70,571</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>64,319</td>
<td>69,570</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>107,554</td>
<td>39,141</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>193,651</td>
<td>213,358</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>150,102</td>
<td>114,911</td>
<td>Morrelpur</td>
<td>183,777</td>
<td>38,396</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>60,024</td>
<td>69,896</td>
<td>Dacbhanga</td>
<td>172,552</td>
<td>248,215</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>51,999</td>
<td>37,753</td>
<td>Seran</td>
<td>140,430</td>
<td>173,566</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>26,644</td>
<td>26,056</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>60,515</td>
<td>76,786</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kursehetabad</td>
<td>35,749</td>
<td>25,203</td>
<td>Mongly</td>
<td>45,462</td>
<td>67,291</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinsajpur</td>
<td>4,289</td>
<td>8,013</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>58,443</td>
<td>71,499</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmahal</td>
<td>15,606</td>
<td>18,233</td>
<td>Furdiah</td>
<td>58,187</td>
<td>54,928</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankapur</td>
<td>20,871</td>
<td>31,170</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>15,186</td>
<td>14,336</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boora</td>
<td>10,410</td>
<td>12,075</td>
<td>Sambhal Parganas</td>
<td>25,530</td>
<td>36,975</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palsma</td>
<td>12,862</td>
<td>20,670</td>
<td>Outjack</td>
<td>103,579</td>
<td>177,129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dalaili</td>
<td>1,092</td>
<td>3,685</td>
<td>Furi</td>
<td>86,569</td>
<td>85,692</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaipuri</td>
<td>1,578</td>
<td>3,740</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>106,192</td>
<td>119,573</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>3,602</td>
<td>3,740</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>68,480</td>
<td>89,435</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deccan</td>
<td>51,031</td>
<td>60,545</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>31,740</td>
<td>38,423</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>43,232</td>
<td>54,315</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>27,258</td>
<td>45,439</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakawanj</td>
<td>66,544</td>
<td>44,736</td>
<td>Srinibhun</td>
<td>4,085</td>
<td>4,085</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansinh</td>
<td>17,344</td>
<td>20,152</td>
<td>Manibhun</td>
<td>93,701</td>
<td>90,190</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>26,607</td>
<td>21,355</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>5,755</td>
<td>8,463</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Brahman, a synonym for Bābhān; a religious group of Jugis in Bengal.

Brahmapur, a samādī or local group of the Sābarna gotra of Pāschātya Baidik Brahmins in Bengal.

Brāhmarshi, a section of the Bhar caste in Western Bengal. The term appears to have been borrowed from the Brahmanical system in comparatively recent times, as the caste has also a set of the totemistic sections characteristic of the Kolarian races. An eponymous section of Sānkhaśir and Tāntīs in Bengal.

Brahma-vādī, a title of Brahmins, meaning one who asserts that Brahma—the one spirit—really exists, and nothing else.

Brāhmilchā, a thar or sept of Sunuwārs in Darjiling.

Brahmirī Dhān, a thar of the Basishttha gotra of Nepāli Brahmins.

Brahl, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Brājabāśi, (i) residents of Braj, the tract of country round Brindaban, in the North-Western Provinces; (ii) the warlike character of the Braj people has led to the term Brājabāśi being used to denote an armed attendant, one carrying arms, as a sword and shield, or sometimes a matchlock, and employed as a door-keeper, a guard, or an escort; (iii) a synonym for Bediyā, q.v.

Brangplagi, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Briddha, a section of Brahmins.

Brihaspati, a section of Brahmins.
Brihatbat, a section of Chásá-dhobás in Bengal.

Brijía, a synonym for Binjhiá.

Brijíá-Agaría, a sub-tribe of Agariaś in Chota Nagpur.

Brikhan, a section of the Korá caste in Western Bengal.

Bud or Budwar, Wednesday, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Budhaure, a mu! of the Kás-yapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Budhbansi, a sept of the Chan-drabansi division of Rajputs in Behar.

Budhwére-Mahesi, a mu? of DaBrp)lli11pé.asectionof Murmis in Behar.

Budhwére-Sakuri, a mu! of the Bétsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Budhware-Dumré, a mu! of the Bátáa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Budhwáre-Balhé, a mu! of the Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Buku, a worm, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Bukhariá, a title of Bábhans in Behar.

Bukru, a sept of Lohars and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Butun, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Bulung, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Bumákámchhá, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Buniá, Banúá, Buno, the vague popular designation of a number of castes and tribes in Central and Eastern Bengal, who are believed to have immigrated into that part of the country from Western and Northern Bengal and from Chota Nagpur. The term does not lend itself to precise definition, but, I believe, the following to be a fairly accurate list of the castes which it ordinarily includes:—(1) Bhuiya, (2) Bhumij, (3) Bádí, (4) Bauri, (5) Ghasi, (6) Kharwár, (7) Korá, (8) Munda, (9) Oraon, (10) Rajbansi, (11) Rajwár, (12) Santál. Of these all but the Rajbansi are natives of Western Bengal or Chota Nagpur, where the undulating nature of the country and the system of terracing for rice render the area available for cold weather crops, such as wheat, millets, and the like, exceedingly small. The result is that from the end of November to about the middle of April the classes who live by field labour have practically nothing to do, and wander eastwards in large number in search of work. Many if not most of them are employed in gathering in the rice harvest of Central and Eastern Bengal; some clear the chats of the Mega and Brahmaputra, or sow indigo for the planters of Rajshahye, while others find employment nearer home under the municipalities of Calcutta and its suburbs. Towards the middle of March this stream of labour again sets westward, and long lines of men may be met returning to plough their own fields with the first showers of April. Some, however, stay behind and settle in a more or less nomadic fashion in the districts east of the Hughli. To these scattered colonists, whose freedom from scruples in the matter of food cuts them off from their more orthodox neighbours, who repel the Hindu by eating fowls, and the Mahomedan by their partiality for pork, the natives of Central and Eastern Bengal have given the name of Buna. The etymology of the word is obscure, but I suspect it to be a corrupted form of ban or jungle, having reference either to the fact that the castes and tribes in question hail from the jungles of Western Bengal, or to the aptitude that they show for clearing and bringing under cultivation waste lands covered with jungle. In either case it is closely analogous to the word "jungly," which is used by persons concerned with emigration to the tea districts as a general designation for all coolies who come from Chota Nagpur.

The aggregate denoted by the word Buna has some points of resemblance to a caste in the popular sense of the word. Its members bear a common descriptive name, perform very similar functions, and, I believe, eat certain kinds of food and smoke tobacco together. They do not, however, intermarry, and the various castes and tribes grouped together in Eastern Bengal under the name of Buna regard themselves in their own country as perfectly distinct. It is of course difficult to define precisely the extent of the rapprochement that has taken place between them in their new homes; but it is at least conceivable that the bonds which now unite them may hereafter be drawn closer, and that the different members of the Buna group may in course of time intermarry without regard to the caste to which they originally belonged. Should this be the case, it will serve to illustrate a process which I believe very rarely occurs—the formation of a caste by the re-integration of units already differentiated from a common stock. It is tolerably certain that most of the castes included among the Bunas are offshoots from the great aboriginal race whom the Aryans found in possession of the plains of India. They have, however, long ago parted into separate marriage groups, and it will be curious to see whether their comparative isolation as settlers in Central and Eastern Bengal causes them to re-unite. The only analogous instance that I know of is that of the Chattarkhai caste in Orissa.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Buna group in 1872 and 1881. The statistics are not very valuable, as many Bunas would probably have described themselves by the name of their own caste instead of by the less definite generic term Buna.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>876</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>Bangpur</td>
<td>193</td>
<td>77</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>2,115</td>
<td>477</td>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>2,546</td>
<td>4,211</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>Barakpur</td>
<td>5,256</td>
<td>2,129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>940</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli with Howrah</td>
<td>946</td>
<td></td>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>1,540</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>11,033</td>
<td>3,581</td>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>2,418</td>
<td>2,375</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>16,656</td>
<td>9,594</td>
<td>Bharkarpur</td>
<td>1,73</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>3,512</td>
<td>1,012</td>
<td>Maimansingh</td>
<td>4,09</td>
<td>546</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>1,122</td>
<td></td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>617</td>
<td>516</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mu shadibad</td>
<td>2,150</td>
<td>367</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>214</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>2,323</td>
<td>3,233</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>25</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahiye</td>
<td>1,115</td>
<td>4,504</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>2,900</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Buna-Pán, a sub-caste of Páns in Orissa.

Buna-Rajwár, a designation of Rajwars who have emigrated from their original home in Chota Nagpur and settled as bunas, or clearers of jungle, in Bengal or Behar.

Bundelá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar, possibly connected with the spurious tribe of Rajputs who give the name to the province of Bundelkhand. The latter are descended from the Garhwárs of Kantit and Khairagarh, and first settled in Bundelkhand in the thirteenth or fourteenth century.

Bundra, a sub-sept of the Bezá sept of Santáls.

Bunduar, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Bung or Bungza, a sept of Chakmáhs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Bunichhor, a section of Ka-nauijá Lohárs in Behar.

Buráthoki, a sub-tribe of Mangars in Darjiling.

Buríewá, a thar or sept of Dámis in Darjiling whose chief profession is sewing.

Buriali Kálundiá, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Buri Sánmat, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.
Chāb or Chābī, a sub-caste of Gonrhis in Behar. Some of them disown all connexion with the Gonrhis and claim to be a separate caste. Their houses are often circular.

Chabdiā, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Chābukasawār, a rough rider, a groom, a jockey—an occupation usually followed by Mahomedans.

Chachet, a small bird, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Chadchák, a pur or section of Sēkadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Chadu, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chancháir, a bird, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Chāh-ba, a rus or sept of Sherpa Bhotias of Nepal.

Cháhil or Cháhirá, a sub-tribe of Rajputs, properly natives of Hissar, mostly converts to Mahomedanism. They nevertheless retain charge of the tomb of Goga Chauhán, a Hindu prince, now esteemed a saint.

Chahraitá, a section of the Pachainyá sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Chahubar, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Chái, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal; a synonym for Chán.

Chaián, a hypergamous group of Karans in Orissa.

Chaibísá, a sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjilling and the Eastern Himalayas.

Chail, a title of Tāmbulis in Bengal.

Chailáhá, a section of the Banodhíá and Jaiswár Kalwārs in Behar.

Chaimarar, a title of the Chain sub-caste of Nuniás in Behar.

Cháin, a sub-caste of Nuniás in Behar; also a title of Bangaja Káyasths.

Chain, Chá, Barchdéin, a cultivating and fishing caste of Behar and Central Bengal, probably an offshoot from some non-Aryan tribe. The Cháins are found in Oudh, where Mr. Carnegy connects them with the Tháru, Raji, Nat, and other broken and gypsy-like tribes inhabiting the base of the Himalayas, and traces in their physiognomy features peculiar to Mongolian races. Mr. Sherring, again, in one place speaks of them as a sub-caste of Malláhs, in another as a class of 'jugglers, thimble-riggers, and adventurers, who attend fairs and other festivals like men of the same profession in England.' A sub-caste of the Nunias bears the name Chain, but the Nunias do not admit any affinity. Mr. C. F. Magrath, in his Memorandum on the Tribes and Castes of Behar, published in the Bengal Census Report of 1872, says they closely resemble Binds in their occupations, being chiefly boatmen, who also engage in fishing. Cháins are thickest south of the Ganges, while Binds are most numerous in North Behar. Mr. Magrath adds that their reputation as thieves, impostors, and swindlers is in his experience not altogether deserved, as the men whom the common people, and even the police of Behar, describe as Cháins usually turned out on inquiry to be Maghaya Doms, Nats, or Rajwárs. The term Cháï-púndá, however, is a common expression for stealing among Hindi-speaking natives, while throughout Bengal individuals belonging to the caste are watched with great suspicion.

The muls or exogamous sections of the Cháins in Behar throw no light on the origin of the caste, as with one exception they appear to have been borrowed from the Brahmanical. Cháins practise adult as well as infant-marriage, but the latter is considered more respectable. Polygamy is permitted if the first wife is barren or suffers from an incurable disease or any serious bodily defect. A widow may marry again. Though not compelled to marry her deceased husband’s younger brother, it is deemed right and proper for her to do so if such a relative exists. The standard of female morality appears to be lax, and sexual indiscretions are leniently dealt with provided that they occur within the limit of the caste. If a woman gives rise to scandal by an intrigue with a member of the caste, she may either obtain absolution by giving a feast to the brethren, or her husband may apply to the caste council for a divorce. In the latter case she may marry her lover. For offences outside the circle of the caste, no mode of atonement is appointed; and a woman who goes wrong with a member of either a higher or a lower caste is turned out of the Cháin community, and generally becomes a public prostitute.

As among other impure castes, a Dasnami Gosain acts as guru, a degraded Maithil Brahman as purohit. In Oudh the Cháins worship Mahábira, the monkey-god, Sat Naráyana, and Devi Pátan, while they drink spirits and feast on pork. Those whom we find in Behar, like other fisher tribes, are followers of the Páňch Piríya creed, while the Bengal members of the caste worship Koíla Bábá. Both freely indulge in spirits whenever a favourable opportunity presents itself.

In point of social standing Cháins rank with Binds, Numiás, and Pasis; but nowhere do they rise to the distinction, which Binds and Numiás sometimes attain, of giving water and certain kinds of sweetmeats to Brahmans. In Behar and Central Bengal they are cultivators holding lands as occupancy or, more frequently, non-occupancy raiyats. Others, again, are landless day-labourers or boatmen and fishermen, catching mullet with weirs of siríkí mat, as the Binds do. In Oudh and the North-Western Provinces they are cultivators, and prepare khaír or catechu. In Eastern Bengal they appear as traders in grain and pulse.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Chains in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>Maimansing</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>256</td>
<td>214</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>901</td>
<td></td>
<td>Nokhalie</td>
<td>6</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Atiarpur</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>6,760</td>
<td>4,670</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>665</td>
<td>419</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td></td>
<td>171</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>840</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>104</td>
<td>161</td>
<td>Tirkut (Darbhanga)</td>
<td>1,672</td>
<td>96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshedabad</td>
<td>26,132</td>
<td>20,046</td>
<td>Rajbaran</td>
<td>905</td>
<td>879</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>337</td>
<td>271</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>1,148</td>
<td>926</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beharhore</td>
<td>8,928</td>
<td>8,006</td>
<td>Ghorapur</td>
<td>2,611</td>
<td>2,744</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rampur</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>Farnam</td>
<td>4,586</td>
<td>4,586</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>136</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>30,062</td>
<td>83,639</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>17,576</td>
<td>10,272</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>261</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daridpur</td>
<td>420</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Cháki, a title of Barendra Brahmins and Kayasths in Bengal.

Cháki Dukri, a sept of Ho in Singbhum.

Chakkiwálá, a flour-grinder or miller, usually a Kurmi, who employs the women of his house or neighbourhood to grind singly.

Chakledár, the superintendent, or proprietor or renter, of a chaklá, a large division of a country comprehending a number of pargáns.

Chakmá, Teakmá, Ta克, Thek (Burm.), a Lohití tribe of the Chittagong Hill Tracts. Major Lewin groups them with the Khyoungtha, or tribes who live along the river courses, as distinguished from the Youngtha, whose settlements are confined to the hills. Concerning this division into river and hill peoples, which is believed to have originated with the Arakanese, Herr A. Grünwedel remarks that it “not only supplies a good outward distinction, but is moreover fully justified, inasmuch as it at the same time preserves intact the division according to descent.” Herr Virchow, however, observes that “these divisions, based as they are on the localities of the tribes along the rivers or on the hills, must by no means be supposed to represent either genetic or de facto homogeneous groups.” The traditions regarding the origin of the Chakmás are conflicting, and allege (1)

1 From lohita, ‘red,’ a name of the Brahmaputra, believed by Lassen to have reference to the east and the rising sun. (Ind. Alt. i, 667, note.) F. Müller (Allgemeine Ethnographie, p. 405) includes the Burmese and the tribes of the Chittagong Hill Tracts and Arakan under the term Lohit-Völker.

2 Summary Notice of the Hill Tribes, in Rieber’s Chittagong Hill Tribes, translated by Keane.
that they originally came from the Malay Peninsula, (2) that their ancestors were Chaus-bansi Khatriyas of Champanagar in Hindustan, who invaded the Hill Tracts about the end of the 14th century, settled there, and intermarried with the people of the country; (3) that they are the descendants of the survivors of a Mogul army sent by the Vazir of Chittagong to attack the King of Arakan. Owing, it is said, to the Vazir declining the food offered to him by a Buddhist Phoongyee whom he met on the way, his army was defeated by art magic and his soldiers became slaves to the King of Arakan, who gave them land and wives in the Hill Tracts. In support of this tradition Major Lewin refers to the fact that the Chakma Rájás from 1715 to 1830 bore the title Khán. This, however, clearly proves little, as the title is borne by many Hindus, and nothing is more probable than that the Raja of a wild tribe should have borrowed it from the Mahomedan rulers of Chittagong.

The evidence at present available does not appear to warrant any more definite conclusion than that the Chakmas are probably a people of Arakanese origin, whose physical type has been to some extent modified by intermarriage with Bengali settlers. This view, though deriving some support from the fact that the tribe have only lately abandoned the use of an Arakanese dialect, possesses no scientific value, as for all we know the settlement in Arakan may be of very recent date, and the true affinities of the tribe can only be determined by a thorough examination of their physical characteristics. Dr. Riebeck's measurements comprised only three subjects—a number insufficient, as Herr Virchow points out, to admit of the calculation of an average which shall represent an approximation to the true physical type of the tribe.¹

The Chakmas are divided into three sub-tribes—Chakma, Doingnak, and Tungjainya or Tangjangya. The Doingnaks are believed to have broken off from the parent tribe about a century ago, when Jaun Baksh Khan was Chief, in consequence of his having ordered them to intermarry with the other branches of the tribe. This innovation was violently disapproved of, and many Doingnaks abandoned their homes on the Karnaphuli river and fled to Arakan. Of late years some of them have returned and settled in the hills of the Cox's Bazar subdivision. When Captain Lewin wrote, the Doingnaks spoke an Arakanese dialect, and had not yet acquired the corrupt form of Bengali which is spoken by the rest of the Chakmas. The Tungjainya sub-tribe are said to have come into the Chittagong Hills from Arakan as late as 1819, when Dharm Baksh Khan was Chief. A number of them, however, soon returned to Arakan in consequence of the Chief's refusal to recognise the claims of their leader, Phapru, to the headship of the sub-tribe. About twenty years ago the elders of the Tungjainya sub-tribe still spoke Arakanese, while the younger generation were following the example ¹

¹ Since this was written one hundred specimens of the Chakma tribe have been measured under my supervision. The average cephalic index deduced from this large number of subjects is 84.5, and the average naso-malar index 106.4. A tribe so markedly brachy-cephalic and platyopic must clearly be classed as Mongoloid.
of the Chakmás and taking to Bengali. Outsiders are admitted into the tribe. They must spend seven days in the priest's house, and then give a feast to the tribe, at which certain mantras are repeated to sanctify the occasion, and fowls and pigs are killed. Persons so admitted are almost invariably natives of the plains who have become attached to Chakmé women. Although fully recognised as members of the tribe for social purposes, they would be distinguished by the designation Bangáli, but their offspring will rank in every respect as Chakmás.

A list of the exogamous septs (gosa) of the Chakmás and Tungjainiyás will be found in Appendix I. I have been unable to obtain a list of the septs of the Doingnaks. It will be observed that many of the septs are of the same type as those found among the Limbus and Tibetans; that is, the names record some curious adventure or personal peculiarity of the supposed ancestor of the sept. Others, again, are territorial; only, instead of taking their names from a village or a tract of country, they follow the names of rivers. The sept name descends in the male line, and the rule of exogamy based upon it is unilateral; that is, while a man is forbidden to marry a woman belonging to his own sept, there is nothing, so far as the rule of exogamy goes, to prevent him from marrying a woman belonging to his mother's sept. The prohibition arising from the sept name is therefore supplemented by forbidding men to marry the following relatives and their descendants:—Step-mother, mother's sister, sister, sister's daughter, mother's brother's daughter, father's sister's daughter, wife's elder sister. After his wife's death a man may marry her younger sister.

Among the Chakmás, as perhaps among the Greeks and Romans in the beginning of their history, the sept is the unit of the tribal organization for certain public purposes. Each sept is presided over by an hereditary dewan (among the Tungjainiyás called ahön), who represents the family of the founder. This officer collects the poll-tax, keeps a certain proportion himself, and pays the remainder with a yearly offering of first fruits to the Chief of the tribe. When a wild animal fit for food is killed, he has a right to a share in the carcase. He also decides the disputes, mostly matrimonial or more or less connected with women, which make up most of the litigation within the tribe, and divides the fines with the Chief. Where the sept is large and scattered, the dewan has subordinate headmen (khejd) to assist him. These are exempt from poll-tax and begdri or compulsory labour, but must make to the dewan a yearly offering of one measure of rice, one bamboo vessel (chungd) of spirits, and a fowl.

I quote at length Major Lewin's graphic and sympathetic description of the marriage customs of the Chakmás:

"Child-marriages among the Chakmás, or indeed among the hill people in general, are unknown. There is no fixed time for getting married. Some of the young men indeed do not marry until they reach the age of 24 or 25: after that age, however, it is rare to see a man unmarried."

1 Hill Tracts of Chittagong, pp. 70 et seq.
Marriage is after this fashion: Father, mother, and son first look about them and fix upon a bride. This indispensable preliminary accomplished, the parents go to the house where their intended daughter-in-law resides. They take with them a bottle of spirits (this is an absolute necessary in every hill palaver). The matter will at first be opened cautiously. The lad's father will say, 'That is a fine tree growing near your house; I would fain plant in its shadow.' Should all go well, they retire after mutual civilities. Both in going and coming omens are carefully observed, and many a promising match has been put a stop to by unfavourable auguries. A man or woman carrying fowls, water, fruit, or milk, if passed on the right hand, is a good omen and pleasant to meet with; but it is unfavourable to see a kite or a vulture, or to see one crow all by himself croaking on the left hand. If they are unfortunate enough to come upon the dead body of any animal on their road, they will go no further, but at once return home and stop all proceedings. Old people quote numerous stories to show that the disregard of unfavourable omens has in former times been productive of the most ruinous consequences.

"By the time a second visit is due the relatives on both sides have been consulted; and if all has progressed satisfactorily and there are no dissentient voices, they go accompanied by some of the girls of the village, taking with them presents of curds and bina's grain, and jogra, a sweet fermented liquor made from rice. Then a day is settled (after the harvest is a favourite time), and a ring of betrothal is given to the bride. Now, also, is arranged what price the young man is to pay for his wife; for the Chakmas, in contradistinction to all our other tribes, buy their wives. The ordinary price is Rs. 100 to Rs. 150. On the marriage day a large stock of provisions is laid in by both houses. A procession of men and women start from the bridegroom's village with drums and music to fetch home the bride. The parents of the bridegroom present their intended daughter with her marriage dress. No ceremony, however, is performed; and the bride, after a short interval, is taken away, accompanied by all her relatives, to her new home.

"On arriving all enter the house, and the bride and the bridegroom sit down together at a small table—the bride on the left hand of her husband. On the table are eggs, sweetmeats, rice, and plantains, all laid out on leaf platters. The best man (sovalla) sits behind the bridegroom, and the bride has a representative bridesmaid (sovalla) behind her. These two then bind around the couple a muslin scarf, asking 'Are all willing, and shall this be accomplished.' Then all cry out, 'Bind them, Bind them,' so they are bound. The married pair have now to eat together, the wife feeding the husband and the husband the wife; and as at this stage of the ceremony a great deal of bashfulness is evinced, the bridesmaid and best man raise the hands of their respective charges to and from each other's mouths, to the intense enjoyment and hilarity of every one present. After they have thus eaten and drunken, an elder of the village sprinkles them with river-water, pronounces them man and wife, and says a charm used for fruitfulness. The couple then retire, and the guests keep it up until an early hour on the following morning. The next day, at the morning meal, the newly married come hand in hand and salute the elders of the families. The father of the bride generally improves this occasion by addressing a short lecture to his son-in-law on the subject of marital duties. 'Take her,' he says; 'I have given her to you; but she is young and not acquainted with her household duties. If therefore at any time you come back from the jhum and find the rice burnt, or anything else wrong, teach her: do not beat her. But at the end of three years, if she still continues ignorant, then beat her, but do not take her life; for if you do, I shall demand the price of blood at your hands, but for beating her I shall not hold you responsible or interfere.'

"All marriages, however, do not go on in this happy fashion: it often happens that the lad and the lass have made up their minds to couple, but the parents will not hear of the match. In such a case the lovers generally elope together; but should the girl's parents be very much set against the match, they have the right to demand back and take their daughter from the hands of her lover. If, notwithstanding this opposition, the lovers' intentions still remain unaltered and they elope a second time, no one has then the right to interfere with them. The young husband makes a present to his father-in-law according to his means, gives a feast to his new relatives, and is formally admitted into kinship."

Sexual indiscretions before marriage are not severely dealt with, and usually end in marriage. But a man who carries off a young girl against her will is fined Rs. 60, and "also receives a good beating from the lads of the village to which a girl belongs."

Incest is punished by a fine of Rs. 50 and corporal punishment. Once married, the Chakmá women are said to be good and faithful wives, and it is unusual for the village council to be called upon to exercise its power of granting a divorce. Such cases, however, do occur occasionally. The offender has to repay to the husband the bride-price and the expenses incurred in the marriage, and in addition a fine of Rs. 50 or Rs. 60, which is divided between the dewan or ahūn of the sept and the Chief of the tribe. Divorced women can marry again.

A widow is allowed to marry a second time. She may marry her husband's younger brother, but is not obliged to do so. The ceremony is simple, consisting mainly of a feast.

The Chakmás profess to be Buddhists, but during the last generation or so their practice in matters of religion has been noticeably coloured by contact with the gross Hinduism of Eastern Bengal. This tendency was encouraged by the example of Rájá Dharm Baksh Khán and his wife Kálini Ráni, who observed the Hindu festivals, consulted Hindu astrologers, kept a Chittagong Brahman to supervise the daily worship of the goddess Káli, and persuaded themselves that they were lineal representatives of the Ksatriya caste. Some years ago, however, a celebrated Phoongyee came over from Arakan after the Rájá's death to endeavour to strengthen the cause of Buddhism and to take the Ráni to task for her leanings towards idolatry. His efforts are said to have met with some success, and the Ráni is believed to have formally proclaimed her adhesion to Buddhism.

Lákshmi is worshipped by the Túngjainyé sub-tribe as the goddess of harvest in a small bamboo hut set apart for this purpose. She is represented by a rude block of stone with seven skeins of cotton bound seven times round it. The offerings are pigs and fowls, which are afterwards eaten by the votaries. Chákmas observe the same worship with a few differences of detail, which need not be noticed here.

Vestiges of the primitive animism, which we may believe to have been the religion of the Chákmas before their conversion to Buddhism, still survive in the festival called Shongbásá, when nats, or the spirits of wood and stream, are worshipped, either by the votary himself or by an exorcist (qjhá or naichhurá), who is called in to perform the necessary ceremonies. The demons of onlera, fever, and other diseases are propitiated in a river-bed or in the thick jungle, where spirits delight to dwell, with offerings of goats, fowls, ducks, pigeons, and flowers. The regular priests have nothing to do with this ritual, which has been condemned as unorthodox.

"At a Chákma village," says Major Lewin, "I was present when sacrifice was thus offered up by the headman. The occasion was a thank-offering for the recovery of his wife from child-birth. The offering consisted of a suckling pig and a fowl. The altar was of bamboo, decorated with young plantain shoots and leaves. On this raised platform were placed small cups containing rice, vegetables, and a spirit distilled from rice. Round the whole from the housemother's distaff had been spun a long white thread, which encircled the altar, and then, carried into the house, was held at its two ends by the good man's wife. The sacrifice commenced by a long invocation uttered by the husband, who stood opposite to his altar, and between each snatch of his charm he tapped the small platform with his hill knife and uttered a long wailing cry. This was for the purpose of attracting the numerous wandering spirits who go up and down upon the earth and calling them to the feast. When a sufficient number of these invisible guests were believed to be assembled, he cut the throats of the victims with his dao and poured a libation of blood upon the altar and over the thread. The flesh of the things sacrificed was afterwards cooked and eaten at the household meal, of which I was invited to partake."

Of late years Bairági Vaishnavas have taken to visiting the Hill Tracts, and have made a few disciples among the Chákmas. The outward signs of conversion to Vaishnavism are wearing a necklace of tulsi beads (Ocymum sanctum), which is used to repeat the mantra or mystic formula of the sect. Abstinence from animal food and strong drink is also enjoined. I understand, however, that very few Chákmas have been found to submit to this degree of austerity.

Chákmas burn their dead. The body of a man is burned with the head to the west on a pyre composed of five layers of wood; that of a woman on a pyre of seven layers, the head being turned to the east. The ashes are thrown into the river. A bamboo post, or some other portion of a dead man's house, is usually burned with him—probably in order to provide him with shelter in the next world. At the burning place the relatives set up a pole with a streamer of coarse cloth. Infants and persons who die of small-pox or cholera or by a violent death are buried. If a man is supposed to have died from witchcraft, his body when half-burned is split in two down the chest—a practice curiously analogous to the ancient treatment of suicides in Europe. Seven days after death priests are sent for to read prayers for the dead, and the relatives give alms. It is optional to repeat this ceremony at the end of a month. At the end of the year, or at the festival of naeōna (eating of new rice), rice cooked with various kinds of curry, meat, honey, wine, are offered to departed ancestors in a separate room and afterwards thrown into a river. Should a flea, or, better still, a number of fleas, be attracted by the repast, this is looked upon as a sign that the dead are pleased with the offerings laid before them.

Like the rest of the Hill Tribes, the Chakrnas live by jhum cultivation, which they carry on in the method described below in the article Magh. In spite of the necessarily shifting character of their husbandry, they show remarkable attachment to the sites of their villages, and do not change these like most of the other tribes. Their bamboo houses, built upon high piles, are constructed with great care. An excellent sketch of one of these is given by Dr. Riebeek in the book already referred to.

The Census statistics of the Chakma tribe show an extraordinary fluctuation in their numbers, which I am wholly unable to account for. In 1872 there were 28,097 Chakmas in the Chittagong Hill Tracts, while the Census of 1881 shows only eleven! No attempt is made to clear up this singular Völkerwanderung in the text of the Census Report of 1881.

Chakravartti, a title borne by some families of Brahmans in Bengal.

Chakri, a synonym for Teli in Bengal.

Chaksiár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Chakwán, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Chakwár, a mul or section of the Ayodhiá sub-caste of Sonárs and Bábhans in Behar.

Chal-agge, a section of the Bahánajáti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Chálak, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Chalaniá, a mul or section of Kesarwaní Banías in Behar.

Chalanta, a synonym for Doai.

Chalenga, a kind of vegetable, a totemistic sept of Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Chalhaká, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Chálhásan, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Goriá sub-caste of Goólás in Behar.

Chálhásinhi, a mul or section of the Goriá and Kishnaut sub-castes of Goólás in Behar, whose title is Mandar.
Chálhuk, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Cháli, rice soup, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chálisa, Chelisya, a thar of the Basishtha gotra of Nepáli Brahmans.

Chálital-Sau, a synonym for Sunri in Bengal.

Chámár, the tanner caste of Behar and Upper India, found also in all parts of Bengal as tanners and workers in leather under the name Chánmár or Charmakárd. According to the Puránas, the Chamárs are descended from a boatman and a Chandál woman; but if we are to identify them with the Kárávara or leather-worker mentioned in the tenth chapter of Manu, the father of the caste was a Nisháda and the mother a Vaideha. The Nisháda, again, is said to be the offspring of a Bráhman and a Súdra mother, and the Vaideha of a Vaisya father and Bráhman mother. In one place, indeed, Mr. Sherring seems to take this mythical genealogy seriously, and argues that the “rigidity and exclusiveness of caste prejudices among the Chamárs are highly favourable to the supposition” that Manu’s account of them is the true one, and consequently that the Chamárs being “one-half of Brahmical, one-fourth of Vaisya, and one-fourth of Súdra descent,” may “hold up their heads boldly in the presence of the superior castes.” Stated in this form, the argument verges on the grotesque; but it appears from other passages that Mr. Sherring was strongly impressed with the high-caste appearance of the Chamár caste, and thought it possible that in this particular instance the traditional pedigree might contain an element of historical truth.

Similar testimony to the good looks of the Chamárs in certain parts of India comes to us from the Central Provinces, where they are said to be lighter in colour than the members of other cultivating castes, while some of the men and many of the women are remarkably handsome. In Eastern Bengal, again, Dr. Wise describes the caste as less swarthy than the average Chandál, and infinitely fairer, with a more delicate and intellectual cast of features than many Srotiya Bráhmans. On the other hand, Sir Henry Elliot, writing of the North-West Provinces, says:—“Chamárs are reputed to be a dark race, and a fair Chamár is said to be as rare an object as a black Bráhman.

Káriá Brahman gor Chamár
Inke sáth na utariye pár,
—that is, do not cross a river in the same boat with a black Bráhman or a fair Chamár; both objects being considered of evil omen.”

Mr. Nesfield thinks the Chamár “may have sprung out of several different tribes, like the Dom, Kanjar, Habura Cheru, etc., the last remains of whom are still outside the pale of Hindu society.
Originally he appears to have been an impressed labourer or begár, who was made to hold the plough for his master and received in return space for building his mud hovel near the village, a fixed allowance of grain for every working day, the free use of wood and grass on the village lands, and the skins and bodies of all the animals that died. This is very much the status of the Chamár at the present day. He is still the field slave, the grass-cutter, the remover of dead animals, the hide-skinner, and the carrion-eater of the Indian village.” Lastly, it should be observed that Mr. Hewitt, whose report on the settlement of the Raípur district is the locus classicus for the Chamárs of the Central Provinces, clearly regards them as to some extent an exceptional type, and lays stress on the fact that they do not present the same degraded appearance as their brethren in other parts of India.

Chamárs trace their own pedigree to Raví or Ruí Dás, the famous disciple of Rámaśandá at the end of the fourteenth century, and whenever a Chamár is asked what he is, he replies a Raví Dás. Another tradition current among them alleges that their original ancestor was the youngest of four Bráhman brethren who went to bathe in a river and found a cow struggling in a quicksand. They sent the youngest brother in to rescue the animal, but before he could get to the spot it had been drowned. He was compelled therefore by his brothers to remove the carcass, and after he had done this they turned him out of their caste and gave him the name of Chamár.

Looking at the evidence as a whole, and allowing that there are points in it which seem to favour the conjecture that the Chamárs may be in part a degraded section of a higher race, I do not consider these indications clear enough to override the presumption that a caste engaged in a filthy and menial occupation must on the whole have been recruited from among the non-Aryan races. It may be urged, indeed, that the early Aryans were well acquainted with the use of leather, and were free from those prejudices which lead the modern Hindu to condemn the art of the tanner as unclean. The degradation of the Chármanná of Vedic times into the outoaste Chamár of to-day may thus have been a slow process, carried out gradually as Brahmanical ideas gained strength, and the ‘fair Chamár’ whom the proverb warns men to beware of may be simply an instance of reversion to an earlier Aryan type, which at one time formed an appreciable proportion of the caste. All this, however, is pure conjecture, and counts for little in face of the fact that the average Chamár is hardly distinguishable in point of features, stature, and complexion from the members of those non-Aryan races from whose ranks we should prima facie expect the profession of leather-dresser to be filled. Occasional deviations from this standard type may be due either to liaisons with members of the higher castes or to some cause which cannot now be traced.

Like all large castes, the Chamárs are broken up into a number of endogamous groups. These are shown in Appendix I, but I am doubtful whether the enumeration is complete. The Dhusiá sub-caste alone appears to have exogamous divisions of the territorial or local type, while in the other sub-castes marriages are regulated by the usual formula for reckoning prohibited degrees calculated to seven generations in the descending line. Chamárs profess to marry their daughters as infants; but in practice the age at which a girl is married depends mainly upon the ability of her parents to defray the expenses of the wedding, and no social penalty is inflicted upon a man who allows his daughter to grow up unmarried. Polygamy is permitted, and no limit appears to be set to the number of wives a man may have.

Like the Doms, and unlike most other castes, Chamárs forbid the marriage of two sisters to the same husband.

Marriage.
In the marriage ceremony an elder of the caste presides, but a Brahman is usually consulted to fix an auspicious day for the event. The father of the bride receives a sum of money for his daughter, but this is usually insufficient to meet the expenses of the wedding. During the marriage service the bridegroom sits on the knee of the bride's father, and the bridegroom's father receives a few ornaments and a cup of spirits, after which each of the guests is offered a cup. No marua or wedding bower is made, but a barber prepares and whitewashes a space (chaut), within which the couple sit. He also stains the feet of the bride and bridegroom with cotton soaked in lac dye (alda), and is responsible that all the relatives and friends are invited to the marriage. The caste elder, who officiates as priest, binds mango leaves on the wrists of the wedded pair, and chants mantras or mystic verses; while the bridegroom performs sindurāṅī by smearing vermilion on the bride's forehead and the parting of her hair. This is deemed the valid and binding portion of the ceremony. Widows are permitted to marry again. Usually when an elder brother dies childless the younger brother must marry the widow within a year or eighteen months, unless they mutually agree not to do so, in which case she returns to her father's house, where she is free to remarry with any one. If there are children by the first marriage, it is deemed the more incumbent on the widow to marry the younger brother; but even in this case she is not compelled to do so. The custody of the children, however, remains with their paternal uncle, and the widow forfeits all claim to share in her late husband's estate. On her remarriage the family of her first husband cannot claim any compensation for the bride-price which they paid for her on her marriage. Before a widow marries again her relatives go through the form of consulting the panchāyat, with the object, it is said, of deciding whether the marriage is well-timed or not. Divorce is permitted with the sanction of the panchāyat of the caste. Divorced wives may marry again.

By far the most interesting features of the Chamár caste, says
Dr. Wise, are their religious and social customs.

Religion in Bengal. They have no purohit; their religious ceremonies, like those of the Doms, being directed by one of the elders of the caste. But gurus, who give mantras to children, are found, and a Hindustani Brahman is often consulted regarding a lucky day for a wedding. Chamárs have always exhibited a remarkable dislike to Brahmans and to the Hindu ritual. They nevertheless observe many rites popularly supposed to be of Hindu origin, but which are more probably survivals of the worship paid to the village gods for ages before the Aryan invasion. The large majority of Bengali Chamars profess the deistic Sri-Narayani creed. Sants, or professed devotees, are common among them, and the Mahant of that sect is always regarded as the religious head of the whole tribe. A few Dacca Chamars belong to the Kabir-Panth, but none have joined any of the Vaishnava sects.

The principal annual festival of the Chamars is the Sripanchami, celebrated on the fifth day of the lunar month of Māgh (January-February), when they abstain from work for two days, spending them in alternate devotion at the Dhāmghar, or conventicle of the Sri-Narayani sect, and in intoxication at home. The Dhāmghar is usually a thatched house consisting of one large room with verandahs on all sides. At one end is a raised earthen platform, on which the open Granthal garlanded with flowers is laid, and before this each disciple makes obeisance as he enters. The congregation squats all round the room, the women in one corner, listening to a few musicians chanting religious hymns and smoking tobacco and ganja, indifferent to the heat, smoke, and stench of the crowded room. The Mahant, escorted by the Sants carrying their parwānas or certificates of membership, enters about 1 A.M., when the service begins. It is of the simplest form. The Mahant, after reading a few sentences in Nāgari, unintelligible to most of his hearers, receives offerings of money and fruit. The congregation then disperses, but the majority seat themselves in the verandahs and drink spirits. If the physical endurance of the worshippers be not exhausted, similar services are held for several successive nights, but the ordinary one only lasts two nights.

On the "Nauami," or ninth lunar day of Aswin (September-October), the day preceding the Dasbara, the worship of Devi is observed, and offerings of swine, goats, and spirits made to the dread goddess. On this day the old Dravidian system of demonolatry, or Shamanism, is exhibited, when one of their number, working himself up into a frenzy, becomes possessed by the demon and reveals futurity. The Chamars place great value on the answers given, and very few are so contented with their lot in life as not to desire an insight into the future. A few days before the Dashara the Chāmains perambulate the streets, playing and singing, with... a pot of water in the left hand, a sprig of mām in the right, soliciting alms for the approaching Devī festival. Money or grain must be got by begging, for they believe the worship would be ineffectual if the offerings had to be paid for. Another of their festivals is the Rāmanauamā, or birth-day of Rāma, held on the ninth lunar day of Chaitra (March–April), when they offer flowers, betel-nut, and sweetmeats to their ancestor, Ravi Dāś.

When sickness or epidemic diseases invade their homes, the women fasten a piece of plantain leaf round their necks and go about begging. Should their wishes be fulfilled, a vow is taken to celebrate the worship of Devī, Sītalā, or Jalka Devī, whichever goddess is supposed to cause the outbreak. The worship is held on a piece of ground marked off and smeared with cowdung. A fire being lighted, and ghā and spirits thrown on it, the worshipper makes obeisance, bowing his forehead to the ground and muttering certain incantations. A swine is then sacrificed, and the bones and offal being buried, the flesh is roasted and eaten, but no one must take home with him any scrap of the victim. Jalka Devī seems identical with the Rakṣyā Kālī of Bengali villagers, and is said to have seven sisters, who are worshipped on special occasions.

The Chamārs of Behar are more orthodox in matters of religion than their brethren of Eastern Bengal, and appear to conform in the main to the popular Hinduism practised by their neighbours. Some of them indeed have advanced so far in this direction as to employ Maithil Brahmans for the worship of the regular Hindu gods, while others content themselves with priests of their own caste. In the Sautāl Parganas such priests go by the name of purī, and the story is that they are Kanaujia Brahmans, who were somehow degraded to be Chamārs. Lokesari, Rakat Mālā, Mansaram, Lālā, Kāru Dānā, Masnā, Māmī, and Jālpait are the special minor gods of the caste, but Bandī, Goraiyā, and Kālī are also held in reverence. Some hold that Ravi Dāś ranks highest of all, but he seems to be looked upon as a sort of deity, and not as the preacher of a deistic religion. The offerings to all of these gods consist of sheep, goats, milk, fruit, and sweetmeats, of which the members of the household afterwards partake. According to Mr. Nesfield, the caste also worship the rōpi, or tanner’s knife, at the Diwāli festival. It is a curious circumstance, illustrating the queer reputation borne by the Chamārs, that throughout Hindustan parents frighten naughty children by telling them that Nona Chamān will carry them off. This redoubtable old witch is said by the Chamārs to have been the mother or grandmother of Ravi Dāś; but why she acquired such unenviable notoriety is unknown. In Bengal her name is never heard of, but a domestic bogey haunts each household. In one it is the Burī, or old woman; in another, Bhūta, a ghost; in a third, Pretnī, a witch; and in a fourth, Galā-Kātā Kāfīr, literally, the ‘infidel with his throat gashed.’

In Behar the dead are burned in the ordinary fashion, and śraddh performed on the tenth or, according to some, the thirteenth day after death. Libations of water (tarpan) and balls of rice (pinda) are offered to the spirit

Religion in Behar.

Funerals.

m 2
of ancestors in general in the month of Aswin. In Eastern Bengal Chamārs usually bury their dead, and if the husband is buried his widow will be laid beside him if she had been taught the same mantra, otherwise her body is burned. Sants of the Sri-Nārāyani sect are objects of special reverence, and whenever one dies in a strange place the Sants on the spot subscribe and bury him. The funeral procession is impressive, but very noisy. The corpse, wrapped in a sheet with a roll of cloth wound round the head, is deposited on a covered litter. Red flags flutter from the four corners, and a white cloth acts as a pall. With discordant music the body is carried to the grave, dug in some waste place, where it is laid flat, not sitting, as with the Jugis.

By virtue of his occupation, his habits, and his traditional descent, the Chamār stands condemned to rank at the very bottom of the Hindu social system; and even the non-Aryan tribes who have of recent years sought admission into the Hindu communion are speedily promoted over his head. His ideas on the subject of diet are in keeping with his degraded position. He eats beef, pork, and fowls, all uncleanness to the average Hindu, and, like the gypsies of Europe, has no repugnance to cooking the flesh of animals which have died a natural death. Some say that they only eat cattle which have died a natural death, but this may be merely a device to avert the suspicion of killing cattle by poison, which naturally attaches to people who deal in hides and horns. Despised, however, as he is by all classes of orthodox Hindus, the Chamār is proud and punctilious on certain special points, never touching the leavings of a Brahman's meal, nor eating anything cooked by a Bengali Brahman, though he has no objection to take food from a Brahman of Hindustan. Chamars are, says Dr. Wise, inconceivably dirty in their habits, and offend others besides the Hindu by their neglect of all sanitary laws. Large droves of pigs are bred by them, and it is no uncommon sight to witness children and pigs wallowing together in the mire. Hides in various stages of preparation hang about their huts, yet, strange to say, the women are very prolific, and, except in a fisher settlement, nowhere are so many healthy-looking children to be seen as in a filthy Chamār village. Mr. Beames, however, mentions in a note to his edition of Sir Henry Elliot's Glossary that Chamārs, from their dirty habits, are peculiarly liable to leprosy, and that the name of the Kori or Korhi sub-caste probably refers to this fact.

Chamārs are employed in tanning leather, making shoes and saddlery, and grooming horses. In Eastern Bengal the Chamār-farosh hire them to preserve hides, but there is such bitter enmity between them and the allied caste of Muchi or Rishi, that they are rarely engaged to skin animals, lest the perquisites of the latter group should seem to have been interfered with. To some extent the distinctions between the various sub-castes seem to be based upon differences of occupation. Thus the Dhusia sub-caste adhere to the original occupation of leather-dressing, and also make shoes and serve as musicians at wedding and other domestic festivities, their favourite instruments being the dhol or drum, the cymbals (jhânjh), the harp (ektâra), and the tambourine (khanjîrî). Most of these occupations are also followed by the Dhârh, who besides carry palanquins and eat the flesh of animals that have died a natural death, except only the horse. The Guria are cultivators; some few holding occupancy rights, and others being landless day-labourers, who wander about and work for hire at harvest time. The Jaiswâra work as syces; the Dohar are cobbler, using only leather string, and not cotton thread, to mend rents; the Sikhariâ are cultivators and shoemakers; the Chamâr Tantî work as weavers, and will not touch carrion; and the Sârki, many of whom have emigrated from Nepal into Chumparan, are both butchers and hide-dressers. Some Chamârs burn lime, but this occupation has not become the badge of a sub-caste, though those who follow it call themselves Chunihârâ. In Behar the Chamâr is a village functionary like the Chaukidar or Gorait. He holds a small portion of village land, and is invariably called to post up official notices, and to go round with his drum proclaiming public announcements.

The Chamâins, or female Châmars, says Dr. Wise, are distinguished throughout Bengal by their huge inelegant anklets (pâîri) and bracelets (bangrî), made of bell-metal. The former often weigh from eight to ten pounds, the latter from two to four, and both closely resemble the corresponding ornaments worn by Santal women. They also wear the tikli, or spangle, on the forehead, although in Bengal it is regarded as a tawdry ornament of the lowest and most immoral women. Chamâins consider it a great attraction to have their bodies tattooed; consequently their chests, foreheads, arms, and legs are disfigured with patterns of fantastic shape. In Hindu-stan the Natni is the great tattooer; but as members of this caste are seldom met with in Eastern Bengal, the Chamâins are often put to great straits, being frequently obliged to pay a visit to their original homes for the purpose of having the fashionable decoration indelibly stained on their bodies.

Chamâr women are ceremonially unclean for ten days subsequent to childbirth, when after bathing, casting away all old cooking utensils, and buying new ones, a feast, called Bârâhiya, is celebrated, upon which she resumes her usual household duties. They still observe the pleasing custom of Bhâîphotâ on the last day of the Hindu year, when sisters present their brothers with a new suit of clothes and sweetmeats, and make with a paste of red sandal wood a dot on their foreheads; a similar usage, known as Bhrâtrî-deîtîyâ, is practised by Bengalis on the second day after the new moon of Kârtik.

Chamâins are the midwives of India, and are generally believed, though erroneously, to be skilled in all the mysteries of parturition. They have no scruples about cutting the navel string, as other Hindus have; but in the villages of the interior, where no Chamâins reside, the females of the Bhûnim álî, Chandál, and Ghulám Káyath castes act as midwives, and are equally unscrupulous. It is a proverbial saying among Hindus that a household becomes unclean if a Chamâr woman has not attended at the birth of any child belonging to it.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Chamārs in 1872 and 1881. The figures of the former year include, and those of the latter exclude, the Muchis in Bengal Proper.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>53,477</td>
<td>631</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>8,117</td>
<td>298</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>40,183</td>
<td>7,711</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>9,544</td>
<td>1,633</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>94,457</td>
<td>2,438</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>70,463</td>
<td>11,900</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naxiy</td>
<td>67,375</td>
<td>11,931</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>42,292</td>
<td>11,885</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>35,396</td>
<td>20,374</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>1,179</td>
<td>1,750</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>4,508</td>
<td>3,201</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahi</td>
<td>9,103</td>
<td>842</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>1,673</td>
<td>1,988</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>6,477</td>
<td>803</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>380</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>635</td>
<td>101</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,984</td>
<td>1,184</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daraca</td>
<td>24,063</td>
<td>8,800</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>8,714</td>
<td>9,219</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarkanj</td>
<td>5,169</td>
<td>1,033</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansing</td>
<td>5,714</td>
<td>4,391</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>791</td>
<td>627</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>4,234</td>
<td>1,740</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Norekbal</td>
<td>397</td>
<td>344</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hill Tracts</td>
<td>31</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>47,067</td>
<td>50,967</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>70,037</td>
<td>78,562</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>91,777</td>
<td>119,010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(Morefpur)</td>
<td>171,735</td>
<td>212,527</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(Darbhanga)</td>
<td>119,010</td>
<td>190,541</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>94,844</td>
<td>111,144</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>89,061</td>
<td>112,769</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monebyr</td>
<td>46,196</td>
<td>54,014</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhagulpur</td>
<td>65,065</td>
<td>75,394</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purinah</td>
<td>55,371</td>
<td>64,555</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maidah</td>
<td>4,929</td>
<td>4,558</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>12,267</td>
<td>14,745</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>2,355</td>
<td>2,690</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nepalgarh</td>
<td>8,123</td>
<td>12,989</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>1,432</td>
<td>2,479</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>50,112</td>
<td>40,961</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>18,926</td>
<td>27,276</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>591</td>
<td>629</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>7,344</td>
<td>2,537</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>5,033</td>
<td>6,503</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Chāmar, a sub-caste of Tāntis in Behar.

Chāmār, a synonym for Chāmar.

Chāmār-gaur, a division of the Gaur Rajputs,—the highest class, although from their name liable to the suspicion of intercourse with Chamārs. They affect to call themselves Chaunhar-gaur, from a Rājé named Chaunhar; or sometimes Chiman-gaur, from a Muni called Chiman.

Chamār Gaurā, a sub-caste of Gaurā Brahmans.

Chamārtali, a section of Tāntis in Behar.

Chamār-Tānti, a sub-caste of Chamārs.

Chāmkasaini, a thar or section of Nepāli Brahmans.

Chamlingeh, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Champa, a gāin of the Sāndilya gotra of Bārendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Champāgāin, a thar of the Atri gotra of Nepāli Brahmans.

Champati, a gāin of the Sāndilya gotra of Bārendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Champia, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Champiā Tubir, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Chamrā-farosh, a leather-dealer, usually a Kuti Mahomedan.

Chamrāulī, a section of the Banodhiā and Jaiswār Kalwārs in Behar.

Chāmuār, a mul or section of the Naomuliā or Majrāut sub-caste of Goālās in Behar.

Chāmuk Sāpurdi, a mul or section of the Naomuliā or Majrāut sub-caste of Goālās in Behar.
Chan., a title of Tevis in Bengal.

Chāna, a section of Kumbhārs in Singbhum.

Chanamiá, a sub-tribe of Chandrabansi Rajputs in Jaunpur, Azimgarh, Gorakpur, and North-Western Behar.

Chanauli, a section of the Tirhutiyā sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Chanaur, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar.

Chánchar Chhaurári, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goālás in Behar.

Chand, a title of Gandhabaniks and Tāntis in Bengal.

Chánd, moon, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur; a title of Bāruis in Bengal and of the Oswal Baniyás in Behar.

Chándái, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rāhī Brahmins in Bengal.

Chandail, a sept of the Surajbansi division of Rajputs in Behar.

Chánd, a synonym for Dom.

Chandál,1 Chánral, Chang,2 Nama-Sudra,3 Nama, Nishád, a non-Aryan caste of Eastern Bengal, engaged for the most part in boating and cultivation.

The derivation of the name Chandál is uncertain, and it is a plausible conjecture that it may have been, like Sudra, the tribal name of one of the aboriginal races whom the Aryans found in possession of the soil. Unlike the Sudras, however, the Chandáls were debarred from entering even the outer circles of the Aryan system, and from the earliest times they are depicted by Sanskrit writers as an outcast and helot people, performing menial duties for the Brahmins, and living on the outskirts of cities (antebási) apart from the dwellings of the dominant race. Iron ornaments,

1 The following synonyms are given by Amara Sinha:—Plava (the wanderer), Mátanga (elephant), Jammaghana (life-taker), Svapácha (dog-eater), Antervási (the dweller on the confines of the village), Divakirti, and Pukkasa. None of these are in common use at the present day.

2 Chang or Changa, says Dr. Wise, signifies handsome in Sanskrit, “and was most likely used in irony by the early Hindus.”

3 The derivation of this name is uncertain. Dr. Wise thinks it may be from “the Sanskrit Namas, adoration, which is always used as a vocative when praying, or the Bengali Námate, below, underneath.” The latter suggestion seems the more plausible. The Pundits’ interpretation of the former is understood to be that the Chandál is bound to do obeisance even to a Sudra. It would be promotion for the Chandáls of Manu to get themselves recognised as a lower grade of Sudras. The name may also be referred to Namasa or Lomas Muni, whom some Chandáls regard as their mythical ancestor. On the other hand, Namasa Muni himself may have been evolved from the attempt to explain away the suggestion of inferiority implied in the name Nama-Sudra.
dogs, and monkeys, are their chief wealth, and they clothe themselves in the raiment of the dead. Manu brands them as "the lowest of mankind," sprung from the illicit intercourse of a Sudra man with a Brahman woman, whose touch defiles the pure and who have no ancestral rites. In the Mahabharata they are introduced as hired assassins, whose humanity, however, revolts against putting an innocent boy to death. In the Rámáyana they are described as ill-formed and terrible in aspect, dressing in blue or yellow garments with a red cloth over the shoulders, a bear’s skin around the loins, and iron ornaments on the wrists. Even the liberal-minded Abul Fazi speaks of the Chandás of the sixteenth century as "vile wretches who eat carrion." At the present day the term Chandál is throughout India used only in abuse, and is not acknowledged by any race or caste as its peculiar designation. The Chandás of Bengal invariably call themselves Namá-Sudra, and with characteristic jealousy the higher divisions of the caste apply the name Chandál to the lower, who in their turn pass it on to the Dom.

The legends of the Chandás give no clue to their early history, and appear to have been invented in recent times with the object of glorifying the caste and establishing its claim to a recognised position in the Hindu system. Thus, according to a tradition of the Dacca Chandás, they were formerly Bráhmans, who became degraded by eating with Sudras, while others assert that in days of yore they were the domestic servants of Bráhmans, for which reason they have perpetuated many of the religious observances of their masters. For instance, the Chandál celebrates the śrāddha on the eleventh day as Bráhmans do, and the Gayáwál priests conduct the obsequial ceremonies of the Bengali Chandás without any compunction. Another story gives them for ancestor Bamdeb, son of the Brahman Vasishtha, who was degraded by his father and turned into a Chandál as punishment for a ceremonial mistake committed by him when granting absolution to Dásrath, King of Oudh, for killing a Brahman by misadventure while hunting. The Dacca Chandás retain an obscure tradition of having originally migrated from Gayá, and make mention of a certain Govardhan Chandál as an ancestor of theirs.

Mr. Wells1 quotes a tradition of Hindu invention, current among the Chandás of Faridpur, to the effect "that they were originally a complete Hindu community, consisting of persons of all castes, from the Bráhman downwards, who, on having the misfortune to be cursed in a body by a vengeful Bráhman of unutterable sanctity in Dacca, quitted their ancestral homes and emigrated bodily to the southern wastes of Faridpúr, Jessore, and Báqirganj."

1 Dr. Buchanan considered the Chandál of Bengal to be identical with the Dosádh of Behárá. Although both are equally low in the scale of caste, and characterised by an unusual amount of independence and self-reliance, very great differences actually exist. The Dosádh worships deified heroes belonging to his tribe; the Chandál

---

1 Appendix to Census Report of 1872, p. vi.
never does. The Dosadh invokes Ráhu and Ketu, the former being his tutelary deity, while we find no such divinity reverenced by the Chandál. Finally, the srūdha of the Dosadh is celebrated on the thirtieth day, as with the Śúdras; that of the Chandál on the eleventh, as with Bráhmans.

Mr. Beverley, again, is of opinion that Chandál is merely a generic title, and the tribe identical with the Mals of the Rájmahal Hills, an undoubted Dravidian clan, and demonstrates from the Census figures that in many districts the number of Chandáls is in the inverse ratio to the Mals. There appear to be some grounds for this supposition, but an obvious error occurs in the return of 4,663 Mals in Dacca, where none exist, and the omission of any Málós, who are numerous. The latter, though undoubtedly a remnant of some aboriginal race, have not as yet been identified with the Mals.

It may perhaps be inferred from the present geographical position of the Chandáls that they came into contact with the Aryans at a comparatively late period, when the caste system had already been fully developed and alien races were regarded with peculiar detestation. This would account in some measure for the curious violence of the condemnation passed on a tribe in no way conspicuous for qualities calculated to arouse the feeling of physical repulsion with which the early writers appear to regard the Chandáls. It is possible, again, that they may have offered a specially stubborn resistance to the Aryan advance. Dr. Wise refers to the facts that they alone among the population of Lower Bengal use the Káyathí Nágarí, the common written language of Dinájpúr, and that a Chandál Rája ruled from the fort, whose ruins are still shown in the Bhowál jungle, to prove that they were in early times a strongly-organized commonwealth driven forth from their homes in the north in search of freedom and security of religious worship.

The internal structure of the caste is shown at length in Appendix I. It will be observed that only four exogamous groups are known, and that the main body of Chandáls in Eastern Bengal have only one section, Kasyapa, which is necessarily inoperative for the purpose of regulating marriage. In Bardwan the mythical ancestor Lomasa or Namasa, referred to in the note on page 183, appears as a section, but here, again, the system is incompleat. In two sections they are said to be recognised, but which have clearly been borrowed from the Brahmanical system with the object of exalting the social standing of the caste. Titles, on the other hand, are very numerous, and in different parts of the country a host of sub-castes have been formed, having reference for the most part to real or supposed differences of occupation. Thus, according to Dr. Wise, the Chandáls of Eastern Bengal have separated into the following eight classes, the members of which never eat, and seldom intermarry, with each other:

The Halwah claim precedence over all the others, not only as being of purer descent, but as preserving the old tribal customs unchanged. They associate with and marry into Karral families, but repel the other classes. The Pôd, numerous in Hughli and Jessore, but unknown in Dacca, are cultivators, potters, and fishermen, and are also employed as club-men (lithiyals) in squabbles about landed property.

The question naturally arises whether some at any rate of these groups are not really independent castes whose members would now disown all connexion with the Chandals. The Pôds, for example, at any rate in the 24-Parganas, affect to be a separate caste, and would probably resent the suggestion that they were merely a variety of Chandals. This fact, however, does not necessarily affect the accuracy of Dr. Wise’s observations, which were made nearly twenty years ago, in the district of Dacca. The subdivisions of the lower castes are always on the look-out for chances of promoting themselves, and the claims set up by the Pôds in the 24-Parganas are quite compatible with the theory that they were originally an offshoot from the Chandals further east. The tendency towards separation is usually strongest among groups which have settled at a distance from the parent caste.

In Central and Western Bengal the sub-castes appear to have reference solely to occupation. Thus in Murshedabad we find the Helo or Haliyá Chandals confining themselves to agriculture, and the Jelo or Jaliyá making their livelihood as fishermen. The Nolo group make mats and work in reeds (nat), and the Kesar-Kalo manufacture reed-pens. Of the Hughli sub-castes, the Saro are agriculturists, the Siuli extract the juice of date and palm-trees, the Kotál serve as chaukidárs and darwáns, while the Nuniá deal in vegetables and fish. The name of the Saralyá sub-caste of Noakháli suggests a possible connexion with the Saro of Hughli, but the former are fishermen, sellers of betel-nut, and palanquin bearers, while the latter deem any occupation but agriculture degrading. The Amarabádi are also fishermen, but do not carry palanquins. The Báohhári are cultivators, who deal also in hogiá leaves and mata. The Sandwipá appear to be a local group, who live in the island of Sandip and grow betel for sale. A man or woman of a higher caste living with and marrying a Chandál may be taken into the caste by going through certain ceremonies and feeding the caste men.

Chandals marry their daughters as infants and observe the same ceremony as most of the higher castes: in this, as in other matters, the tendency to arrogate social importance may be observed. Dr. Wise remarks that “the Chandání bride, who in old days walked, is now carried in state in a palanquin,” from which it may perhaps be inferred that infant-marriage has been introduced in comparatively recent times in imitation of the usages of the upper classes of Hindus. In the case of the Chandals it is not due to hypergamy, for no hypergamous groups have been formed, and the ancient custom of demanding a bride-price has not yet given place to the bridegroom-price insisted on by the higher castes. In Western Bengal, indeed, there would seem to be some scarcity of women, for the usual bride-price is from Rs. 100 to Rs. 150, and as much as Rs. 250 is sometimes paid. A similar inference may perhaps be drawn from a statement made to me by a good observer in Eastern Bengal, that marriages are usually celebrated in great haste, as soon as possible after the contract has been entered into by the parents. The rice harvest, when people meet daily in the fields, is the great time for discussing such matters; and the month of Phalguna, when agricultural work is slack, is set apart for the celebration of marriages. Polygamy is permitted in theory, but the extent to which it is practised depends on the means of the individuals concerned. Widow-marriage, once universally practised, has within the last generation been prohibited. Divorce is under no circumstances allowed.

After the birth of a male child the Chandals mother is ceremonially unclean for ten days, but for a female child the period varies from seven to nine days. Should the child die within eighteen months, a sraddha is observed after three nights; but should it live longer, the obsequial ceremony is held at the expiration of ten days. On the sixth day after the birth of a boy the Sashthi Puja is performed, but omitted if the child be a girl. Whenever a Chamán, or Ghulâm Káyasth female, is not at hand, the Chandáni acts as midwife, but she never takes to this occupation as a means of livelihood.

Although the majority of the caste profess the tenets of the Vaishnava sect of Hindus, they still retain many peculiar religious customs, survivals of an earlier animistic cult. At the Bástu Pája on the Pauš Sankránt, when the earth goddess is worshipped, the Chandáls celebrate an immemorial rite, at which the caste Bráhman does not officiate. They pound rice, work it up into a thin paste, and, colouring it red or yellow, dip a reversed cup into the mess, and stamp circular marks with it on the ground in front of their houses and on the flanks of the village cattle. This observance, which, according to Dr. Wise, is not practised by any other caste, has for its object the preservation of the village and its property from the enmity of malignant spirits.

In Central Bengal a river god called Bansura is peculiar to the fishing sub-castes of Chandáls. His function is supposed to be to protect fish from evil spirits who are on the watch to destroy them, and if he is not propitiated by the blood of goats and offerings of rice, sweetmeats, fruit and flowers, the popular belief is that the fishing season will be a bad one.

"Throughout Bengal," says Dr. Wise, "the month of Sravan (July-August) is sacred to the goddess of serpents, Manasa Deví, and on the thirtieth day the Chandáls in Eastern Bengal celebrate the Náo-Ka-Pája, literally boat worship, or, as it is more generally called, Chandál Kúdít, the Chandáls' rejoicing. As its name imports, the occasion is a very festive one, in Sylhet being observed as the great holiday of the year. The gods and goddesses of the Hindu mythology are paraded, but the queen of the day is the great snake goddess, Manasa Deví. A kid, milk, plantains, and sweetmeats are offered to her, and the day is wound up with processions of boats, boat races, feasting and drinking. On the Dacca river the sight is singularly interesting. Boats manned by twenty or more men, and decked out with triangular flags, are paddled by short rapid strokes to the sound of a monotonous chant, and as the goal is neared, loud cries and yells excite the contending crews to fresh exertions. The Kutf Mahomedans compete with the Chandáls for prizes contributed by wealthy Hindu gentlemen.

Although subdivided according to trades, Chandáls actually work at anything. They are the only Hindus employed in the boats (bajrā) hired by Europeans; they form a large proportion of the peasantry; and they are shopkeepers, goldsmiths, blacksmiths, carpenters, oilmen, as well as successful traders. They are, however, debarred from becoming fishermen, although fishing for domestic use is sanctioned. In Northern Bengal they catch fish for sale.

Chandáls have Brahmans of their own, who preside at religious and social ceremonies; but they are popularly called Barna-Brahman or Chandáler Brahman, and in Eastern Bengal are not received on equal terms by other members of the priestly caste. Their washermen and barbers are of necessity Chandáls, as the ordinary Dhubá and Napit decline to serve them. In Western Bengal, on the other hand, Chandáls have their clothes washed by the Dhubá, who works for other castes. The Bhúinmáli also is reluctant to work for them, and there is much secret jealousy between the castes, which in some places has broken out into open feuds. At village festivals the Chandál is treated as no higher in rank than the Bhúinmáli and Chamár, and is obliged to put off his shoes before he sits down in the assembly. Although he has adopted many Hindu ideas, the Chandál still retains his partiality for spirits and swine's flesh. In the Pirozpúr thána of Bakarganj the Chandáls have recently started a combined movement to call themselves Námás, to wear shoes, and not to take rice from Káyasthus or Sudras. This departure from the customs of their ancestors was vehemently disapproved of by the Mahomadan zamindars of the neighbourhood, and a breach of the peace was considered imminent. The clean Súdra castes occasionally, and the unclean tribes always, sit with the Chandál, and at times will accept his dry pipe. Nevertheless, vile as he is according to Hindu notions, the Chandál holds himself polluted if he touches the stool on which a Súnri is sitting.

Chandáls are very particular as regards caste prejudices. They never allow a European to stand or walk over their cooking place on board a boat, and if any one inadvertently does so while the food is being prepared, it is at once thrown away. They are also very scrupulous about bathing before meals, and about the cleanliness of their pots and pans. Still more, they take a pride in their boat, and the tidy state in which they keep it contrasts forcibly with the appearance of one manned by Mahomadan boatmen.

On the whole, Dr. Wise regards the Chandál as "one of the most lovable of Bengalis. He is a merry, careless fellow, very patient and hard-working, but always ready, when his work is done, to enjoy himself. Chandals are generally of very dark complexion, nearer black than brown, of short muscular figures and deep.
expanded chests. Few are handsome, but their dark sparkling eyes and merry laugh make ample amends for their generally plain features. In the 24-Parganas many members of the caste are said to be of a noticeably fair complexion. Singing is a favourite amusement, and a Chandal crew is rarely without some musical instru-cment with which to enliven the evening after the toils of the day.
When young, the Chandal is very vain of his personal appearance, always wearing his hair long, and when in holiday attire combing, oiling, and arranging it in the most winsome fashion known. Many individuals among them are tall and muscular, famed as clubmen and watchmen. During the anarchy that accompanied the downfall of Moghal power, the rivers of Bengal swarmed with river thugs or dakaits, who made travelling unsafe and inland trade impossible.
The Chandals furnished the majority of these miscreants, but since their dispersion the Chandal has become a peaceful and exemplary subject of the English Government."

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Chandals in 1872 and 1881. The figures for Kotál are included in the column of 1872 and excluded from that of 1881.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>33,326</td>
<td>16,973</td>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>1,206</td>
<td>1,905</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>507</td>
<td>1,305</td>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>860</td>
<td>2,112</td>
<td>Daaca</td>
<td>191,186</td>
<td>204,883</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>36,936</td>
<td>36,135</td>
<td>Paipur</td>
<td>166,322</td>
<td>244,949</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>12,648</td>
<td>9,785</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>336,715</td>
<td>291,055</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Maimansing</td>
<td>123,358</td>
<td>161,495</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>46,066</td>
<td>31,277</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>1,245</td>
<td>5,373</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>42,642</td>
<td>38,910</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>12,842</td>
<td>19,967</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>81,155</td>
<td>85,199</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>271,325</td>
<td>196,980</td>
<td>Hill Tracts</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>21,760</td>
<td>18,984</td>
<td>Farnish</td>
<td>5,057</td>
<td>3,593</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>7,072</td>
<td>7,717</td>
<td>Maidah</td>
<td>1,216</td>
<td>1,226</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmahal</td>
<td>25,768</td>
<td>31,126</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>837</td>
<td>949</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranipur</td>
<td>36,148</td>
<td>36,890</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>7,047</td>
<td>9,547</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>54,136</td>
<td>83,513</td>
<td>Mambhum</td>
<td>1,321</td>
<td>2,321</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>222</td>
<td>308</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Chandana, a sub-caste of Mauliks in Chota Nagpur.

Chandan-sára, a sub-caste of Kumbárs in Pabna.

Chandaúlyá, a section of the Pachainyá sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Chandel, a section of the Dhengar sub-caste of Gareris in Behar.

Chandel or Chand, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar.

Chandghos, a mul or section of the Ayodhia sub-caste of Haj-jáms in Behar.

Chándil, place of worship of a headman, a local sept of Bhumij and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chándinadá, a person paying ground-rent and holding his house and garden by that payment in Orissa.

Chánd-Kámá, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Midnapur.
Chándkatoré, a mul or section of the Naomulía or Majraut sub-caste of Goalás in Behar.

Chandra, a family title of Kashta Baidyás, Mayarás, and Sáñkhárias; of Dakshín Rárhí and Bangaja Kayasths and of Subarnabaniks in Bengal. Intermarriage is prohibited within the title, which, though not one of the recognised gotras or eponymous sections by which marriage is regulated, has thus come to be virtually exogamous.

Chandra-baidya, a title of Nápits in Tipperah, who practise medicine.

Chandrabansi, a sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Chandrábat or Chandrawát, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Chandradwip, a sub-caste of Telis in Eastern Bengal; a samaj or local group of the Bharadwája gotra of Páschátya Baidik Brahmins in Bengal; a hypergamous group of Kaibarttas in Bakarganj.

Chandramani, a section of Rautías in Chota Nagpur.

Chandramási, a section of Bárulis in Bengal.

Chandrāpati, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhí Brahmins in Bengal.

Chandrarishi, a section of Mayarás and Telis in Bengal.

Chandratiár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmins in Behar.

Chandróróh, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmins in Behar.

Chandu, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Chanduwálá, a vendor of chandu, a preparation of opium, on whose premises it is usually smoked. To make chandu the opium is steeped in water till it becomes soft, and it is then placed on a fire and boiled. When it is at boiling point it is strained and boiled again, till it is reduced to a syrup.

Chang, a synonym for Limbu in Darjiling, supposed to have reference to the tribe having immigrated from the Tibetan province of Tsang.

Changa, a synonym for Chandál, intended according to some authorities to conceal the fact that persons so describing themselves are really Chandála.

Chángán, a mul or section of the Biyáhut sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar.

Chánghnáya or Chángá, a sub-caste of Aguris in Western Bengal.

Channankath Kathauliá, a mul or section of Kesarwání Baniás in Behar.

Chanoár or Cháower, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Chanpadda, a sub-caste of Joláhas in Behar.

Chánre ke ráut, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Chansawár, a mul or section of Kesarwání Baniás in Behar.

Chántí, a sub-tribe of Káurs in Chota Nagpur.

Chápá, a section, originally totemistic, of the Rajwár caste in Western Bengal.
Chapariyé, a sub-caste of Doms in Behar who make baskets and build the bamboo framework which supports the thatched roof of a house.

Chapen Khor, a section of Murmis in Behar.

Chapotá, a sub-caste of Hindu Joláhas in Behar who have given up weaving and now work as labourers.

Chaprásí, a messenger or courier wearing a chapráśi, most usually a public servant.

Chápuá, a sub-caste of Kumbhárs in Behar.

Chapwár, a sub-caste of Rajwás.

Charak, festival, a sept of Pátors in Chota Nagpur.

Charanbansi, a section of Cháins in Behar.

Charchágiyá, a section of Turis in Chota Nagpur.

Chardhagia, a section of Mahilis in Chota Nagpur.

Chardhiér, a section of Mahilí in Chota Nagpur.

Chardiar, pineapple, a totemistic sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Charhad, tiger, a totemistic section of Turis in Chota Nagpur.

Charhar, a section of Mahilis in Chota Nagpur, probably a variant of Charhad, and therefore originally totemistic. It is doubtful, however, whether the Mahilis belonging to this section believe themselves to be under any special obligation to worship or reverence the tiger.

Charí-ghar, a hypergamous group of the Chárjáti sub-caste of Khatis in Bengal.

Chárjáti, a sub-caste of Khatis in Bengal.

Charkhiá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Charkholá, a sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Charmakár, a synonym for Chamár in Bengal.

Chátárta, the name of a caste analogous to, or identical with, the Bhát, following the profession of bards, heralds, and genealogists, and held in like estimation; so that their personal security is considered sufficient for engagements of the most important description, the breach of which involves the death of the surety or of some of his family. They also subsist by carrying grain, salt, groceries, and the like.

Charas-farosh, a synonym for Sagin.

Charban-farosh, a grain parcher, who buys grain, stores it, and sells it again.

Charbeár, a mul or section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Charchain, a section of the Cháin sub-caste of Nuniás in Behar.

Chár Gotra or Das Gurung, a sub-tribe of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Charkházán, a cotton-spinner, usually a female.

Chárki, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.
Charmanái Ráy, a hypergamous group of Kaibarttas in Bakarganj.

Charmi, Chermi, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Charnetah, a section of Maghayá Dhosib in Behar.

Charwá, a section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Barih in Behar.

Charwáha, a herdsman, a grazer.

Chár-yá (from chár, ‘four,’ and yar, ‘a friend’), a Mahomedan of the Sunni sect, one who maintains the rightful succession of the first four Khalifs, Abubakr, Omar, Osman, and Ali.

Chásá, a common title of cultivating Sadgops; also an epithet of contempt, applied to a rough and illiterate man; a synonym for Sadgop.

Chásá, the chief cultivating caste of Orissa, probably for the most part of non-Aryan descent. Chásás are divided into the following sub-castes:—Orchásá or Mundi-Chásá, Benátiyá, Chukuliyá, and Sukuliyá. The last-named group is a small one found along the sea-coast and mainly engaged in the manufacture of salt. The sections are shown in Appendix I. A man may not marry a woman belonging to his own section, or one who falls within the standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees calculated to three generations in the descending line. He may marry two sisters, but may not take to wife an elder sister after being already married to her younger sister.

Chásá caste is an exceedingly numerous one, and is probably made up in great measure of non-Aryan elements. In Orissa the caste system is said to be more loosely organised than in Bengal, and this makes it possible on the one hand for outsiders to be admitted into the Chásá caste, and on the other hand for wealthy Chásás, who give up ploughing with their own hands and assume the respectable title of Mahanti, to raise themselves to membership in the lower classes of Káyasths.

Both adult and infant-marriage are recognised by the caste; but the latter is deemed the more respectable, and no one who could get his daughter married at the age of eight or nine years would allow her to remain without a husband until she reached years of puberty. The marriage ceremony is based upon the standard Hindu ritual, the binding portion being hátganthi or the tying together of the right hands of the couple with a wisp of kusá grass. There appears to be no positive rule either forbidding polygamy or setting any limit to the number of wives a man may have. Most Chásás, however, are too poor to keep more than one wife, and a man only takes a second wife when the first is barren. A widow may marry again, and it is usual for her to marry one of the younger brothers of her late husband. Failing these, she may marry any one not within the prohibited degrees. The ceremony differs from that used at the marriage of a virgin, in that the purely religious portion is omitted and the left hands of the couple (not the right) bound together with kusá grass. A woman may be divorced for unchastity, barrenness, or ill-temper. In all such cases she must be brought before a pancháyat, at which her own relatives are called upon to be present, and the charge against her must be publicly discussed. If a divorce is granted, the husband is required to pay the woman a year’s alimony in advance. Divorced wives may marry again by the form in use at the remarriage of widows.

Chāsās are orthodox Hindus, and most of them belong to the Vaishnava sect. They employ Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, but these priests are not received on equal terms by the Sādāni Brahmans, who serve the Khandait and Karan castes. The dead are usually burned, but recourse is sometimes had to what seems to be the older rite of burial. In such cases the corpse is laid on its back, and offerings of boiled rice and fruit are placed with it in the grave. When a body is burned, the ashes are sometimes buried on the spot, and sometimes kept in an earthen vessel in order that they may be thrown into the Ganges when occasion serves. The srāddh ceremony is performed in the orthodox fashion.

The great majority of the Chāsās are engaged in agriculture, which they regard as the characteristic occupation of their caste, and only a few have taken to trade or service. Some of them hold service tenures, the rest being thāni or pādi raiyasts and landless day-labourers. Socially they rank next to the Māli caste, and Brahmans will take water from their hands. The Goālā and Bhandāri are the lowest castes from whom Chāsās will take sweetmeats. Cooked food they may eat only in Brahmans’ houses, and they will also eat the leavings of members of that caste. There is nothing peculiar about their own diet, except that, like many other castes of aboriginal extraction, they eat the flesh of the wild boar. All fish, whether scaly or scaleless, are lawful food, except the sāl fish, which is one of the totems of the caste.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Chāsā caste in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>156,308</td>
<td>204,335</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>180,436</td>
<td>254,108</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>24,278</td>
<td>12,673</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>172,471</td>
<td>154,599</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Chāsā or Hālwáha Kaibartta, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Central Bengal.

Chāsā or Orh-Khandait, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Balasore and Cuttack.

Chāsā Baidya, ‘plough-doctor,’ a title of Baidyas used by outsiders.

Chāsādhuba, Chāsādhobā, a cultivating and trading caste of Bengal Proper, some of whose members are employed as artisans and builders. According to their own account, they are the modern representatives of the Vaidehas spoken of in Manu x, 11, as the offspring of a Vaisya rather and a Vaideha mother, the second half of their name being a corruption of the Sansk. dhaśa ‘husband,’ so that Chāsādhubá means the husband or owner of cultivated fields (chās), and not, as is ordinarily supposed, a washerman who has taken to cultivation. Another story is that once upon a time Brahma’s washerwoman came with her son to fetch the dirty clothes. The god was busy and asked the woman to let her son wait till he was ready. After a bit the boy got tired of waiting and went home: meanwhile Brahma brought out his dirty linen, and finding the boy not there concluded that a demon (Asura) had eaten him. To console the mother he created a new boy exactly like the first; but no sooner had he done so than the mother herself returned, bringing the original boy with her. Embarrassed by the confusion he had caused, Brahma called upon the washerwoman to adopt the second boy, but stipulated that as he was of divine origin he should not follow the profession of his adoptive mother, but should set up as an agriculturist and dealer in food-grains. In spite of these exalted traditions it may be inferred from the social status of the Chasadhobas, and the apparently totemistic character of some of their gotras or exogamous groups, that they are really of Dravidian descent, and probably a branch of Dhobas who have taken to cultivation, and thus raised themselves so far above the parent caste that they now disown all connexion with it.

The Chasadhobas are divided into three sub-castes—Uttar-Rarhi, Dakshin-Rarhi, and Barendra, which indicate the chief settlements of the caste and are common to them and to some of the higher castes. Members of these groups cannot intermarry, but may eat together and may smoke from the same hookah. Their sections are shown in Appendix I. Two of them, Baghrishi and Brihatbat, seem to be totemistic, and to refer to the tiger and the banyan tree; but neither the tree nor the animal is worshipped by the caste, which has now become thoroughly Hinduised. A man may not marry a woman of his own gotra, but marriage with a woman belonging to his mother’s gotra is not forbidden, provided such an alliance is not barred by the table of prohibited degrees, which is the same as is generally recognised by orthodox Hindus. Chasadhobas have two hypergamous divisions, Kulin and Maulik, which affect marriage in the ordinary way; that is to say, a Kulin man may marry a Maulik woman, while a Maulik man can only get a wife from his own group.

Chasadhobas marry their daughters as infants at ages ranging from two to twelve years. Eight or nine years may be taken as the usual age for the marriage. Boys, however, are not married under five, and the husband is usually a few years older than the wife. In the Maulik group, where there may often be a surplus of males owing to the constant endeavour to get the females married to Kulins, it sometimes happens that a youth is not married before twenty-five owing to the difficulty of procuring a wife within the circle of selection open to a particular family. In all cases the standard Brahmanical ritual is used. Special importance seems to be attached to asirbad, or the ceremony of blessing the bride and bridegroom, and to the exchange of presents. These are represented as the essential and binding portions of the rite.

Polygamy is supposed to be forbidden, but the rule is subject to the usual exception that a man may marry a second wife when the first is barren or suffers from an incurable disease. The remarriage of widows is strictly prohibited. In respect of divorce Chásádhobés follow the higher castes in holding the practice to be incompatible with the orthodox theory of marriage among the Hindus. In cases of proved unchastity, the offending wife is turned out to shift for herself and ceases to be a member of respectable society. In order to clear himself and his household from the stain of impurity, the husband makes a straw effigy of the wife, which is solemnly burned, while rice cakes (pindas) are offered to her and a sort of śrāddh is performed, as if she were literally dead. Brahmans and relations are feasted, and puja is done to Satya Náráyan.

The religion of the Chásádhobés differs little from that of the orthodox middle-class Hindus of Bengal. Most of them belong to the Vaishnava sect; only a few are Sáktas, and there are said to be no Saivas among them. The Vaishnavas abstain from flesh and wine, but may eat fish. Cultivators show special reverence to Lakšmi as the goddess of harvest, while artisans worship Viśvakarma. Brahmans are employed for religious and ceremonial purposes; but they rank with the Barna Brahmans, who serve the lower castes and are looked down on by the higher classes of the priestly order.

It will be seen from the Tables of Precedence for Bengal that the pretensions of the Chásádhobés to rank above the Dhobés are not generally recognised, and that both stand on about the same level in popular estimation. This fact, coupled with the numerical smallness of the caste, seems to suggest that it may be of comparatively recent formation. If the caste were an old one, we might expect that by abandoning the specially impure practices of the Dhobés and adopting the respectable occupation of agriculture they would have attained a higher social position than is actually conceded to them. Chásádhobés are generally classed along with the Chandál, the fishing Kaibarttas, and the Sunris, and Brahmans will not take water from their hands. The cultivating members of the caste are mostly occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats, and some have risen to the position of tenure-holders. So far as I have been able to ascertain, none of them are zamindars. Prosperous grain-merchants and money-lenders are found among them, and many follow the business of carpenters, builders, and artisans working in wood or metal.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Chásádhobé caste in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>1,014</td>
<td>276</td>
<td>Rajahahye</td>
<td>504</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>632</td>
<td>1,344</td>
<td>Palsu</td>
<td>1,160</td>
<td>790</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td></td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>4,458</td>
<td>3,522</td>
<td>Darra</td>
<td>2,940</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah (24)</td>
<td>17,766</td>
<td>10,339</td>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>581</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nagda</td>
<td>5,057</td>
<td>3,774</td>
<td>Barasgarh</td>
<td>7</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>4,411</td>
<td>3,665</td>
<td>Mainamah</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>145</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mymensingh (3)</td>
<td>4,356</td>
<td>4,813</td>
<td>Sundari Ganges</td>
<td>972</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>45</td>
<td></td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>43</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

N 2
Chásaduli, a sub-caste of Bégdisin Bengal who were originally palanquin-bearers, but have recently taken to cultivation and claim a certain measure of social superiority for that reason.

Chásá-gailá, a synonym for Sadgop in Bengal.

Chásá-karur or Chánd-kolai, a sub-caste of Muchis in Bengal.

Chásati, a small caste nearly allied to the Chásádhoba. They till land and rear silk-worm.

Chási, a synonym for Pod.

Chási, a section of Koránch Kándus in Behar.

Chasiár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Chási-Dás, a synonym for Hálíá Dás or Kaibartta in Bengal.

Chási Pod, a sub-caste of Pods in the Presidency districts who have given up their profession of fishing and taken to cultivation. They do not intermarry with the ordinary Pod.

Chásíwár, a section of Bábháns in Behar.

Cháta, umbrella, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chátgáinyá, a sub-caste of Kumbhárs in Noakháli.

Chatra Tuin, a sept of Hos in Singblum.

Chatta, a gáin of the Kásyapa gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Chattarághabi, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Chattarkhai, a social group in Orissa made up of people who lost their caste in 1866 for eating in relief-kitchens (chättras). The Chattarkhai caste, as it may properly be called, is divided into an upper and a lower sub-caste—the former comprising Brahmans, Karans, Khandaits, and Gop-Goals; the latter of the castes ranking below these in the social scale. Members of each sub-caste marry within that group, irrespective of the caste to which they originally belonged; but no intermarriage is possible between members of the two sub-castes. All Chattarkhás are entirely cut off from their original castes.

Chaturábandi, a gáin of the Bátaya gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Chaturan-Khán, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in Murshedabad.

Chaturásrám or Chaturthán, a sub-caste of Sunris in Western Bengal.

Chattopádhyáya, the name of an office of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal; commonly pronounced Chaturjia or Chaturji.

Chaturthán, a sub-caste of Sunris in Bengal.

Chaturvedi, a Brahman professing to have studied the four Vedas. In the abbreviated form of Chaube it is a common title of Brahmans in Behar.

Chauán, a sub-caste of Rájus in Midnapur.

Chau-aniá, a sub-caste of Goálás in Behar and Chota. Nagpur.
CHAUARSÁ.

Chauarsá, a section of Kaserás in Behar.

Chaubahán, a mul or section of the Banodhiá sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar.

Chaubáriá, a sept of Suraj-bansi Rajputs in Behar.

Chaubérié, a sept of the Tinmulíá Madhesí sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Chaubhaiá, a section of the Banodhí and Jaiswár Kalwárs, and of Bábhans in Behar.

Chaubhán, a sub-caste of Nuniyáis in Behar.

Chaubhán, Chohán, a sept of the Suryabansi Rajputs in Behar. They cannot intermarry with persons of the Bésán and Mahraur septs, who are supposed to be descended from a common ancestor.

Chaubí, Chaube or Chobe (abbreviated from Chaturvedi), a Brahman learned in the four Vedas; a title now applied to a class of Brahmans who are not always men of literary habits. In the North-Western Provinces they are often boxers, wrestlers, and the like.

Chuuddagrámí, a sub-caste of Támbulísa in Bengal.

Chuuddapárá Rárhíbindu, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Central Bengal.

Chaudhari, a title of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Chaudhrána, a section of the Magháiya sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

CHAUDHIÁ.

Chaudhri (a holder of four, perhaps, shares or profits), the headman of a profession, trade, or occupation in towns; the headman of a village, of a bazar, or of a caste pancháyat; a lessee of a gony or grain emporium; a holder of landed property, classed with the zamindár or talukdár. In Cuttack the Chaudhari was the revenue officer of a district, corresponding with the Desmukh. The Chaudhari táhkadar, or head revenue officer, was there treated by the British Government as a proprietor or zamindár. The term Chaudhari is an honorific title of the Ariáí sub-caste of Bais Baniyas; of the Banpár sub-caste of Gournhis; of Halwáis; of the Ját and Majraut sub-castes of Ahírs or Goálás; of Ganjwar Sunris; of the Jéswar and Banodhí sub-castes of Kalwárs; of Kurmis in Western Bengal, used both by members of the caste and by outsiders; of Nágars; of the Pacháiya sub-caste of Nuniyáis; of Sonárs and Tíors in Behar; of Kochhs in Northern Bengal; and of Brahmins, Kaibarttas, Káyasths, Kewats, Támbulísa, and Telís in Bengal. It also denotes a section of the Kanaují sub-caste of Goálás, and of Magháiya Doms in Behar, and a sept of Thá-ruś.

Chaudhríá, a sept of the Malwe Rajputs in Chota Nagpur.

Chaudhríán, a section of Magháiya Kumhars in Behar.

Chaudhrijíi, a synonym for, and title of Bábhans.

Chaudíhá, a section of Ban- tariá Kándus in Behar.
CHAUDORTI. 198  CHERENGTSÁ.

Chaudorti, a mul or section of the Kanaujia sub-caste of Sonars in Behar.

Chaugáin, a section of Kalwárs in Behar.

Chaugáin ke pánre, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Chauhán, a sub-caste of Bel-dars in Behar.

Chauhán, a section of the Chandrabansí Rajputs and of the Maghaiyá sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Chaukidár or chokidar, a village watchman, a police or customs peon.

Cháulwálá, a dealer in rice.

Chaumasiá, a ploughman hired for the four months of the rainy season.

Chaumukhídih, a section of Majraut Goélzís in Behar.

Chaunriwálá, a maker of fly-flaps and besoms from strips of date-palm leaves, usually a Mahomedan.

Chaupré, a section of the Bérajáti sub-caste of Khatri in Bengal.

Chaurahá, a section of the Banodhi and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Chaurási, a sub-caste of Kumbárs in Central Bengal; a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Chaurásiá, a sub-caste of Baraís in Behar.

Chauría, rat, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Chauriá, a section of Bá-bhans in Behar.

Chaurthán, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar who deal in liquor.

Chausa, a section of the Biyá-hut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs, a mul or section of Bábhans; a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Chausáhá, a section of Kanaujia Lohárs in Behar.

Chausar, a section of Awadhi Hájáms in Behar.

Chauswár, a section of Sonars in Behar.

Chautariá, a sept of the Bautár sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Chauthá, a sub-caste of Goélás in Behar.

Chauthi, Háldiá, a sub-caste of Telis in Orissa.

Chautkhundi, a gáin of the Btáyá gotra of Bárhi Brahms in Bengal.

Chavala Gáin, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahms.

Chedi, a class of inferior Rajputs in Western Bengal.

Chehmjom, a native of Chehm, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Chelekchela, a small bird, a totemistic sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Chempajong, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Cher, a section of Goélás in Behar.

Cherabesari, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Cherchete, a kind of jungle wood, a totemistic sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Cherengtsá, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.
Chero, Chero, a landholding and cultivating castes of Behar and Chota Nagpur. Found also in Benares and Mirzapur. Sir Henry Elliot, while mentioning the opinions that the Cheros are a branch of the Bhars or are connected with the Kols, appears himself to have considered them to be the aboriginal inhabitants of the provinces on the skirts of which they are now found, driven from their proper seats by Rajput races. It was Colonel Dalton's opinion that the Gangetic provinces were once occupied by peoples speaking a Kolarian language closely allied to the present Munda dialect, among whom the Cheros were the latest dominant race. If, however, the Cheros and Kols originally formed one nation, the Kols must have parted from the parent stock and settled in Chota Nagpur before the former tribe embraced Hinduism and erected the various temples of which the ruins are still referred by local tradition to their rule in Behar; for all of these are dedicated to the worship of idols, and it is a distinctive feature in the religion of the Kols of the present day, as of most races in the animistic stage of belief, that they never attempt to represent their deities or to build any sort of habitation for them. Convincing proof of the non-Aryan affinities of the Cheros is derived from the fact that the Chota Nagpur members of the caste, whose poverty and social insignificance have held them aloof from Hinduising influences, still retain totemistic section-names similar to those in use among the Kharis, who are beyond doubt closely akin to the Mundas. The landholding Cheros of Palamau have borrowed the Brahmanical gotras in support of their claim to be Rajputs, and have thus successfully obliterated all trace of their true antecedents. These Cheros are divided into two sub-castes, Bára-hazár and Tera-hazár or Birbandhi. The former is the higher in rank, and includes most of the descendants of former ruling families, who assume the title Bábuán. The Tera-hazár are supposed to be the illegitimate offspring of the Bára-hazár. Some of the wealthier members of the latter group who have married into local Rajput houses call themselves Chohan-bansi Rajputs, and decline alliances with the Bára-hazár Cheros. For the most part, however, the Cheros of Palamau are looked down upon by the Cheros of Bhojpur by reason of their engaging in the degrading occupations of rearing tasar cocoons and collecting catechu and lac.

Colonel Dalton has the following remarks on the physical characteristics of the Cheros and their traditions of origin:

"The distinctive physical traits of the Cheros have been considerably softened by the alliances with pure Hindu families, which their ancient power and large possessions enabled them to secure; but they appear to me still to exhibit an unmistakable Mongolian physiognomy. They vary in colour, but are usually of a light brown. They have, as a rule, high cheek-bones, small eyes obliquely set, and 1 It has been shown in the Introductory essay that the theory of the Mongolian origin of the Kols and cognate tribes is untenable, and that the distinction between Kolarian and Dravidian rests purely on linguistic grounds. In describing the Chero features as 'Mongolian,' Colonel Dalton meant that they resembled the ordinary Kol type.

eyebrows to correspond, low broad noses, and large mouths with protuberant lips. It appears from Buchanan that the old Cheros, like the dominant Kolarian family of Chota Nagpur, claimed to be Nagbansis, and had the same tradition regarding their origin from the great 'Nag,' or dragon, that has been adopted by the Chota Nagpur family. The latter were it seems, even in Gorakhpur and Behar, allowed to be the heads of the Nagbansi family, and Buchanan considered them to be Cheros; but they are, no doubt, originally of the same race as their Kol subjects, though frequent alliances with Rajput families have obliterated the aboriginal lineaments. The western part of Kosala, that is, Gorakhpur, continued some time under the Cheros after other portions of that territory had fallen into the hands of the people called Gurkha, who were in their turn expelled by the Thárus, also from the north. In Shahábád, also, the most numerous of the ancient monuments are ascribed to the Cheros, and it is traditionally asserted that the whole country belonged to them in sovereignty. Buchanan suggests they were princes of the Sunaka family, who flourished in the time of Gautama, about the sixth or seventh century before the Christian era. An inscription at Buddh Gyé mentions one Phudi Chandra, who is traditionally said to have been a Chero. The Cheros were expelled from Shahábád, some say, by the Savars or Suars, some say by a tribe called Hariha. The date of their expulsion is conjectured to have been between the fifth and sixth centuries of the Christian era. Both Cheros and Savars were considered by the Brahmans of Shahábád as impure or Mlechhas, but the Harihas are reputed good Kshatriyas.

"The overthrow of the Cheros in Mithila and Magadha seems to have been complete. Once lords of the Gangetic provinces, they are now found in Shahábád and other Behar districts only holding the meanest offices or concealing themselves in the woods skirting the hills occupied by their cousins, the Kharwárs; but in Palamau they retained till a recent period the position they had lost elsewhere. A Chero family maintained almost an independent rule in that parganá till the accession of the British Government; they even attempted to hold their castles and strong places against that power, but were speedily subjugated, forced to pay revenue and submit to the laws. They were, however, allowed to retain their estates; and though the rights of the last Rájá of the race were purchased by Government in 1813, in consequence of his falling into arrears, the collateral branches of the family have extensive estates in Palamau still. According to their own traditions (they have no trustworthy annals) they have not been many generations in the parganá. They invaded that country from Rohtás, and with the aid of Rajput Chiefs, the ancestors of the Thákurais of Ranká and Cháínpur drove out and supplanted a Rajput Rájá of the Ráksel family, who retreated into Sargujá and established himself there. It is said that the Palamau population then consisted of Kharwárs, Gonds, Márs, Korwás, Parheyás, and Nágéswars. Of these, the Kharwárs were the people of most consideration; the Cheros conciliated them, and allowed them to remain in peaceful possession of the hill tracts bordering on Sargujá. All the Cheros of note who assisted in the expedition obtained military service grants of land, which they still retain. It is popularly asserted that at the commencement of the Chero rule in Palamau they numbered twelve thousand families, and the Kharwárs eighteen thousand; and if an individual of one or the other is asked to what tribe he belongs, he will say, not that he is a Chero or a Kharwár, but that he belongs to the twelve thousand or to the eighteen thousand, as the case may be. The Palamau Cheros now live strictly as Rajputs, and wear the paitd or caste thread. They do not, however, intermarry with really good Rajput families. I do not think they cling to this method of elevating themselves in the social scale so tenaciously as do the Kharwárs. But intermarriages between Chero and Kharwár families have taken place. A relative of the Palamau Rájá married a sister of Manináth Sinh, Rájá of Rángar, and this is amongst themselves an admission of identity of origin. As both claimed to be Rajputs, they could not intermarry till it was proved to the satisfaction of the family priests that the parties belonged to the same class. But the Palamau Cheros, and I suppose all Gheros, claim to be descendants of Chain Muni, one of the Rishis, a monk of Kumáon. Some say the Rishi took to wife the daughter of a Rájá, and that the Cheros are the offspring of their union; others, that the Cheros are sprung in a mysterious manner from theokit, or seat of Chain Muni. They have also a tradition that they came from the Morang.

Cheros profess to marry their daughters as infants, but it seems doubtful whether this practice has yet become fully established among them. The poorer members of the caste, particularly the totemistic Cheros of Chota Nagpur, have not yet completely cut themselves loose from the non-Aryan custom of adult-marriage; while the landholding Cheros find the same difficulties in getting husbands for their daughters which hamper all pseudo-Rajput families in the earlier stages of their promotion to the lower grades of the great Rajput group. The marriage service conforms on the whole to the orthodox pattern, but retains a few peculiar practices which may perhaps belong to a more ancient ritual. At the close of the bhanwar ceremony, when the couple march round an earthen vessel set up under the bridal canopy of boughs, the bridegroom, stooping, touches the toe of the bride and swears to be faithful to her through life. Again, after the binding rite of sindurdán has been completed, the bridegroom’s elder brother washes the feet of the bride, lays the wedding jewellery in her joined hands, and then, taking the patmuuri from the maur or pith head-dress worn by the bridegroom, places it on the bride’s head. The practice known as amlo also deserves notice. This is performed by the bridegroom’s mother before the bridal procession (barét) starts for the bride’s house, and by the bride’s mother after the procession has arrived. It consists of putting a mango leaf into the mouth and then bursting out into tears and loud lamentation: the maternal uncle of the bride or bridegroom meanwhile pours water on the leaf.

Polygamy is permitted, but is not very common. There is said to be no theoretical limit to the number of wives a man may have.
Widows may marry again, and among the less Hinduised members of the caste they usually do so. Widow-marriage, however, is regarded with disfavour by the wealthier Cheros, who affect orthodoxy, and within a generation or so we may expect that the practice will be abandoned. Where it is still recognised, the widow is expected, on grounds of family convenience, to marry her late husband's younger brother or cousin. She may, however, marry any one else provided that she does not infringe the prohibited degrees which were binding on her before her marriage, and does not select a man whose sister could not have been taken in marriage by her late husband. Divorce is not allowed. A woman found in adultery is turned out of the caste, and can under no circumstances marry again.

The religion of the Cheros is still in a state of transition, and they observe a sort of dual worship, which discloses unmistakable traces of their non-Aryan descent. For the worship of the Hindu gods they employ Kanaujia or Sakadwipi Brahmans, who are received on terms of equality by other members of the sacred order. Their spiritual guides (gurus) are either Brahmans or Gharbári Gosains. They also reverence animistic deities of the type known to the Kharís and Mundás—Bághaut, Chenri, Darhá, Dharti, Dukhnáhi, Dwarpar, and others, to whom goats, fowls, sweetmeats, and wine are offered in the month of Agián so as to secure a good harvest. In these sacrifices Brahmans take no part, and they are conducted by a priest (baígá) belonging to one of the aboriginal races. Cheros also, like the Kols, observe triennial sacrifices. "Every three years," says Colonel Dalton, "a buffalo and other animals are offered in the sacred grove of sarná, or on a rock near the village. They also have, like some of the Kols, a priest for each village, called páhm. He is always one of the impure tribes, a Bhuiyá, or Kharwár, or a Parheyá, and is also called baígá. He alone can offer this great sacrifice. No Brahmanical priests are allowed on these occasions to interfere. The deity honoured is the tutelary god of the village, sometimes called Duár Pahár, sometimes Dharti, sometimes Purghahíli, or Daknái, a female, or Dura, a sylvan god—the same perhaps as the Darhá of the Kola. I found that the above were all worshipped in the village of Munka, in Palamau, which belongs to a typical Chero, Kunwar Bhikári Sinh."

The Cheros of Palamau affect the ceremonial purity characteristic of the higher castes of Hindus, and the connexion of their leading families with the land secures to them a fairly high social position. Many of them wear the sacred thread with which they are invested by a Brahman at the time of their marriage. Brahmans will take water from their hands, and eat anything but rice that has been cooked by them. They are held, in fact, in much the same estimation as any of the local Rajputs. In Chota Nagpur, on the other hand, the status of the caste is by no means so high, and the Bhogtá, while admitting the Cheros to be a sub-caste of their community, decline to eat with them, and regard them as socially their inferiors. Agriculture is supposed to be the original occupation of the caste, and in Palamau many of them still hold various kinds of jāģir tenures. Some have taken to shopkeeping and petty trade, while others live by cartage, working on roads or in coal-mines, and by collecting tasar cocoons, catechu, and lac. For all this, says Mr. Forbes, "the Cheros are a proud race, and exceedingly jealous of their national honour. They have never forgotten that they were once a great people, and that their descent was an honourable one. Only the very poorest among them will hold the plough, and none of them will carry earth upon their heads."

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Cheros in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>373</td>
<td>463</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>2,004</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>......</td>
<td>270</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>9,756</td>
<td>10,813</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>7,966</td>
<td>11,448</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Chero, Cheru a synonym for Chero.

Cherui, a mul or section of the Kanaujiā sub-caste of Sonārs in Behar.

Cheruka, a fish, a totemistic sept of Binjhiās in Chota Nagpur.

Cherviyār, a title of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Cherwa, a sub-tribe of Kauras in Chota Nagpur.

Chesiā, a section of Bābhans in Behar.

Cheswār, a section of the Kesarwānī sub-caste of Baniyās in Behar.

Chhaghariā Kāpa, a hypergamous group of Bārendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Chhagri, goat, a title of Tāntis in Bengal.

Chhāguliā, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Chhajāti, a sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Chhalor, a sub-section of the Levātiā section of Majraut Goālās in Behar.

Chhamuliā, Madhresī, a sub-caste of Halwās in Behar.

Chhaparband, Chayāl, a maker of bamboo frame-works for thatched roofs, an occupation usually followed by Mahomedans.

Chhāpāticā, a thar or sept of Sunuwās in Darjiling.

Chhaphuliā, a group of the Bārendra Sunris in Tipperah.

Chharidār, 'stick-bearer,' the title of the messenger who serves under the manjhan or headman of the Tier caste in Behar.

Chhariyār, a pur or section of Sākadwīpi Brahmans in Behar.

---

1 Palamau Settlement Report, p. 38.
Chhathwärk, a pur or section of Sākadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Chhatimane-Chhatman, a mui of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Chhatrawär, a pur or section of Sākadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Chhattri or Chhetri, a man of the second or regal and military caste; a synonym for Rajput.

Chhatris-Asram, a sub-caste of Gandhabaniks in Bengal.

Chhayi, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rérhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Chhenilama, a thar or sept of the Das-Gurung sub-tribe of Gurungs. The founder of this thar, who became very powerful, defeated the chief of Ghaleh, married his daughter, and built a fort at Peun, on the Kāliganga. He bored a hole in a sheep's horn and with its aid employed art magic to slay his enemies; hence his name was Loho Chheni, the borer with iron pin; and the thar is called Chheni to this day.

Chhilatié or Silhotia, a sub-caste of Dhénuks in Behar.

Chhipi, Chhipigar, a calico printer and a printer of patterns on cotton cloth, a chintz-stamper. The term seems also to include the making of dies.

Chhitni, a section of the Sat mulié. Maghayé sub-caste of Kandus in Behar.

Chhongphthéng, a sept of the Agniá sub-tribe of Meches in the Darjiling Terai.

Chhotá-bhág, a sub-caste of Bhuinmals, Haris, and Muchis in Bengal.

Chhota-bhágìya, a sub-caste of Kumhárs in Dacca.

Chhota-bhágiyá or Káyath-Tanti, a sub-caste of Tántis in Eastern Bengal.

Chhota-Kurmi or Sikhariá, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur.

Chhotapatti, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Chhota-Sémáj, a sub-caste of Dhosis in Huggi.

Chhot-gohri, a sub-caste of Khandáts and Rautiás in Chota Nagpur.

Chhotgohri Deswari, a sub-caste of Kharwàrs in Chota Nagpur.

Chhota-bhégiya, a sub-caste of K'éyâth Tanti, a sub-caste of Téntis in Eastern Bengal.

Chhota-Kurmi or Sikhariá, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur.

Chhotapatti, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Chhota-Sémáj, a sub-caste of Dhosis in Huggi.

Chhot-gohri, a sub-caste of Khandáts and Rautiás in Chota Nagpur.

Chhumbipá, a ruí or sept of Dejong Lhoris, whose ancestor had emigrated from North Bhotan.

Chhutár, a sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Chhutà, a sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Chhungpá, a sub-sept of the Pon-po sept of Dejong Lhoris or Bhotias of the south.

Chidra or Cherré, squirrel, a section of Bedyas and Binjhias in Chota Nagpur.

Chigah, jackal, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Chigi, Chiki, a sub-sept of the Tudu sept of Santáls.
Chik, a class of Mahomedan butchers. See Chikwé.

Chik or Chik-Baraik, a sub-caste of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Chikaná, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Chikan-doz, an embroiderer of flowered muslin, who usually works for a Chikanwálá.

Chikanjari, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Chikanwálá, a dealer in hand-worked flowered muslin, usually a Mahomedan.

Chikbarikin, a sub-caste of Doms in Hazaribagh who make screens or blinds of thin slips of bamboo.

Chikchábá, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Chikitésak, a synonym for Baidya.

Chikkophung, he who planted the brihati, a thorny plant with a bitter berry used for medical purposes, a sept of the Phedáb sub-tribe of Limbus.

Chikní-daliwálá, a dealer in supárí or betel-nut.

Chiksári, a section of Maj-raut Goálás in Behar.

Chiksoria, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Chikwá, a butcher and fellmonger, a dealer in small slaughter animals—goats and sheep—as opposed to the gassááb, who deals in large cattle.

Chilbindhá, eagle-slayer, a sub-sept of the Hansda sept of Santáls.

Chilbindhá panariá, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Chilbinuár, kite, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Chilhár, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Chilhiá, kite, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chilimár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Chilkhor, 'kite-eater?,' a mul or section of the Naiyá caste in Behar.

Chiluár, kite, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Chineár, a section of Ghásís in Chota Nagpur.

Chingala, a group of the Sanádíya sub-caste of Gaura Brahmans.

Chingri, a section of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Chingrisha, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Chinpúriá, a group of the Ekádas Telís in Bengal.

Chirá-Kash, an engraver in gold, silver or copper. The pattern is traced in wax with a sharp style and afterwards cut out with a chisel. Patterns in relief are made by beating thin metal on wooden blocks placed underneath. The Chírá-Kash are usually Mahomedans, but some belong to the Káyaasth, Tántí, and Sunri castes.

Chiranjiá, a section of the Bánshpor sub-caste of Doms in Western Behar.
Chiriyámár, Chedimár, Chodimár, bird-killer, (i) a title of Bediyás; (ii) in Behar a class of Mahomedans, possibly converted Bediyas, who catch and sell parrots, maíná, and the like.

Chirkko, mushroom, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chirkut or Chirákut, a title of Bágdis, Chandáls, and other castes who prepare chíra, or rice parched and flattened.

Chirkutté, a title of Khandaits in Orissa who make churá.

Chirme or Chírmáiít, a sub-caste of Koiris in Behar, which, though endogamous as regards the rest of the caste, intermarries with the Maghayá sub-caste.

Chirra, a squirrel, a totemistic section of Binjhiás, Bhúyáés, Khárwárs, Rajwárs, and Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Chisim, a dugu or section of the Kochh-Mandai in Eastern Bengal. The name indicates the original habitat of the group, probably a village or hill in Assam, and at the present day has no bearing upon marriage.

Chitári, a painter.

Chítauriá, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Chítäuriá, a pur or section of Sákadwípi Brahmans in Behar.

Chiterah, an engraver on metal.

Chítá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Chitosióá, a section of the Ját sub-caste of Goálás in Behar and the North-Western Provinces, whose titles are Chaudhri, Singh, and Marár.

Chitrakar, a painter, synonym for Patná, q.v.

Chitrakar, painter—a profession followed by Acharji, Ganak, Sutradhar, and other low castes.

Chittí, a kind of snake, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chitwáníá or Chítauniá, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Nepal; a sept of Rautár Thárus.

Chiwárá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Chóbár, Chopdar, an attendant carrying a staff or mace, who accompanies rájás and wealthy zemindars on ceremonial occasions. His functions are purely ornamental.

Chóbegú, a sub-sept of the Thekim sept and a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Chochá, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chokarhádi, a synonym for Chik in Chota Nagpur.

Chomár, a title of Goálás in Bengal.

Chonchwár, a pur or section of Sákadwípi Brahmans in Behar.

Chóngá, a sept of Dhimáls in the Darjiling Terai.

Chóngphrán, a sept of the Agniá sub-tribe of Meches in the Darjiling Terai.

Chonré, a sept of Santáls.

Chonrhá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.
Chopeár, a sub-sept of the Murmu sept of Santáls.

Chorá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Chorál, a sept of Hos and Santáls.

Chorant, grass, a totemistic sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Chorharúá, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Chorka, a section of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Chorwar, a mul or section of the Kamar Kalla sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Chota, a kind of bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Chota-Bhágiya or Sunargón Sánkhári, a sub-caste of Sánkháris in Bengal.

Chotchain, a section of the Cháin sub-caste of Nunias in Behar.

Chouria, a sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Chouria Musa, field-rat, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Chowniá, a totemistic sept of Goálás in Chota Nagpur who may not eat field-rats.

Chownr, a badge of office, a sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Choyndái, a thar or sept of Chhatrias in Nepal.

Chuár, a title of the Bhumij tribe.

Chuhrá, the lowest description of village servants, the same as the Bhangi, Halákhkor, Mehtar, etc.

Chuiráchhá, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Chukání, an under-tenant in Rangpur and Jalpaiguri.

Chukuliyá, a sub-caste of Chásás in Orissa.

Chuliá, a salt boiler in Cuttack.

Chuliá-malangi, the head salt-maker in Orissa, who makes engagements with the Government.

Churní, a section of Murmis; a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Chunáru or Chundí, Chunáfarosh, lime-burners, or workers in lime, as plasterers; a vendor of lime; also a synonym for Báiti, q.v.

Chundiar, a top-knot, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Chungbang, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Chungyepá, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhoris, the members of which are of a mixed low origin.

Chuniá, Chuniyá, a synonym for Báiti; a sub-caste of Jugis in Northern Bengal who deal in lime.

Chuníár, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Chunihára, a title of Dohar Chamárs in Behar who burn lime.

Chunipárá, a title of Chamárs in Behar.
CHURÀ-KUTI.

Churá-kuti, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in Dacca.

Churálaí, a sub-caste of Ká-márs in the Santál Parganas.

Churáliye, a section of Oswáls.

Churihár, Churwára, a maker of the glass bracelets worn by Mahomédan women. Churihárs are invariably Mahomédan, and the persons engaged in this occupation form an endogamous group.

CHUTKÁDESWÁRI.

Churihara, a title of Goálás.

Churuar, a sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Chutiá, small rat, a totemistic sept of Mundás; a section of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Chutkádeswári, a sub-caste of Kharwárs who often call themselves Deswári. It is contradistinguished from Barká Deswári.
Dabgár, a subdivision of the Chamár or Muchi caste in Behar, who manufacture skin or leather vessels used for ghi and oil, country saddles, and the like.

Dabhauchwár, Dabhinchh-wár, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Dabhreit, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Bengal.

Dadhi, a gán of the Sábarna gotra of Bérendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Dadhichi, a samáj or local group of the Basishtha gotra of the Páschátya Baidik Brahmans in Bengal.

Dadhiyál, a gán of the Bharadwája gotra of Bérendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Dadhurír, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Dadhraut, a mul or section of the Sétmulia or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goálés in Behar.

Dédul, bull-frog, a section of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Dafadárs, but the latter decline to deal with the Hajjam on terms of equality. No such class exists in Behar.

Dafáli, a class of Mahomedan weavers who sell trinkets, beads, etc., and also make drums.

Daftri, a book-binder; a servant who looks after stationery and the like in public offices.

Dágániá, a group of the Bérendra Goálás in Bengal.

Dágar, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Dágára, a sub-caste of Pátinis in Bengal.

Dágbé, those who brand cattle; generally Mahomedans.

Daginkairi, a sub-caste of Koiris who grow vegetables and fruits.

Dágrí, a pangat or section of Bánosphor Doms in Behar.

Dáhá, a title of Dakshir-Ráhi and Bangaja Káyastha.

Dahait, a sept of Thárus in Behar.

Dahál, a section of Brahmans and Chhátris in the Eastern Himalayas.

Dahanga, torch-bearer, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Dáhárák, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesia sub-caste of Halwái in Behar.

Dahiara, dealers in milk and curds, a sub-caste of Goálás in Behar, somewhat superior to ordinary Goálás. Their usual occupations are—service, shop-keeping, and agriculture.

Dahiet, a muł or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goalás in Behar.

Dái, a midwife, usually a Mahomedan or a Hindu of the Chamar caste. Among Hindus of all other castes there is a strong prejudice against cutting the navel cord, and a common term of abuse applied to a midwife is narkátá or cord-cutter. The male relatives of these women are usually tailors or musicians; while in villages they often work as weavers, and sometimes sell betel-leaves.

"In Dacca," says Dr. Wise, who had special opportunities for learning the truth on this subject, "the midwives are invariably ignorant and generally consequental, while, being few in number, they are very independent, extorting money in proportion to the anxieties of their patients. A midwife forms an important part of a household, and no family of note is without one. Like the Purohit and barber, the Dái is a privileged person, and has freedom of access to the female apartments at any hour. Her post is usually hereditary, but, if childless, the Dái adopts a young woman and educates her in the mysteries of the profession. Mahomedan ladies have no objection to be attended by a Hindu or Christian woman, but one of their own creed is preferred. The poorer classes attend on each other, and only in cases of difficulty is the European doctor, or the professional accoucheuse, called in. Parturition is in most instances easy, and the poor have seldom any need of skilled attendance; but among the listless inmates of zanánas, who never lead a healthy or invigorating life, labour is often tedious and exhausting.

"When a woman, either Hindu or Mahomedan, approaches the term of her pregnancy, an outhouse, or detached room, is prepared for her, to which, when labour begins, she retires with the Dái and a servant. This den, to which the highest as well as the lowest is condemned, is known as the Asaucha-ghar, or Chhathi-ghar. The duty of the midwife is to rub and roll about the patients so as to increase the pains, and when the child is born to cut the cord with a piece of bamboo (tarlá-ka-chhalti), and to give immediate warning for the 'Azán,' or call to prayers.

"Of the mechanism of parturition, of the dangers to be avoided and provided against, midwives are profoundly ignorant; a woman being satisfied if she is attended by the family Dái, or by the pupil of the Dái, who aided her mother or sister under similar circumstances. Being obliged to observe many customs, without the due performance of which her own and her child's life would be endangered, the mother resigns herself to the hands of the midwife, assured that all will go well. To cause the uterus to contract they use an embrocation of the juice of the Nág-dauné leaf (Artnisia vulgaris) with spirit. When it is wished to stay the flow of milk, the dried bark of the Pánt-kudá (Cucurbita) mixed with pease-meal (Elcum hirsutum) and rubbed up in water is used as a plaster.
"The midwife is expected to pay frequent visits until all danger has passed; but should the lady be rich, she is not allowed to leave the house for days. It devolves on her to anoint the infant daily, for in India babies are not bathed daily. Lampblack must be smeared along the eyelashes, and a mash of warm aromatics (ghutṭī) given daily. For two days after birth the mother is only allowed to take turmeric, molasses, and infusion of ajwain, while on the third and up to the fortieth day she may eat pulse (masūr) and rice.

"After the birth of a child many strange rites are performed. A bonfire (alāwa) is kept smouldering at the door of the Ohhathi-ghar for six days in the hot, for twenty-one in the cold season, and an oil lamp, placed within the room, must never be permitted to go out, an attendant being always on the watch to trim it, as darkness favours the entrance of evil spirits. A horse-shoe is placed beneath the bedding, as iron is most distasteful to all kinds of devils; and an earthen vessel, on which the name of God is written, is hung over the door. No one can leave the room before midday, and on no account must the baby's clothes be washed or dried anywhere but inside the room. If the husband or doctor has to visit the mother, his clothes are fumigated with the smoke of mustard seed thrown on the fire, and when the visitor leaves any food, milk, or drinking water standing in the room must be flung away. For six days the Hindu mother is confined in this den, her Muhammadan sister remaining for ten.

"On the sixth or Ohhathi day the barber and washerman are sent for; the former cutting the hair and paring the nails of the infant, the latter taking away the puerperal garments. It is from performing this menial work that the Dhobé-belong to a very unclean class.

"On the twenty-first or ikkisf day the barber and washerman again attend, when similar duties are discharged.

"On the fortieth day after the birth of a boy impurity ceases, as among the Jews, but several rites must be first of all performed. There is the "Kua-Jhankna," or peeping into the well, which is identical with the worship of Subhāchani among Hindus, after which the mother resumes her household duties.

"If a child be stillborn, the mother is given an infusion of bamboo leaves in which a copper coin has been soaked. The draught is believed to decompose the poison which caused the death of the child. Should a woman give birth to several stillborn children in succession, the popular belief is that the same child reappears on each occasion, when, to frustrate the designs of the evil spirit that has taken possession of the child, the nose, or a portion of an ear, is cut off, and the body is cast away on a dunghill.

"Dáís have many secret remedies which they puff with unblushing assurance. Several are innocuous, a few useful, but in all cases they consist of so many and such heterogeneous substances that their action must be extremely doubtful. Their favourite remedy is called Mastfiri, or Battisf, from its being composed of thirty-two ingredients. Among other things it contains syrup, galls, litharge, sandal-wood, rock salt, and gothrū (Tribulus lanuginosus), and is applied on balls of cotton soaked in Champá oil in all diseases peculiar to women."

Daibak, Daibajna, Diurak, Daivajna, an astrologer, calculator of nativities, almanac-maker, etc. He is usually an Achárj Brahman, and the name is therefore used as a synonym for Achárj.

Daibaki, a section of the Mahmudábáz sub-caste of Nápits in Murshedabad.

Dai-Dom, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal whose men are day-labourers and women serve as midwives.

Dáikurar, a title of Muchis whose women practise midwifery.

Dáiná Ráju or Chauán, a sub-caste of Rájus in Midnapur, who derive their name from their women fastening their śará on the right side.

Dáj, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Dakhíná or Turi, a sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Dakhinhá, a sub-caste of Láheris in Behar.

Dakhini, a sub-caste of Bhandáris in Orissa and of Telis in Chota Nagpur.

Dakhin-Kabát, south gate, a title of Khandáit Brahmanis.

Dakhin-Rárhi, a sub-caste of Kámaris in the 24-Parganas; a sub-caste of Nápits; a group of the Barabhágíyá Muchís.

Dákrahi, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmanis in Behar.

Dákshinátyá, an endogamous division of the Vaidik sub-caste of Brahmanis in Bengal.

Dakshiná Uriyá, Dakhinátyá, a sub-caste of Utkal Brahmanis in Orissa.

Dakshini, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Murshedabad.

Dakshin-Rárhi, a group of the Hele Kaibarttas in Central Bengal; a sub-caste of Chásá-dhobás and Káyashts in Bengal.

Dákutía, a sub-caste of the Kraunowdpwi Brahmanis in Behar.

Dalai, a title of Kewats in Orissa.

Dalai or Tiár, a group of the Rájbanis sub-caste of Kochhs in Northern Bengal.

Dalái, broker, a title of Jugis and Tántis in Bengal.

Dáltihará, a title of the castes who sell dal or pulses.

Dalihare, Dullihará, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Dalui, a title of Karangás.

Dám, a title of Bangaja and Bárendra Káyashts in Bengal.

Damarwár, a sept of the Chandrabansí division of Rajputis in Behar.

Dámboríá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Dámdariá, a section of Kanaujía Lóhás in Behar.

Dámí, Damyi, Támi, Kotwál, Nágarchi, Darsi, a Nepalese caste, by occupation tailors.

Damma Pariwár, a thar or sept of Dámis in Darjiling whose chief profession is sewing.

Dámu, a sub-section of the Leváitá section of Majraut Goálás in Behar.
Dán, a title of Kayasthas, Mayarás, Gandhabaniks, and Subarnabaniks in Bengal.

Dáná, a title of Dakshin-Ráhri and Bangaja Kayasthas.

Dandamálí, a title of Brahmans.

Dándá Mánjhi, a sub-caste of Lohárs and Bágdis in Western Bengal.

Dandapat, a section of Utkal or Orissa Brahmans.

Dandapátcharí, Dandapát, a title of Suvarnabaniks in Bengal.

Dánd-Binjhiá, a sub-tribe of Binjhiás, so called from living in the plains.

Dandi, a religious group of Jugs; a staff-bearer, an order of Saivite religious mendicants said to have been founded in Malabar by Sákara Achárya in the eighth or ninth century. See Dasnámi.

Dándá, a title of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Dand-Korwa, a sub-tribe of Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Dandpati, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Dándwar, a section of Bábhans; a sept of the Suryabanshi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Dáng, big stick, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Dángar, a sept of the Chandrabansi division of Rájputs in Behar.

Dangarwar, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Dángbe, a sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Dangwariá, a sept of the Bautár sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Danjál, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Danreá or Gaunhá, a sept of the Rautár sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Dánri, a title of Bangaja Kayasthas.

Dánrsuriá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Dántela, a sub-sept of the Hemrom and Tudu septs of Santál, said to be so called from their breeding pigs with very large tusks for sacrificial purposes.

Dántrái, a group of the Karsálí sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Noakháli.

Dántwar, Danuar, a cultivating caste of the Nepal Terai.

Dáosri, a section of Agarwáls.

Daraha, a grain-splitter—an occupation followed by women of the labouring castes in Behar.

Darang, a dugu or section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca. The name indicates the original habitat of the group, probably a hill or village in Assam, and at the present day has no bearing upon marriage.

Darang-Chiachi, a section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca.

Darang-Saudana, a section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca.

Darang-Dakal, a section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca.

Darang-Dambak, a section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca.

Darátiá, a sub-caste of Bágdis found in Nadiya.
Darbe, a section of the Bana-pār sub-caste of Koiris; a pangat or section of Bānsphor Doms and of Dosehā in Behar; a section of the Kādar caste in Behar which intermarries with all the other sections except the Marik and Bārā.

Darchuā, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar who distil and sell country spirits. By reason of their occupation they hold an inferior social position to the Biyāhut and Sāgāhut Sunris, who are grain-dealers and shopkeepers.

Dāribārhi, a mul or section of the Chhamuliā Madhesiā sub-caste of Halwās in Behar.

Dariāpār, Dhāriāpār, a mul or section of the Chhamuliā Madhesiā sub-caste of Halwās in Behar.

Darihare, probably a variant of Dalihare; a section of Bābhāns in Behar.

Darihare-Dīh, a mul of the Kāsyap section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Darihare-Rājanpurā, a mul of the Kāsyap section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Darihare-Bargamiā, a mul of the Kāsyap section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Darihare-Ratauli, a mul of the Kāsyap section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Darihare-Sahasrām, a mul of the Kāsyap section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Darjea, a sept of Chakmās in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Dārkhuriā, a mul or section of the Ghosān sub-caste of Godālas in Behar.

Darnal, a thar or sept of Dāmis in Darjiling whose first ancestor is said to have sprung from a Brahman by a Dāmi wife; a sept of Mangars.

Darnāl, a section of Kāmis in Darjiling.

Darrā Lāmi, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Darshan, a title of Muchis in Bengal.

Darsuriā, a section of Lohārs in Behar.

Darvān, a door-keeper. In Calcutta this post is usually held by up-country Brahmanas and Rajputs.

Darzi, a tailor. Usually tailors are Mahomedans, but Dhobis and Ghulām Kāyas ths have been known to take up the business. A synonym for the Dāmi tribe in Darjiling.

Dās, Jalwah Kāibartta, a sub-caste of Kewatas in Western Bengal, and of Kāibarttas in Dacca.

Dās, a family title of Siddha Baidyas; of Halwāis and the Kathbaniā sub-caste of Baniās in Behar; a title of Kāyas ths and all Sudras of the Navasākh group in Bengal, also assumed by members of non-Aryan castes in Bengal like the Kochhs, who become Vaishnavas with a view to be considered Hindus; a title of the Oswál Baniyás; a sept of Thárus; a section of Utkal or Orissa Brahmans and Karans; a title of Kaibarttas and Sunris in Bengal.

Dasá, an endogamous sub-caste of Agarwáls, Mahesris and Oswáls.

Dásabigha, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Dásáonth, a section of Barhis in Behar.

Dasarath Ghataki, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Dasásai, a sub-caste of Suklis in Midnapur.

Dasaundhi, a title of Bháta or genealogists. They also call themselves Rájbhát.

Dasbhá, a sept of Páns, in Chota Nagpur.

Das-ghariá, a group of the Bar-gohri sub-caste of Khandaits in Saranda of Singbhum.

Das-Gurung or Chár Gotra, a sub-tribe of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Dásì, a maid-servant.

Dasika, a dugu or section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca. The name indicates the original habitat of the group, probably a hill or village in Assam, and at the present day has no bearing upon marriage.

Dásil, a muj or section of the Góriá sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Daskariá, wild fowl, a totemistic sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Das Limbu, a synonym for Limbu, referring to the ten divisions of the tribe.

Dasnámi, the collective name of ten classes of Saiwite religious mendicants, followers of Sankara Achárya, each of which bears a peculiar name, as Tirtha, Aarsama, Saraswati, Vana, Bharati, Áranya, Giri or Gir, Parvata, Puri, and Ságara which is added to the proper names of the members. According to Professor H. H. Wilson only the first three, and part of Bharati, are now considered pure Dandis or bearers of the mendicant staff; the others are of a more secular character, and are usually called Atils.

Dáspará, Dásparía, a sub-caste of Kumhárs and Telis in Bengal.

Daspuría, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Dastá-dár, an honorary title of Káyasts in Bengal.

Dastarband or Pagriband, a turban-maker, a purely Mahomedan trade, never engaged in by Hindus.

Dast-farosh, an old-olothesman, collecting old clothes and rags, which he sells to the naichaband to make hookah snakes; to the masalchi for torches; and to the jildgar for binding books.

Daswáni, a title of Bháta in Behar.

Dásya, a section of Bágdis in Bengal.

Datiyán, a section of Magháyá Kándus in Behar.

Datkiliár, a section of the Amashta Káyasts in Behar.
DATT.

Datt, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Datta, a family title of Sádhya Baidyas, Káyasths, Mayarás, Sáñkhárás, Támbulis; of Baruis, of the Aut sub-caste of Gandhabanika, Tántis, Suträdhars, and of Subarnabaniks in Bengal. Intermarriage is prohibited within the title.

Datta ke ráut, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Dattamánjhi, a title of Kairabattas in Bengal.

Dáturiá, a sub-caste of Suträdhars in Noakháli.

Dáubbárík, messenger or sentinel, a title of Khandáits in Orissa.

Daulbandh, a sub-tribe of Kharwérs in Palamau.

Daultá ke ráut, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Daurú, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Dauwá, a sept of Dhimáls in the Darjiling Terai.

Dawáí, a thar of the Basishtha gotra of Nepáli Brahmans.

Dawín, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Dáyí, a gáis of the Sábarna gotra of Rárhí Brahmans in Bengal.

Dáymia, a group of the Sanadhya sub-caste of Gaura Brahmans.

De, a family name of Káyasths in Bengal; of the Aut sub-caste of Gandhabanikas; of Kámáras, Mayarás, Támbulis, Tántis, Telís, and Subarnabaniks in Bengal. Intermarriage is prohibited within the title.

Deási, a synonym for Lohár Mánjhi, g.v.

Deb, a family title of Sádhya Baidyas and of Bangaja and Bárendra Káyasths in Bengal.

Debangái, a title of up-country and Uriya Brahmans.

Debansí, a sub-tribe of Rajputs in Chota Nagpur, to which the Rájás of Bihanpur, in Bankura, profess to belong.

Debánsí, a class of Tiýars who are fishermen.

Debkulíár, a pur or section of Sákadwípi Brahmans in Behar.

Debriší, a section of Mayarás in Bengal.

Debhír, a section of Káyasths in Behar.

Dehádenáras, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Deháti, a mul or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhí Brahmans in Bengal.

Deháti Baidya, village doctor, a title of Baidyas used by outsiders.

Dehásáriár, a pur or section of Sákadwípi Brahmans in Behar.

Dehrió, a section of Koráinch Kándus in Behar.

Dehriti, priests, a sept of MalPaháriá in the Santál Parganas.

Dehuri, a title of Sudhás in Orissa.

Dejong Lhori, Dejongpa (people of the fruit-district or Sikkim) ; Lhopá Bhotia (Tibetans of the south), the common designation of the Tibetans who are settled in Sikkim. A list of their sub-tribes and septs will be found in Appendix I.

Demta, red tree-ant, a totemistic sept of Goélés, Kharias, Lohárs, Mundas, Páns, and Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Denrgamiá, a section of Awadhí Hájáms in Behar.

Deo, a title of Bárúris in Bengal.

Deobansi, a sub-caste of Manlik®s in Chota Nagpur.

Deodhiár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Deoghát, a muí or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesí sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Deohar, a title of inoculators for small-pox, now applied to vaccinators in Behar.

Deorahir, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Deori, a title of Sunris in Bengal.

Deradár, a title of Kewats in Behar.

Derhgáon, a muí or section of the Ayodhiá sub-caste of Hájjáms in Behar.

Desá-Aståram, a sub-caste of Gandhabanik®s in Bengal.

Desauri, a title of Kandhs in Orissa.

Deseriet, a muí or section of the Sátmuliá or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goálés in Behar.

Desi, a sub-caste of Kumbhárs, Telis, and of Kaibarttas in Behar; a group of the Rájbanjí sub-caste of Kochh®s in Northern Bengal; of Goálés in the North-Western Provinces; a sub-caste of Bhandáris in Orissa, and of Bhumíjas in Chota Nagpur.

Desjá, a thar or section of Nepálí Brahmans.

Deslá, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Desoar, a section of Ghásias in Chota Nagpur.

Deswál, a section of Goálés in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Deswáli, a sub-tribe of Santáls in the south of Manbhínm who employ Brahmans and have adopted portions of the Hindu ritual.

Deswáli, Deswari, a title of natives of Upper India who settle in Bengal.

Deswár, a sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar and of Máls in the Santál Parganas; a section of the Sákhiá and Turi Doms in Behar who perform their domestic worship outside of the angan or courtyard of their houses.

Deswári-Kharwár, a sub-tribe of Kharwárs in Chota Nagpur.

Deuli, a gain of the Básy®ya gotra of Báréndras Brahmans in Bengal.

Deuri, a title of Kumbhárs in Behar.

Devakotya, a thar or section of Nepálí Brahmans.

Devápáthi, a section of Kámis and a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.
Devá-Sarma, a synonym for Brahman.

Dewán, a section of the Yakha caste; originally a title conferred by the Nepal Raj.

Dewán ke asámi, a section of the Banodhiá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Dewárk, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmins in Behar.

Dhabal, a title of Telis in Bengal.

Dhabalrishi, a section of Chásádhoábas in Bengal.

Dhabhinchhwár, Dabhauchwar, a section of Bábháns.

Dhái, Dáí, a nurse, wet-nurse, or midwife. See Dáí.

Dhatá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Dháín, a gáin or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmins in Bengal.

Dhákáes, a mul or section of the Tínmuliá and Chhamuliá Madhesiá and Bhojpuria sub-castes of Halwáis in Behar.

Dhákáí, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Eastern Bengal.

Dhákáich, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Dhakzíchá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Dhákáis, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Góriá sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Dhakait, a section of Bábháns and of Madhesiá Halwáis in Behar.

Dhákála, a thar of the Upamanya gotra of Nepálí Brahmins.

Dhakáníá, a section of Kanaujía Lohárs in Behar.

Dhakaren, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Dhákáwál, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Murshedabad.

Dhái, a beater of the dhák or large drum; a title of the Bátíi and Muchi, the only castes which use this kind of drum.

Dhálí, an honorary title of Kávastha and Goálás in Bengal; of Kawális in Eastern Bengal.

Dhatá, a sub-caste of Máls in Bankura.

Dhalo, a sub-caste of Kóras in Western Bengal.

Dhaluá, a sub-caste of Karangás.

Dhamalá, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Dháman, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Dhamáníá, a class of professional beggars in Chota Nágpur who eat dead animals and snakes.

Dhamdi, a section of Káibarttas in Orisaa.

Dhamí, a section of the Góriá sub-caste of Goálás in Behar whose title is Mandar.

Ghámmap, Dhamí, a low, probably non-Aryan, caste in Darbhanga, who make fans or brushes (morckhal) of peacock’s feathers. In Gya the Dhamins officiate as priests to pilgrims in the ceremonies performed for the benefit of ancestors on the Rámsila and Présilá hills, immediately above the town. They pretend to be a sort of Brahmins, but their social position is low, and orthodox Hindus will not take water from their hands.

Dhámina Sáp, a section of Ghásia in Chota Nágpur.
DHAN.

Dhán, paddy or rice soup, a totemistic sept of Chikas, Korwas, Lohàs, and Oraons; a sept of Mundas who are forbidden to take rice and rice soup, and eat only gondli; a section of Khariás; a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Dhánaí Mandal, a family name of the Grihasth group of Jugi in Bengal.

Dhánautá, a mul or section of the Tinmulia Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Dhandh, plum bushes, a totemistic sept of Chikas in Chota Nagpur.

Dhandhábe, a section of the Bahánnajáti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Dhénej, a mul or section of the Ohhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Dhánesri, a section of Pods in Bengal.

Dháneswar, a mul or section of the Tinmulia Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Dhángar, in Chota Nagpur Proper an agricultural labourer, usually non-Aryan, engaged by the year, who receives, if hired by a native, a lump sum varying from Rs. 4 to Rs. 6, at the time of hiring, besides monthly wages in grain and a cloth at the end of the year. Labourers of this class are also largely employed by European tea-planters on the Lohardagá plateau. In this case they get Rs. 9 on engagement, and Rs. 9 more in three instalments, besides a blanket and an umbrella. On the origin of the term there has been some discussion. “It is,” writes Colonel Dalton, “a word that from its apparent derivation (dáng or dhán, ‘a hill’) may mean any hillman; but amongst several tribes of the Southern Tributary Maháls the terms Dhángar and Dhángarin mean the youth of the two sexes both in highland and lowland villages, and it cannot be considered as the national designation of any particular tribe.” So Mr. Oldham says in a note on Some Historical and Ethical Aspects of the Burdwan district that the Male Paharias call their men of fighting age Dhángar or Dhángaria. The Malé are cognates of the Oraons, the typical Dhangar labourers of Chota Nagpur, so that on this showing the word may well be nothing more than the Oraon for an adult. According to another interpretation, the name has reference to the fact that persons working as dhángars receive the bulk of their wages in dhán, or unhulled rice. Rábi or cold weather crops are not largely grown in Chota Nagpur Proper; and during the slack season, from December to the end of March, large numbers of Dhángars leave their own country in search of agricultural work in the central and eastern districts of Bengal, where the harvesting of the winter rice creates a great demand for labour. The dhángar system of payment is so general in Chota Nagpur that the term is virtually synonymous with labourer, and these nomadic labourers describe themselves, and are known throughout Bengal, as ‘Dhángars.’ When they settle, as they frequently do, they acquire the name of Buna, which is sometimes prefixed to their tribal name, thus Buna-Oraon, Buna-Munda.

Dhanichhwár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Dhánjaya, a gotra or section of Nepálí Brahmans.
DHANKAI

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Dhankai, Dhankoi, a &quot;mul&quot; or section of the Naiyá caste in Behar.</th>
<th>Dhankai, Dhankoi, a &quot;mul&quot; or section of the Naiyá caste in Behar.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Dhanka-Oraon, a sub-tribe of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.</td>
<td>Dhanka-Oraon, a sub-tribe of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dhankhariá, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidháh Kalwárs in Behar.</td>
<td>Dhankhariá, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidháh Kalwárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dhanki, a sept of Nágéswars in Chota Nagpur.</td>
<td>Dhanki, a sept of Nágéswars in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dhanroár, a sub-caste of Goállás in Behar.</td>
<td>Dhanroár, a sub-caste of Goállás in Behar.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

DHANUK

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Dhánuk, a cultivating caste of Behar, many of whom are employed as personal servants in the households of members of the higher castes. Their origin is obscure. Buchanan considered them a &quot;pure agricultural tribe, who, from their name, implying archers, were probably in former times the militia of the country, and are perhaps not essentially different from the Kurmis; for any Yassawár (Jaiswar) Kurmi who from poverty sells himself or his children is admitted among the Dhanuks. All the Dhanuks at one time were probably slaves, and many have been purchased to fill up the military ranks—a method of recruiting that has been long prevalent in Asia, the armies of the Parthians having been composed almost entirely of slaves; and the custom is still, I believe, pretty general among the Turks. A great many of the Dhanuks are still slaves, but some annually procure their liberty by the inability of their masters to maintain them, and by their unwillingness to sell their fellow-creatures.&quot; According to the Padma Purána quoted by Sir Henry Elliot, Dhanuks are descended from a Chamár and a female Chandál. Another equally mythical pedigree makes the mother a Chamár and the father an outcast Ahir. Such statements, however slight their historical value, serve to indicate in a general way the social rank held by the Dhanuks at the time when it was first thought necessary to enrol them among the mixed castes. In this point of view the degraded parentage assigned to the caste lends some support to the conjecture that they may be an offshoot from one of the non-Aryan tribes. Dhanuks are divided into the following sub-castes:—Chhilatiá or Silhotiá, Magahyá, Tirhutiá or Chiraut, Jaiswar, Kanaujia, Khapariyá, Duchhwar or Dojwár, Sunri-Dhanuk, and Kathautiá. Sir Henry Elliot, writing of the Dhanuks of the North-West Provinces, gives a slightly different list, which will be found in Appendix I. Buchanan mentions Jaiswar, Magahyá, Dojwár, and Chhilatiyá. Littler is known regarding the origin of any of the sub-castes. Magahyá, Tirhutiá, Kanaujia, are common territorial names used by many castes to denote sub-castes who reside in, or are supposed to have emigrated from, particular tracts of country. The Duchhwar or Dojwár sub-caste pride themselves upon not castrating bull-calves.</th>
<th>DHANUK, a title of Dakshin-Ráhri and Bangaja Káyasthas; a section of Kishnaut Goállás in Behar.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>DHANUK, one of the seven subdivisions of the Kurmis, who are supposed to have been archers, but are now employed in personal service and agriculture.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dhánukár, a section of Khariá in Chota Nagpur.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dhánukó, one of the seven subdivisions of the Kurmis, who are supposed to have been archers, but are now employed in personal service and agriculture.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Traditions of origin.

- Traditions of origin.
The Sunri-Dhanuk are said to have been separated from the rest of the caste by reason of their taking service with members of the despised Sunri and Telic castes. According to some authorities the Chhilatia sub-caste is also known by the name of Jaiswár-Kurmi, a fact which to some extent bears out Buchanan's suggestion that there may be some connexion between the Dhanuk and Kurmi—castes. Speculations based upon resemblances of names are, however, apt to be misleading, and I can find no independent evidence to show that the Dhanuks are a branch of the Kurmis, or, which is equally possible, that the Jaiswár sub-caste of the Kurmis derive their origin from the Dhanuks. It is curious that the distinction between personal service and cultivation, which has led to the formation of sub-castes among the Gangôtá, Amát, and Kewat, should not have produced the same effect in the case of the Dhanuks. Throughout Behar, indeed, full expression is given to these differences of occupation in the titles borne by those who follow the one or the other mode of life; but it is only in Purniah that they form an impassable barrier to intermarriage between the Khawàsíá sub-caste, who are employed as domestic servants, and the Gharbait and Mandal, who confine themselves to agriculture.

The sections of the caste are shown in Appendix I. They are comparatively few in number, and their influence on marriage seems to be gradually dying out, its place being taken by the more modern system of counting prohibited degrees. For this purpose the standard formula mameré, chacherá, etc., is in use, the prohibition extending to seven generations in the descending line.

Both infant and adult-marriage are recognised by the Dhanuks, but the former practice is deemed the more respectable, and all who can afford to do so endeavour to get their daughters married before they attain the age of puberty. The marriage ceremony differs little from that in vogue among other Behar castes of similar social standing. In the matter of polygamy their custom seems to vary in different parts of the country. In Behar it is usually held that a man may not take a second wife unless the first is barren or suffers from an incurable disease; but in Purniah no such restrictions seem to exist, and a man may have as many wives as he can afford to maintain. A widow may marry again by the sagai or chumauná form, in which Brahmans take no part; and the union of the couple is completed by the bridegroom smearing red lead with his left hand on the forehead of the bride. In Purniah the deceased husband's younger brother or cousin, should such a relative exist, is considered to have a preferential claim to marry the widow; but elsewhere less stress is laid on this condition, and a widow is free to marry whom she pleases, provided that she does not infringe the prohibited degrees. Divorce is not recognised in Behar, but the Dhanuks of the Santál Parganas, following apparently the example of the aboriginal races, permit a husband to divorce an unchaste wife by making a formal declaration before the pancháyat of his intention to cast her off, and tearing a leaf in two to symbolise and record the separation. The proceedings conclude with a feast to all the relations, the idea of which appears to be that by thus entertaining his family the husband...
DHA'N UK. 222

frees himself from the stain of having lived with a disreputable woman. Women so divorced may marry again, provided that their favours have been bestowed solely on members of the caste. Indiscretions outside that circle are punished by immediate expulsion, and cannot be atoned for by any form of penance except in the unusual case of a Dhanuk woman living with a man of notably higher caste.

The religion of the Dhanuks presents no features of special interest. They worship the regular Hindu gods, and employ as their priests Maithil Brahmans, who are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. Among their minor gods we find Bandi, Goraiya, Mahabir, Ram Thakur, Gahil, Dharm Raj, and Sokha Sindabas. The last appears to be the spirit of some departed sorcerer. Dhanuks are also much given to the worship of the sun, to whom flowers, rice, betel-leaves, cloves, cardamoms, molasses, together with money and even clothes, are offered on Sundays during the months of Baishakh and Aghan. The offerings are taken by the caste Brahman or the Mali. The dead are burned, and the svadāth ceremony is performed on the thirteenth day after death. In the case of persons who die from snake-bite, their relatives offer milk and fried rice (ldwa) to snakes on the Nagpanchami day in the month of Sravan.

Notwithstanding the degraded parentage assigned to them by tradition, and the probability that they are really of non-Aryan descent, the social position of Dhanuks at the present day is quite respectable. They rank with Kurmis and Koiris, and Brahmans will take water from their hands. They themselves will eat cooked food, drink and smoke with the Kurmi, Amat, and Kewat; and Bahiot Dhanuks will eat the leavings of Brahmans, Rajputs, and Káyasthas in whose houses they are employed. Personal service, including palanquin-bearing and agriculture, are their chief occupations, and in some parts of the country they are engaged in the cultivation of hemp and the manufacture of string, whence they derive the title Sankatwar. Most of them are occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats, and the poorer members of the caste earn their living as agricultural day-labourers.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Dhanuks in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>150</td>
<td>187</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>773</td>
<td>844</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>28</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>128</td>
<td>147</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>181</td>
<td>218</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>163</td>
<td>246</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>306</td>
<td>368</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>4,447</td>
<td>5,092</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>1,024</td>
<td>1,172</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajnabhy</td>
<td>24</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baspur</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Panch</td>
<td>199</td>
<td>233</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khush Bazar</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>21</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>213</td>
<td>225</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
DHANUKI. 223 DHARMAPANDIT.

Dhanuki, a sub-caste of Doms in Eastern Bengal who use bows and arrows to kill game; a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Dhanutá, a section of Madhesiá Kândus in Behar.

Dhanwantari, a gotra or section of the Baidya caste in Bengal.

Dhaona, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Dhaprás, a sub-caste of sweeper Doms in Behar who reverence one Syám Singh, an ancestral hero in process of conversion into a god.

Dhar, a family title of Sádhya Baidyás; of the Aut sub-caste of Gandhabaniks; of Sánkháris; of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bárendra Káyasths; and of Subarnabaniks in Bengal. Intermarriage is prohibited within the title.

Dhár, a sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Dhár or Dári, a sub-caste of Dosádhs in Behar.

Dhárá, a title of Bágdis in Bengal.

Dharádhari, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Dharamdási, a sub-caste of Khatiks in Behar.

Dharampuriá, a mul or section of the Naumuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Dharan, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Dharraní, a section of Bábhans in Western Bengal.

Dhardhar, a gén or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.

Dháren, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Dhárh, a sub-caste of Chamás in Behar.

Dhári, Dári, a class of Mahomedan musicians, generally women, who play, sing, and dance, and are regarded by connoisseurs in such matters as superior to the Mirasan. The men do no work, and live on their wives' earnings. This, however, is perhaps a recent development resulting from their conversion to Islam, for when Buchanan wrote he found the Dhári in Behar employed in digging tanks and ditches, and collecting firewood. They ate pork and worshipped Bandi and Ráma Thákur.

Dháriwár, a section of Oswáls in Behar.

Dharkár, a sub-caste of Doms in Behar who make cane baskets, winnowing-fans, etc., and keep and sell pigs.

Dhárkia, a section of Bhojpúriá Hallwáis in Behar.

Dharkilí, a section of the Amashta Káyasths in Behar.

Dharmaghare, a religious group of Jugis in Bengal.

Dharmáhu, a section of Awadhiá Hajáms in Behar.

Dharmáparidit, a title of Telis, Jugis, and Doms in Bengal, who officiate as priests in the religious ceremonies of their caste and of the rural god Dharma, who is said, in a Bengali Purāṇa dedicated to him, to be an avatar of Vishnu, Dharma, represented by a square stone with human features roughly carved upon it, is particularly worshipped by women, and is believed to cause and cure skin diseases. Brahmins will not worship him.

Dharm-ásram or Dharm-Sut, a sub-caste of Mayarás in Central Bengal.

Dhároá, Dhárud, a sub-caste of Gonds, usually employed in washing gold from the sands of the rivers in Chota Nagpur.

Dhartá-Kausik, a gotra or section of Nepali Brahmins.

Dhárwár, a kut or section of Bābhans in Behar.

Dhaunds, a sept or section of Doms in Bengal.

Dhaundriá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Dhaurání, a section of Bābhans in Behar.

Dhausáni, a section of Bābhans in Behar.

Dhawá, a class of Mahomedan palanquin-bearers and fishmongers in Bengal.

Dhawan, a section of the Chhajáti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Dháyat, a title of Kanauijá Brahmins.

Dhechuá, a black bird, a totemistic sept of Bedías, Oraons and Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Dhek, a section of the Bán-wáír sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Dhekhá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Dhelakata, a tree, at totemistic sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Dhelki, a section of Khariás in Chota Nagpur.

Dhelphor, 'clod-breaker,' a title of Koirís in Behar which is supposed to have reference to their skill and thoroughness in cultivation.

Dhená, a mut or section of the Chhamuliá Madhésiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Dhenál, a synonym for Dhimál.

Dhengar, a sub-caste of Garerís in Behar.

Dhenu, a section of Guriá Goáláis in Behar.

Dhenúr, a small Dravidian caste of Chota Nagpur, whose totemistic sections seem to indicate a possible kinship with the Mundás. Very little is known of their customs, and their numbers are scanty.

Dhesiá Dhá'ál or Tapospuriá, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal who remove dead bodies, etc.

Dhibar, a sub-caste of Kewats in Western Bengal, and a synonym for Kaibartha.

Dhillí-i, a section of Mahilís in Chota Nagpur.

Dhilki-Khariá, a sub-caste of Khariás in Chota Nagpur.
Dhimal, Dhémál, Maulik, a non-Aryan tribe of the Darjiling and Nepal Terai, classed by Fr. Müller as Lohitio. They belong to the same main stock as the Koochh, whom they resemble closely in features and complexion; and, like them, are rapidly losing their tribal identity by absorption into the large and heterogeneous Rájbnasi caste. Rájbnasis, who pretend to be Kshatriyas, strenuously deny that any such process is going on, but a shrewd observer of social changes assures me that “any Dhimal can become a Rájbnasi at any time if he is only prosperous enough,” and instances are known in which a fee of Rs. 600 has been paid for this privilege. Formal promotions of this sort are, however, exceptional, and the average Dhimal who aspires to social elevation transforms himself into a Rájbnasi by simply assuming that title. To this movement rather than to any lack of vitality in the race we may attribute the fact that, while in 1847 Hodgson estimated the number of the Dhimál at 15,000, no recent census shows any approach to this figure, and they seem likely to disappear altogether as a separate tribe within the next generation. Already, indeed, they affect a dislike for the tribal name Dhimal, which is now used only by outsiders, and prefer to call themselves by the modern title of Maulik. They have no traditions of their own, and look upon themselves as the original inhabitants of the tract of country where they are now settled. The scanty legends current among other races regarding their origin are noticed in the article on the Mech tribe, with whom the Dhimal are associated by the Nepalese dwellers in the Terai.

The Dhimal are divided into three classes—Agniá, Láter, and Dungiá—the members of which are not absolutely debarred from intermarriage, though the Agniá Dhimals deem themselves superior to the other two classes, and as a rule marry within their own group. Marriages also occasionally take place between Dhimals and Rájbnasis of either sex, but in such cases the Rájbnasis usually have to abandon their own caste and enrol themselves in the Dhimal community, giving a feast to the panchdyat by way of entrance-fee. There are four exogamous septs—Chóngá, Dauwá, Kauwá, and Rángá. Prohibited degrees are reckoned by the standard formula down to seven generations on the male and three on the female side.

Marriage.

Infant-marriage is almost unknown among the Dhimáls, and is practised only by the few well-to-do families, who strive to imitate the customs of high-caste Hindus. Among the main body of the tribe youths between the ages of sixteen and twenty marry girls from twelve to sixteen. Courtship is unrestricted, and the young people usually settle their own love affairs without the intervention of parents or guardians. It occasionally happens that a match affecting the proprietary interests of two families is arranged by the fathers of the...

1 Mr. W. B. Oldham, Bengal Civil Service, late Deputy Commissioner of Darjiling.
2 Essays, i, 115.
3 They numbered 873 in 1872 and 662 in 1881.
couple concerned, but as a rule the first step taken in the direction of marriage is for the girl to go off one evening with the man of her choice and quietly establish herself in his house. At this stage her parents come forward and demand a settlement of the bride-price (chumna), which formerly stood at Rs. 11, but now ranges from Rs. 20 to Rs. 80, according to the attractions of the girl and the value which her parents set upon her lover. The amount, however, is not paid, or even finally settled at once; the bride must first pass through a period of probation, extending often to a year or more, during which time her capabilities as a housewife are supposed to be tested. If she gives satisfaction, the bride-price is determined and paid, and the marriage formally celebrated. If she is rejected, the man with whom she eloped is bound to maintain her and her children; but instances of this very rarely occur. The procedure, however, is by no means uniform in all cases. Very commonly the marriage takes place a month or so after the elopement, while the question of bride-price stands over until the young woman's true value has been ascertained by the working test of domestic life. Dhimals seem, however, to regard marriage as a form of minor importance. I know of a young Dhimal who took a girl to his house some three years ago. The two live happily together, and she has borne him a child, but the marriage ceremony has not yet been performed, owing probably to the parents being unable to agree about the bride-price. No social stigma attaches to the girl's position, and the women of the village receive her on equal terms; but she is not entitled to serve boiled rice to guests invited on any ceremonial occasion. From this curious laxity in ordering the relations of the sexes it follows of course that intercourse previous to elopement or marriage is tacitly recognised. But if a girl becomes pregnant while still in her parent's house, she is expected to disclose the name of her lover, and to prevail upon him to marry her or at least to take her to live with him.

The marriage ceremony has evidently been borrowed from the Hindus. Its essential portions are the standard rites of sātpāk or carrying the bride seven times round the bridegroom and smearing vermilion on her head (śindurādā). The village barber attends to shave the front half of the bridegroom's head; the caste guru, usually a Rajbansi, mutters gibberish which passes muster as sacred texts, and the proceedings are completed by the assembled guests showering paddy, dūb grass, sandal powder, and water on the heads of the married couple.

Polygamy is permitted up to a supposed maximum limit of three wives, but the tribe is a poor one, and very few Dhimals can afford themselves the luxury of more than one wife. A widow may marry again, and is in no way restricted in her choice, except that the second marriage must take place from her parent's house and the prohibited degrees binding on her before her marriage may not be infringed. Śindurādā and the resumption of the massive shell bracelet, usually three or four inches wide, which distinguishes a married woman, are the essential portions of the ceremony in use. Traces of Hindu influence may be discerned in the tendency to think less highly of a remarried widow than of a woman, whether married or not, who is cohabiting with a man for the first time, and is therefore eligible for marriage by the full form. Divorce is permitted on the ground of unchastity with the sanction of the caste pancháyat, and divorced wives may marry again under the conditions applicable to widows. A man who seduces a married woman is supposed to be liable to repay to the injured husband the bride-price given for her when a virgin, and the pancháyat may be called upon to enforce this obligation by the various forms of social punishment which they have at their command. The tribe knows nothing of the Hindu systems of law, and the devolution of property is regulated by a tribal custom of their own, administered by the village council or pancháyat. Sons inherit by equal shares; failing sons the uterine brethren divide the property; next in order comes the wife, then the daughters; and next to them the cousins of the deceased.

In the forty years which have passed since Hodgson published his Essay on the Kochh, Bodo, and Dhimal Tribe, the Dhimáls have made a marked advance in the direction of Hinduism. They now insist upon describing themselves as orthodox Hindus, and among their favourite objects of worship are Chháwal Thákur or Gopal Thákur (a form of Krishna), Chaitan, and Nítai (Chaitanya and Nityánanda, the great teachers of Vaishnavism), the Salagram or fossil ammonite, and the tulsi-plant (Ocimum sanctum). In the Darjiling Terai Dhimal temples may be seen in which Krishna is the central figure, having Chaitanya on his right hand and Nityánanda on his left; while the sacred tulsi is planted in front of the bamboo hut which contains these images.
No better illustration could be given of the distance which separates the Dhimal religion of to-day from the simple Nature-worship described by Hodgson, to which temples and images were alike unknown. The river-deities of forty years ago seem entirely to have lost their hold on the people, who no longer mention them among the regular gods, though it is possible that they may still drag on an obscure existence as patrons of the village or the household. From the precincts of the recognised tribal pantheon they have been expelled beyond hope of recall by Káli, Bisahari, Manasa, Bura Thákur, Mahámá, and other celestial personages borrowed from the Hindu system. These adopted gods, however, are worshipped on just the same principle as the spirits of flood and field, whom they have displaced. None of the esoteric doctrines of Hinduism have accompanied the new divinities, who are propitiated for the avoidance of physical ills by much the same offerings as were presented to their predecessors. Thus, to Chháwal Thákur and Chaitanya plantains, milk, and parched rice are offered; to Káli, buffaloes, goats, and pigeons; to Bisahari, goats, pigeons, and ducks. In this mêlée of Vaishnavism and Saivism the functions of priest are usually discharged by selected members of the Rájánsí caste, called Bámans, to distinguish them from the degraded Brahmans who are occasionally called in to assist in a specially important act of worship. These men, though belonging to the class of Barna Brahmans and serving the lowest castes of Hindus, would not deign to attach themselves regularly to the Dhimál tribe, and it seems likely enough that the whole of the Dhimáls may be absorbed in the Rájbansi caste without ever reaching the dignity of having Brahmans of their own.

Among the Dhimáls of the present day the Hindu practice of cremation, unknown at the time when Hodgson wrote, is fast displacing the more primitive usage of burial. The Agniá Dhimals, indeed, who rank above the other sub-castes, are said to owe their name to their adoption of the custom of burning the dead. When burial is resorted to, the corpse is laid in the grave face upwards with the head pointing towards the north. A meagre imitation of the Hindu ceremony of śraddhá is performed, usually on the tenth day after death; but the practice in this matter is by no means uniform, and some prefer the third day, some the seventh, and others again the thirteenth. A feast is always given to the relatives and friends of the deceased. Offerings for the benefit of ancestors in general are made in the month of Kár tik (October–November).

Standing as the Dhimáls do outside the regular caste system, their social status cannot be very precisely defined. They abstain from beef, snakes, rats, and similar vermin and the leavings of other people, but eat fowls, pork, lizards, and all kinds of fish. Rájbansis will take water from them and smoke in the same hookah, but all other castes regard them as unclean. Dhimáls in their turn profess not to take water from the Mech tribe, from Mahomedans, and from the large group of semi-Nepalose castes, vaguely termed Pahárias. Cooked food they will take from a Rájbansi or from a member of any higher caste. Agriculture, fishing, and pasturing cattle are their chief occupations, and a few work as coolies in the tea gardens of the Terai or carry on a petty trade in the commoner sorts of food-grain. In former years they were greatly addicted to the jhúm system of cultivation, but the limits within which this is possible have been greatly curtailed by the development of forest conservancy, and Dhimáls residing in British territory have for the most part taken to regular plough cultivation. In the Darjiling Terai a few of them are jotdárs under a ten years' settlement, the bulk of the tribe being ordinary raiyats or landless day-labourers. They still retain the nomadic habits noticed by Hodgson, and large numbers of them will at times desert their villages in order to settle in some locality better suited to their peculiar mode of life.

Dhimar, a sub-caste of Kahárs in Behar who say that they immigrated from the west. They carry palanquins and work as domestic servants, while some of them parch grain and keep petty shops. Socially they rank somewhat below the Rawani Kahárs, and Brahmans will not take water from their hands. They practise widow-marriage, and have a remarkable ceremony for divorce on the ground of adultery, the concluding act of which is to pour a gharrdáh of water over the wife's head and turn her adrift.
Dhimire, a thar of the Kásyap gotra of Nepáli Brahmans. Dhoár, a sub-caste of Gourhis in Behar.

Dhóbá, the washerman caste of Bengal and Orissa, who claim descent from Neta Muni or Netu Dhópání, who washed the clothes of Brahmá. According to another story, Neta was the son of a devotee called Dhóbá Muni, who washed his loin cloth (kopin) in a river, and thereby so fatigued himself that he could not fetch flowers for the daily worship. For this neglect his fellow-devotees cursed him, and he and his posterity were condemned to follow the profession of washing dirty clothes. The Skanda Puráña quoted in the Játi Kaumudi makes the Dhóbás the offspring of a Dhibár father and a Tibár mother—a statement quite unsupported by evidence, which is only mentioned here in illustration of the common tendency to insist on referring every caste now existing to some mode of mixed parentage.

Owing to the universal custom which forbids a Hindu to wash his own clothes, the Dhóbá caste is very widely distributed, and has in Bengal Proper been broken up into an unusually large number of sub-castes. Eighteen of these are shown in Appendix I, but I am by no means certain that the enumeration is exhaustive. In Eastern Bengal two great divisions are recognised—Rémer Dhóbá and Sitér Dhóbá; the former claiming descent from the washermen of Ráma, and the latter from those of Sita. Members of these two groups eat and drink together, but never intermarry. The story is that originally Rama’s washermen worked only for men and Sita’s only for women. The latter received a special payment of nine pans (720) of golden cowries for washing Sita’s menstrual cloths, and this made Ráma’s washermen covetous, so that one day they stole those garments and washed them themselves. From that time it is said each branch of the caste took to washing indifferently for either sex.

In Central Bengal we find four sub-castes—Sáti-sá, Athisá, Hájará Samáj, and Nitisiná. The first two are said to have reference to the number of families originally comprised in each group; the third is supposed to consist of a thousand persons degraded for some breach of social rules; the fourth are day-labourers as well as washermen. The distinctions between the first three are said to be less strictly maintained of late years. The Hughlí Dhóbás have four sub-castes—Bará Samáj, Chhota Samáj, Dhóbá Samáj, and Ráhiya Samáj, the members of which do not intermarry and cannot eat cooked rice together. In Noakhálí we find three endogamous groups bearing the names of parganas Bhuluá, Jugidiá, and Sundip. In Orissa there appear to be no sub-castes. The Manbhum series, Bangálí, Goriá, Magháyá, and Khótá, seems at first sight akin to the Behar set of sub-castes, in that it recognises Bangálí and Magháyá as distinct geographical groups. I have, however, placed the Manbhum Dhóbás in the Bengal division of the caste, because they speak Bengali themselves and are on the whole more subject to Bengal than to Behar influences.
The sections of the Bengal Dhobás present no points of special interest. All of them have been borrowed from the Brahmanical system, and are not taken into account in arranging marriages. There is, indeed, usually only one gotra current in each local community, and that seems to be retained mainly from the force of custom and as a badge of social distinction. The prohibited degrees are the same as in other castes of about the same position in society.

Bengal Dhobás, including the Manbhum members of the caste, marry their daughters as infants, at the age of from seven to nine years. Boys are usually married between eleven and fifteen, but the sons of poor men, who cannot afford to pay the bride-price (pan), often remain unmarried till five-and-twenty, by which time a man has probably earned enough to secure a wife for himself. The marriage ceremony is the same as is observed by most of the lower castes. The carrying of the bride seven times round the bridegroom is regarded as its binding portion. Polygamy is fully recognised in the case of well-to-do men whose first wives are barren; for others it is not allowed, but is not considered quite respectable. Widows may not marry a second time. Divorce is not allowed, but when a husband casts off his wife for adultery a reference is usually made to the panchayat and a purificatory ceremony (pradyaschitta), such as is described in the article on Cháśádhobés, is gone through by the husband. Women thus cast off cannot marry again.

Among the Dhobás of Eastern Bengal some curious usages prevail in respect of marriage. Every samaj or local assemblage of the Rémer-Dhobá sub-caste is headed by three officials, known in order of rank as the Nák, the Parámnánik, and the Bárík. The rest of the assemblage or community are known by the general name Samajik. For marriages between equals, that is between persons both of whom belong to the same class, whether official or Samajik, the bride-price is fixed at Rs. 50. But where the parties do not belong to the same class, the bride-price varies above or below this sum in relation to the rank of the bride and bridegroom. Thus a Samajik marrying the daughter of a Bárík, Parámnánik, or Nák will pay Rs. 51, Rs. 52, or Rs. 53, as the case may be; while a Nák marrying in the classes below him pays Rs. 49, Rs. 48, or Rs. 47, according to the rank of the bride. A somewhat less elaborate system exists in the Sitar-Dhoba sub-caste. There the headman of the Samaj is called Pradhán, and the second Parámnánik, but there is no third official. The amount of pan varies with the rank of the bride, but neither the normal amount nor the scale of variation is fixed by custom. In Murshedabad and other districts of Central Bengal the Samaj of the Dhobá caste is presided over by three officials—Parámnánik, Bárík, and Mandal, who are consulted when a marriage is under consideration, and who decide any questions regarding affinity which may arise.

The Dhobás of Orissá differ in several important particulars from the Dhobás of Bengal. In the first place they have among their gotras the distinctly totemistic group Nágasa, the members of which revere the snake as their common progenitor, and observe the primitive rule of exogamy, which forbids a man to marry a woman who bears the same totem as himself. Prohibited degrees of course are recognised, but the form in which they are stated shows them to be later amplifications of a more archaic method of preventing marriages between persons of near kin.

Again, adult as well as infant-marriages are sanctioned, and there are no limits to polygamy. A man may take as many wives as he likes or can afford to maintain. Widows may marry again under much the same conditions as are recognised by the non-Aryan races of Chota Nagpur. The ritual observed is sangri. When such a marriage is under consideration, the widow appears before a caste council and solemnly cuts an areca nut (supārī) into two pieces. This is supposed to symbolize her complete severance from the family of her late husband. The actual ceremony gone through on the day of the sangri is of the simplest character. The bridegroom decks the bride with new ornaments, denoting that she has put off the unadorned state of widowhood, and a feast is given to the members of the caste, their presence at which is deemed to ratify the marriage. While permitting widows to remarry, the Orissa Dhobes do not extend this privilege to divorced women. In dealing with women taken in adultery, the main point is whether the paramour is a member of the caste or not. If he is, I gather that the moral sense of the community is satisfied by the imposition of some slight penance, and that the husband by no means invariably insists on getting rid of his wife. A kaison with an outsider, however, admits of no atonement, and the offending woman is simply turned out of the caste.

The religion of the Dhoba caste, whether in Bengal or in Orissa, exhibits no points of special interest. Most Dhobes belong to the Vaishnava sect, and a few only are Saktas. Like many other serving castes, they pay especial reverence to Visvakarmā. They employ Brāhmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, but the Dhoba Brāhman, as he is usually called, ranks very low, and is looked down upon by those members of the priestly order who serve the higher castes. In the disposal of the dead and the subsequent propitiatory ceremonies they follow the standard customs of lower class Hindus. It deserves notice that the Dhobes of Orissa bury children up to five years of age face downwards—a practice which in Upper India is confined to members of the sweeper caste.

The necessities of Hindu society give rise to a very steady demand for the services of the Dhobes, and for this reason a comparatively small proportion of the caste have abandoned their distinctive occupation in favour of agriculture. The village Dhob, however, besides receiving customary presents at all village festivals, often holds chātkarās land in recognition of the services rendered by him to the community. In Eastern Bengal, according to Dr. Wise, the presence of the Dhob is deemed indispensable at the marriages of the higher classes, as on the bridal morn he sprinkles the bride and bridegroom with water collected in the palms of his hands from the grooves of his washing-board (pát), and after the bride has been daubed with turmeric the Dhóbeta must touch her to signify that she is purified.

In Dacca, says the same accurate observer, the washerman is hard-working, regular in his hours of labour, and generally one of the first workmen seen in the early morning, making use of a small native bullock, as the donkey does not thrive in Bengal, for carrying his bundles of clothes to the outskirts of the town. He cannot, however, be said to be a careful washerman, as he treats fine and coarse garments with equal roughness; but for generations the Dacca Dhóbeta have been famous for their skill, when they choose to exert it, and early in this century it was no uncommon thing for native gentlemen to forward valued articles of apparel from Calcutta to be washed and restored by them. At the present day Dhóbeta from Kóohh Béhár and other distant places are sometimes sent while young to learn the trade at Dacca.

For washing muslins and other cotton garments, well or spring water is alone used; but if the articles are the property of a poor man, or are commonplace, the water of the nearest tank or river is accounted sufficiently good.
The following is their mode of washing. The cloth is first cleansed with soap or fuller's earth, then steamed, steeped in earthen vessels filled with soap suds, beaten on a board, and finally rinsed in cold water. Indigo is in as general use as in England for removing the yellowish tinge and whitening the material. The water of the wells and springs bordering on the red laterite formation met with on the north of the city has been for centuries celebrated, and the old bleaching fields of the European factories were all situated in this neighbourhood. Dhóbeta use rice starch before ironing and folding clothes, for which reason no Brahman can perform his devotions or enter a temple without first of all rinsing in water the garment he has got back from the washerman.

Various plants are used by Dhóbeta to clarify water, such as the nir-máli (Strychnos potatorum), pui (Basella), nágphani (Cactus Indicus), and several plants of the mallow family. Alum, though not much valued, is sometimes used.

The Dhóbeta often gives up his caste trade and follows the profession of a writer, messenger, or collector of rent (tahsidár), and it is an old native tradition that a Bengali Dhóbeta was the first interpreter the English factory of Calcutta had, while it is further stated that our early commercial transactions were solely carried on through the agency of low-caste natives. The Dhóbeta, however, will never engage himself as an indoor servant in the house of a European.

Among the natives of Bengal the washerman, like the barber, is proverbially considered untrustworthy, and when the former says the clothes are almost ready he is not to be believed. The Bengali Dhóbeta is not so dissipated as his Hindustani namesake, whose drinking propensities are notorious, but he is said to indulge frequently in gánja-smoking.

The Dhóbeta is reckoned as unclean because he washes the puerperal garments—an occupation which, according to Hindu ideas, is reserved for out-caste and Social status.

abandoned races. His social rank therefore is low, and we find him classed with Chandals, Jugis, Mals, and the like. Notwithstanding this he assumes many airs, and lays down a fanciful standard of rank to suit his pleasure. Thus in Bikrampur, in Dacca, he declines to wash for the Patuni, Rishi, Bhunmali, and Chandal, but works for the Sunri, because the Napit does so, and for all classes of fishermen. He also refuses to attend at the marriages of any Hindus but those belonging to the Nava-Sakha, and under no circumstances will he wash the clothes worn at funeral ceremonies.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Dhobis in Bengal, Orissa, and Manbhum in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>7,152</td>
<td>7,152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>5,405</td>
<td>5,405</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>8,967</td>
<td>8,967</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>33,958</td>
<td>33,958</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kancheepore</td>
<td>7,088</td>
<td>7,088</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>18,183</td>
<td>18,183</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jhargrami</td>
<td>20,851</td>
<td>20,851</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Narayanganj</td>
<td>13,928</td>
<td>13,928</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>6,015</td>
<td>6,015</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khedimao</td>
<td>9,876</td>
<td>9,876</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>9,958</td>
<td>9,958</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munsibazar</td>
<td>2,997</td>
<td>2,997</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>2,052</td>
<td>2,052</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Raxabazar</td>
<td>1,743</td>
<td>1,743</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rangpur</td>
<td>808</td>
<td>808</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kheri</td>
<td>2,276</td>
<td>2,276</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>7,152</td>
<td>7,152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maujapur</td>
<td>327</td>
<td>327</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>14,197</td>
<td>14,197</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>9,404</td>
<td>9,404</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Dhobi, the washerman caste of Behar, entirely distinct from the Dhobas of Bengal and Orissa. Except the vague story that they are descended from Gari Bhuiya, one of the minor gods of Behar, Dhobis have no tradition respecting their origin, and the internal structure of the caste throws no light upon the sources from which it has been formed. Mr. Nesfield holds that the "washerman represents an impure caste, but are many degrees higher than that of the Bhangi, from whom he has sprung. Both are descended from the Dom, 'whose sole wealth,' according to Manu, 'must be dogs and asses." The Indian washerman has always been associated with the indigenous ass, which carries the soiled clothes down to the bank of the river or tank and takes them back clean to the house. No Hindu of any caste, even the lowest, will wash his own clothes, and so the Dhobi has been formed into a caste which shall bear the impurities of all." It seems to me open to question whether this ingenious hypothesis is borne out by the very scanty evidence that is available. Dhobis and Doms, as I understand the argument, are alleged to be cognate races, because both are associated with the donkey. Now in the first place the use of donkeys by the Dhobi caste is so far from being 1 Mann, x. 52, speaks thus of the Chandals, not of the Doms. There is nothing prima facie improbable in the view that both are derived from a common stock, but I doubt whether the evidence justifies the assumption of their identity.

universal that it has given rise to the formation of a slightly inferior sub-caste called Gadhaya. Secondly, beyond the highly conjectural identification of the Doms with the Chandals spoken of by Manu, there is nothing to show that Doms have the faintest partiality for the donkey. On the contrary, the Magahya Doms of Behar, as is explained in the article on that caste, will not touch a donkey, and regard the Dhobi with very special aversion, in explanation of which they tell a curious story. So far as my knowledge extends, neither the physical characteristics nor the exogamous divisions of the Dhobi caste suggest any conclusion at all regarding the origin of the group; and for the present at any rate all that can be said is that it is probably a functional group evolved under the pressure of social requirements from whatever elements happened to be at hand in any particular locality. The tendency, no doubt, would be to relegate the ceremonially objectionable work of a washerman to the non-Aryan races; and in Orissa, as has been pointed out in the article on Dhobá, some evidence has survived to show that this has actually taken place. But it would be hopeless to attempt by any mode of analysis to trace the various elements which may have been combined in a large functional caste.

The Dhobis of Behar are divided into the following sub-castes:—

- Kanaujia
- Maghayá
- Belwar
- Awadhiya
- Batham
- Gorsar
- Gadhaya (keep donkeys)
- Banglai (immigrants from Bengal).

There is also a class of Mahomedan Dhobis known as Turkiya. Magahya Dhobis have exogamous sections (mule) of the territorial type. The other sub-castes appear to have no sections, and to regulate their marriages solely by the standard Behar formula regarding prohibited degrees.

The usual practice among Dhobis is to marry their daughters as infants at ages ranging from five to twelve years; but cases sometimes occur in which a girl is married after puberty owing to her parents being too poor to arrange for her marriage before. The preliminary negotiations are conducted by a match-maker (aqua), who may or may not be a relative of the bride. A small customary price (tilak) is usually paid to the parents of the bridegroom. The ceremony is of the ordinary type. Polygamy is supposed to be prohibited, but a man may have two wives without incurring censure; and as a rule no one is rich enough to be able to keep more. A widow may marry again by the agai form, in which the ritual consists of smearing vermillion on the parting of the bride's hair with the bridegroom's left hand, and presenting to her a lac armlet. If her late husband has left a younger brother or younger cousin, it is considered the right thing for the widow to marry him some four or five months after her husband's death. A divorce may be obtained with the assent of the caste panchayat when a woman is taken in adultery with a member of the caste or for incompatibility of temper. Sexual intercourse with an outsider belonging to a lower caste would involve expulsion; but I infer from the case cited below that a woman would incur no social penalty by becoming the mistress of a man of high caste. A divorced woman may marry again by sagai. The man whom she marries is expected to give a feast to the members of the caste.

It is a singular fact that the Dhobis of Behar, like the Bauris and Bagdis of Bengal, admit into their community men of higher castes who have been expelled from their own group. In such cases the head of the new member is shaved, and he is bathed in any sacred stream that may be available. He must also worship Sat Nārāyan, and give money and a feast to the Brahmans of the caste. A case of this kind occurred recently in Champārān. A Bhunihar (Bābhān) of Khartari, thana Dhaka, having been expelled from his own caste for eating and drinking with a Dhobi woman who was his mistress, was formally received into the Dhobi caste by the ceremony described above.

In all that concerns the worship of the greater gods the religion of the Dhobis differs little from that of other castes of about the same social position. Siva, Vishnu, Kārtikeya, or the Saktis are selected for worship, very much as the personal tastes of the worshipper may dictate. Maithil and Sākadwipi Brahmans are employed as priests, but these suffer in social estimation by serving so low a caste, and are distinguished by the opprobrious name of Dhobi Brahman. Besides these professional purohitis, a Dhobi who turns Bairagi may find employment as guru or spiritual adviser among the members of his caste. In addition to the minor gods common to them and other low castes of Behar, Dhobis pay especial respect to Gāri, Bhuiā, whom they worship on the 5th of Shrāvan with offerings of he-goats, betel-leaves, flowers of the uruh tree, cakes of flour, rice boiled in milk, ganjā with a chillam ready for smoking, a dhotti, and a few coins. These offerings, with the exception of the ganjā, are afterwards consumed by the members of the family. The dhotti and the money are given to Brahmans. In the Monghyr district Barhām Ghāsi appears to occupy much the same position as Gāri Bhuiā does further north. On the last day of Ashar, Ghosi Pachāin is propitiated in very similar fashion. Some Dhobis are said to worship their flat iron (istiri), but I have been unable to find out the precise form of ritual appointed for such occasions. Jhunki Gosain and Rām Thākur are also reckoned among their gods.

In point of social standing Dhobis hold but a low place among the castes of Behar, being classed with Beldars, Musahars, Chamārs, and the like. Brahmans of course cannot take water from their hands. They are not very particular about their food, and in some districts they are known to eat field-rats—a fact which suggests non-Aryan affinities. Most of them adhere to their traditional occupation of washing clothes, and only a few have taken to agriculture as non-occupancy raiyats. Some, however, work as cartmen, and others have taken to selling milk. In North-West Shahabad, says Mr. Grierson,¹ the village Dhobi receives as his perquisite ten sera of grain for every plough in the village. This is called jaúrá. In the same part of the country he also receives an armful of crop, known as kharwar or kerá, according as it is large or small. In the North-Western Provinces, and probably also in Behar, the Dhobi gets a special fee in cash or kind at child-birth and on the day when the mother first leaves her room. According to the same high authority:

¹ Behar Peasant Life, n. 7. Dhobi.

"The honesty of the washerman and his tenderness for the clothes committed to his care are not considered of much account in Behár, and there are numerous proverbs coined at his expense, e.g., dhobi par dhobi base, tab kapra par sábun pare,—no soap ever touches clothes unless many washermen live together (when owing to competition they wash well). Again, dhobi káp ker kichhu nahi phat,—nothing belonging to a washerman's father is ever torn by him (i.e., those are the only clothes about which he is careful). It is also a wise precaution, which according to Behar ideas should universally be adopted, to disbelieve a washerman when he says the clothes are 'nearly' ready. A washerman's donkey is a by-word, as in the proverb gadha ken na doar goainydn, dhobiya ken na doar paroan,—an ass has only one master (a washerman), and the washerman has only one steed (a donkey). Again, dhobi, náit, darji i tinni alogariji,—there are three careless people, the washerman, the barber, and the tailor."

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Dhobi caste in Behar and Chota Nagpur during 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>12,460</td>
<td>13,354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gaya</td>
<td>17,354</td>
<td>19,763</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sihiábád</td>
<td>14,306</td>
<td>15,729</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tirhúts (Darbhágá)</td>
<td>45,197</td>
<td>52,015</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nárán</td>
<td>15,122</td>
<td>20,904</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>16,011</td>
<td>17,940</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>15,772</td>
<td>20,061</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bháralpur</td>
<td>9,414</td>
<td>15,016</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Málábáh</td>
<td>3,507</td>
<td>3,603</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sántal Pápánás</td>
<td>10,407</td>
<td>7,005</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Háaárbhách</td>
<td>7,530</td>
<td>11,873</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohárádáh</td>
<td>8,613</td>
<td>11,907</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Níshábhum</td>
<td>2,956</td>
<td>2,966</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,692</td>
<td>3,583</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Dhobil, a section of the Biyáhu and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Dhóbá-Samáj, a sub-caste of Dhóbás in Húghi.

Dhóbí-dhar, a sept of Bairágis in Chota Nagpur who cannot wash their clothes when performing ceremonies for the birth of a child.

Dhobi, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur who cannot touch a washerman.

Dhokar-Gónd or Mángán-Gónd, a sub-tribe of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Dhokasan, a section of the Goálás in Behar.

Dhokra, a sub-caste of Kámars or blacksmiths in Western Bengal who make brass idols.

Dhol, Dhole, a title of Barendra Brahmins and Bangaja Káyasts in Bengal.

Dholá, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal who are supposed to come from Dhalbhum.

Dholí, Dhuí, Dholíá, Dholíá, a beater of the dhol or small drum; a title of the Baití, Hári, Kora, Muchi, and other low castes; a section of the Dhapra

1 Behar Peasant Life, s.v. Dhobi.
DHOLI.

sub-caste of Doms in Behar; a title of Goélás.

Dholo, a sub-caste of Sunris in Western Bengal.

Dhondh, a water-snake, a sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Dhongán, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Dhor, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Dhorá, a sub-tribe of Bhuiyás in Chota Nagpur.

Dhorán, a section of Goélás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Dhosáli, a gain of the Bátsyá gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Dhránmar, a title of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Dhrubá, a gotra or section of the Baidyá caste in Bengal.

Dhukankorá, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Dhukursáni, a sub-caste of Kotás in Bengal.

Dhuli, a thar or sept of Dámis in Darjiling, the members of which are drummers by profession.

Dhuliá or Dhuló, a sub-caste of Baurís in Western Bengal.

Dhum, a title of Bangaja Káyszths in Bengal.

Dhunakáta, a sub-caste of Máls in Midnapur and Manbhúm.

Dhundhiá, a section of Goélás in the North-Western Provinces.

Dhundhlá, a section of Goélás in the North-Western Provinces.

Dhundhuri, a gain of the Sábarna gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Dhungiál, a thar of the Agasti gotra of Nepáli Brahmans.

Dhuniá, a cotton-carder, an occupation followed by Mahomédans.

Dhunkor, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Dhurári, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Dhurfandá, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidápá Kalwárás in Behar.

Dhuriá, a sub-caste of Kándus and Káhrs in Behar.

Dhurjííár, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goélás in Behar.

Dhurjííya, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Dhurúngía, a section of Ghásia in Chota Nagpur.

Dhusíá, Dhusiyá, a totemistic sept of Chamárs and Doms in Chota Nagpur; a sub-caste of Chamárs in Behar.

Diá, a section of Goélás in the North-Western Provinces.

Diáli, a section of Kámís in Darjiling.

Dian, a kind of fish, a totemistic sept of Bedias in Chota Nagpur.

Dichhit or Dikshit, a title of Kanaújí Brahmans, Bábhans, and Rajputs in Behar.

Dighá, a title of Baurís in Western Bengal.
Dighal, a qa'in of the Bātaya gotra of Rārhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Dighbāit, Dighwait, a kul or section of Bābhans in Behar.

Dighwarā, a mul or section of the Tinnuliā Madheśiā sub-caste of Halwāis in Behar.

Dighwe-Tipri, a mul of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans and of Bābhans in Behar.

Dighwe-Nagar, a mul of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Dighwe-Kankaurā, a mul of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Dighwe-Sannahrpur, a mul of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Dighwe-Sakarpurā, a mul of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Dihbans, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Dih-korwa, a sub-tribe of Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Dihparsār, a local section of the Maghayā sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Dihwār, a pur or section of Sākadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Diller, a sept of Goālās in Chota Nagpur.

Dilpáli, a ther or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Dingsáin, a qa'in of the Bha-radvāja gotra of Rārhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Dip, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur who may not eat after twilight.

Dipar, a section of Bābhans in Behar.

Dirghātī, a qa'in of the Sāndi-lya gotra of Rārhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Dirra, a kind of eel, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Dirwar, a jungle fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Doai, Doi, Chalanta, Baidya, Lekhiputra, Pátía Dás, a low cultivating caste of Eastern Bengal, especially numerous along the banks of the Lakhya river in Dacca. The Doai are probably allied to the Hajang, a Mongrel Garo tribe of Maimansinh and Silhet, bordering on the Garo Hills, who under Brahmanical influence have broken off from the hillmen. A division of the Kochh Mandai, however, bears the name Doi, and the Danyi are described by Buchanan as the most depraved of the Kochh tribe, and the most impure of the Rājbansi.

The Doais of Rungpūr, according to Mr. Damant, have no Brahmans, but employ members of their own caste as Purohits, and any stray Bairāgī as Guru, the srāddha being held on the eleventh day after decease. They eat pork and drink spirits, while their principal occupation is carrying palankins and fishing.

The Doai of Dacca are described by Dr. Wise as short, squat men, with an Indo-Chinese type of features; others are tall and muscular with large black eyes, aquiline noses, and a profusion of hair on the face, while their complexion is of a light brown. At the present day the Doais have become so thoroughly Hinduised, and have so completely lost their original language and customs, that very little information can be got from them. They have Patit Brahms of their own, who confess to having been their priests for three generations only. The weddings and funerals are the same as those of other low-caste Hindus, the sraddha being likewise celebrated on the thirtieth day. The Doai will drink from the vessels of the lowest Sudras, but even the Bhunmali is disgraced if he drinks from theirs. They disavow the use of pork and spirits, although their neighbours affirm that indulgence in both is universal. They all belong to one gotra, the Aliman, and their sole title is Das. Disputes are settled by a headman, Pradhán, whose office is not hereditary.

Their religious festivals are Hindu, the majority being Vaishnavas, while a Gosain or Bairgi is the Guru. Before felling a Gujáli or Sál-tree, offerings are made to Chandí, or Durga, the Brahman officiating; while according to their own account no religious rite is ever celebrated without the guidance of the family priest.

Living as they always do on the edge of the forest, they cut firewood for the market, and make matting (pat), whence the name Patia Dés, but do not catch fish for sale or engage themselves as boatmen. They have lost their ancestral language, and some of them occasionally learn to read and write Bengali, being employed as Tahuldários, or rent-collectors by landlords; while the illiterate become watchmen and messengers.

Doáiak, a muś or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Doáiband, he who bears a sword, a soldier; one of the two main divisions of Kharwárs, the other being Páthband.

Doasli, Dofasti, a designation of the illegitimate offspring of parents of different castes.

Dobar, a section of Sunris in Behar.

Dobe, see Dube.

Dobháiit, a muś or section of the Maghaya sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Dobhásia, Dubash, 'a man of two languages,' an interpreter; a title of the Rájbsansi sub-caste of Kochhs in Northern Bengal.

Dobongwar, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Dodrai, a kind of bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Doen, a muś or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Doeri, Doodri, Darván, a door-keeper. The term is reserved for the doorkeepers of the houses of considerable landholders in the mofussil.

Dogía, a mixed caste in Behar descended from fathers of the higher classes by women of the low castes. They are chiefly employed as writers.

Doháí, a thar of the Beochh gotra of Nepálí Brahms.

Dohán, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces.

Dohar, a sub-caste of Chamárs in Behar.

Doh-rahb-pá, one dwelling under the feet, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhoris, the members of which form the lowest class of Bhotias.

Doh-zepé, living in rough and craggy rocks, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhors, the members of which form the lowest class of Bhotias.

Doi, a synonym for Doai; a section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca.

Doingnak, a sub-tribe of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Dom, Domrá, sometimes called Chandál by outsiders, a Dravidian menial caste of Bengal, Behar, and the North-Western Provinces, regarding whose origin much has been said. Dr. Caldwell considers the "Doms and other Chandálas of Northern India and the Pareiyas and other low tribes of the Peninsula" to be the surviving representatives of an older, ruder, and blacker race, who preceded the Dravidians in India. Some of these were driven by the Dravidian invasion to take refuge in mountain fastnesses and pestilential jungles, while others were reduced to perpetual servitude like the Doms of Kumáon, whom Mr. Atkinson describes as for ages the slaves of the Khasiyás—thought less of than the cattle, and, like them, changing hands from master to master. Sir Henry Elliot says they "seem to be one of the aboriginal tribes of India. Tradition fixes their residence to the north of the Gogra, touching the Bhars on the east, in the vicinity of Rohini. Several old forts testify to their former importance, and still retain the names of their founders; as, for instance, Dómdihá and Domangarh. Rámgarh and Sahankot on the Rohini are also Dom forts." Mr. Carney observes that the fort of Domangarh was the stronghold of the Domar, a degenerate clan of Rájputs, and suggests in a note that these Domar or Donwár may themselves have been a family of Doms who had risen to power locally and got themselves enrolled in "the conveniently elastic fraternity of Rájputs." In support of this theory he refers to the case of Ali Baksh Dom, who became Governor of Ramlabad, one of the districts of Oudh, and mentions that it was not uncommon for men of this class to rise to high office under kings by whom they were employed as musicians.

1 Grammar of the Dravidian Languages, p. 546.
3 Races of the North-Western Provinces, i, 84.
4 Buchanan, Eastern India, ii, p. 353, calls this the "Domingar or the castle of the Dom lady." It should be noted that Sir Henry Elliot misunderstands Buchanan, who nowhere gives it as his own opinion that the Doms are the same as the Domkatar section of the Bábhan caste, though he mentions (ii, 471) without comment a popular tradition to that effect.
Out of this somewhat profitless discussion there seems to emerge a general consensus of opinion that the Doms belong to one of the races whom, for convenience of expression, we may call the aborigines of India. Their personal appearance bears out this opinion. Mr. Beames describes the Magahiya Doms of Champaran as "small and dark, with long tresses of unkempt hair, and the peculiar glossy eye of the non-Aryan autochthon;" and Mr. Sherring remarks that "dark-complexioned, low of stature, and somewhat repulsive in appearance, they are readily distinguishable from all the better castes of Hindus."

The type, however, as is the case with most widely-diffused castes, seems to display appreciable variations. In Eastern Bengal, according to Dr. Wise, the Dom's hair is long, black, and coarse, while his complexion is often of a brown rather than a black hue; and among the Magahiya Doms whom I have seen in Behar only a small proportion struck me as showing any marked resemblances to the aborigines of Chota Nagpur, who are, I suppose, among the purest specimens of the non-Aryan races of India. On the whole, however, the prevalent type of physique and complexion seems to mark the caste as not of Aryan descent, although evidence is wanting to connect it with any compact aboriginal tribe of the present day. The fact that for centuries past they have been condemned to the most menial duties, and have served as the helots of the entire Hindu community, would of itself be sufficient to break down whatever tribal spirit they may once have possessed, and to obliterate all structural traces of their true origin.

The Dom community is a large one, and the intricacy of its internal organization is doubtless due for the most part to the large area over which the caste is distributed. The sub-castes and sections are given in a tabular form in Appendix I. About most of these there is very little to be said. Enquiry into the origin of sub-castes is usually a difficult and unfruitful process, and it is attended with peculiar difficulties in the case of a caste regarded by all Hindus with extreme repulsion, and destitute of the social pride which delights to recall the reasons for minute internal divisions. The Magahiya Doms of Behar have a legend that once upon a time Mahadeva and Parvati invited all the castes to a feast. Supat Bhakat, the ancestor of the Doms, came late, and being very hungry, mixed up and ate the food which the others had left. His behaviour was deemed so scandalous that he and his descendants were straightway degraded and condemned to eat the leavings of all other castes. Even at the present day if a Dom who comes to beg is asked to what caste he belongs, the answer will invariably be "Jhutá-khái," or eater of leavings. This myth is unknown to the Doms of Central and Western Bengal, who trace their origin to a common ancestor called Kálibir, the son of a Chandál woman by her Let husband. From his four sons, Pránbir, Manbir, Bhánbir, and Shánbir, the sub-castes Ankuriá, Bisdeliá, Bajuniá, and Magahiya are said to

---

1 Races of the North-Western Provinces, p. 85.
2 Hindu Tribes and Castes, i, 401.
3 Let is a sub-caste of the Bágdis in Murshedabad.
be descended. The two elder sons, Pranbir and Manbir, were, it is said, sent out to gather flowers for a sacrifice. Pranbir, who was lazily inclined, tore the flowers from the trees with a bamboo hook (dnkuli) and picked them up as they fell on the ground; while Manbir climbed the trees and gathered flowers carefully from branch to branch. The flowers brought in by Manbir were accepted, and he received the title of Bisdelia (bis, ‘twenty,’ and dál, ‘a branch’), because he had climbed twenty branches in the service of the gods. The elder brother's offering was rejected as unclean, and he and his descendants were named Ankuriá in reference to the hook. On hearing this decision the third brother was greatly pleased, and drummed on his stomach in token of satisfaction. He and his offspring therefore were entitled Bajunia, or musician Doms. The Dhákál Dhesiá or Tapaspuriá Doms, who remove dead bodies and dig the cross trench which forms the base of the funeral pyre, also claim descent from Kalubir. One of his sons, they say, was sent by Mahadeva to fetch water from the Ganges. At the river bank he found a dead body waiting to be burned, and was tempted by offers of money from the friends of the deceased to dig the necessary trench. On his return to Mahádeva the god cursed him and his descendants to minister to the dead for all time. No special legend is given to account for the name Magahiyá, which doubtless originally denoted the Doms of South Behar. The Dái sub-caste owe their name to the circumstance that their women act as midwives in parts of the country where Chamains are not numerous enough to perform this function. The men are day-labourers. The Bánshpor or ‘bamboo-splitter’ sub-caste derive their name from the material out of which they make baskets; while the Chapariyá seem to be so called from building the bamboo framework by which a roof (chapar) is supported. The Uttariya Doms of South Behar work in sirki, and regard this as an important distinction between themselves and the Magahiyá, who in that part of the country till the soil and make mats and baskets of bamboo.

The exogamous sections of the caste are very numerous. In Behar they seem to be territorial or titular; while in Bankura the names are totemistic, and the members of particular sections refrain from injuring the animals after which they are called. In Central Bengal traces of totemism may perhaps be found, but the tendency is to borrow the Brahmanical gotras, while in the eastern districts all exogamous groups seem to have disappeared, and marriages are regulated by the more modern system of counting prohibited degrees down to and including the fifth generation in descent from a common ancestor. The Magahiyá Doms of Behar affect to observe a very elaborate method of working the rule of exogamy. They lay down that a man may not marry a woman belonging to the same section as his own (1) father, (2) paternal grandmother, (3) paternal great-grandmother, (4) paternal great-great-grandmothers, (5) mother, (6) maternal grandmother, (7) maternal great-grandmothers. In applying the rule to a particular case, all the sections on both sides are taken into account in the manner described in the article on Bais, so that a marriage would be barred if one of the great-grandmothers of the proposed bride happened to have belonged to the same section as one of the great-great-grandmothers of the proposed bridegroom, even though the parties themselves belonged to different muls. This mode of calculation appears to be confined to Behar; and in Bengal wherever sections exist, the only rule observed is that a man may not marry a woman of the same section as himself. The standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees is in general use. In Bankura it is ordinarily calculated to three generations in the descending line; but where bhaiddi, or mutual recognition of relationship, has been kept up between two families, the prohibition extends to five generations. The Doms of the 24-Parganas affect to prohibit marriage between sapindas, but this is a palpable imitation of the customs of the higher castes. Members of other castes may be received into the Dom community by paying a fee to the panchayat and giving a feast to the Doms of the neighbourhood. At this feast the proselyte is required to wait upon his new associates and to eat with them. He must also have his head shaved and undergo a sort of baptism with water at the hands of the caste panchayat in token of his adoption of the Dom religion. Instances of men of other castes thus joining themselves to the Doms are very rare, and occur only when a man has been ejected from his own caste for living with a Dom woman. Some say, however, that in these cases the proselyte, though ordinarily spoken of as a Dom, is not admitted to complete equality with the original members of the caste. His children, however, will be Doms of the same sub-caste as their mother.

In Central and Eastern Bengal Doms, following the example of the higher castes, nearly always marry their daughters as infants, and regard it as wrong for a girl over ten years of age to remain unmarried in her father's house. A small bride-price (pan), varying from Rs. 5 to Rs. 10, is paid to the parents of the girl. In Behar and Western Bengal adult-marriage still holds its ground for those who cannot afford the more fashionable practice, and sexual intercourse before marriage is said to be tolerated. Among the Doms of the Dacca district the marriage service is peculiar. The guests being assembled on a propitious day fixed by a Brähman, the bridegroom's father takes his son on his knee, and, sitting down in the centre of the "Marocha" opposite the bride's father, who is holding his daughter in a similar posture, repeats the names of his ancestors for seven generations, while the bride's father runs over his for three. They then call God to witness the ceremony, and the bridegroom's father addressing the other asks him, "Have you lost your daughter?" The answer being in the affirmative, a similar interrogation and reply from the opposite party terminates the service. The boy-bridegroom then advances, smears the bride's forehead with sindur or red lead—the symbol of married life—takes her upon his knee, and finally carries her within doors. Like all aboriginal races, Doms are very fond of gaudy colours; the bridal dress consisting of yellow or red garments for the female, and a yellow cloth with a red turban for the male.
In the 24-Parganas a more Hinduised ritual is in vogue. The marriage takes place on a raised earthen platform (bedi), to which a branch of a banian-tree is fixed. An earthen vessel full of Ganges water is placed in the centre. On this vessel the bride and bridegroom lay their hands, one above the other, and the ceremony is completed by exchanging garlands of flowers. The Dom priest, Dharma-Pandit, presides and mutters words which purport to be sacred texts, and the actual marriage service is preceded by offerings to ancestors and the worship of Surya, Ganessa, Durga, Mahadeva, and Anti Kuldevata. Further west again, in the districts of Bankura and Manbhum, the ritual appears to differ little from that already described in the article on the Bâgdî caste. There is, however, no marriage with a tree and no symbolic capture of the bride, as in the case of the Bâgdîs; while in the joining of the hands which precedes sindurdân, the bride presents her right hand if she is given away by a male, and her left if by a female relative. On the night before the wedding the ceremony of adhibâs is performed in the houses of both parties by anointing the body with turmeric and oil and tying a thread soaked in this mixture and knotted with a few blades of durva grass on the right wrist of the bridegroom and the left wrist of the bride. The ritual followed in Behar is of the simplest character, consisting mainly of sindurdan, which is often performed in the open air under a tree. The wealthier Doms, however, erect a wedding canopy (marva), and generally copy the Hindu ceremony with more or less accuracy of detail.

Polygamy is everywhere permitted, and poverty forms the only restriction on the number of wives a man may have. The standard of living however is low, and it is unusual to find a Dom with more than two wives, and most men content themselves with one. A widow may marry again, and in Behar it is deemed right for her to marry her late husband's younger brother; but in Bengal this idea does not seem to prevail, and a widow may marry any one she pleases provided that she does not infringe the prohibited degrees binding on her before her first marriage. The ritual (sânga or sagdi) observed at the marriage of a widow consists mainly of sindurdân and the present of a new cloth. A pan is rarely paid, and never exceeds a rupee or two. In Murshedabad there is no sindurdân, and a formal declaration of consent before representatives of the caste is all that is required. Considerable license of divorce is admitted, and in some districts at any rate the right can be exercised by either husband or wife; so that a woman, by divesting herself of the iron bracelet given to her at marriage, can rid herself of a husband who ill-treats her or is too poor to maintain her properly. Dom women have a reputation for being rather masterful, and many of them are conspicuous for their powerful physique. It may be by virtue of their characteristics that they have established a right very rarely conceded to women in Bengal. A husband, on the other hand, can divorce his wife for infidelity or persistent ill-temper. In either case the action of the individual requires the confirmation of the panchâyat, which however is usually given as a matter of course, and is expressed in Bhágalpur by solemnly pronouncing the pithy monosyllable j̣āo. In North Bhagalpur the husband takes in his hand a bundle of rice straw and cuts it in half before the assemblage as a symbol of separation. Divorced wives may marry again by the same ritual as widows. Their children remain in the charge of their first husband. In Monghyr the second husband must give the pancháyat a pig to form the basis of a feast, and if convicted of having seduced the woman away from her first husband must pay the latter Rs. 9 as compensation. A husband, again, who divorces his wife has to pay a fee of 10 annas to the pancháyat for their trouble in deciding the case.

Most of the sub-castes seem to have a fairly complete organization for deciding social questions. The system of pancháyats is everywhere in full force, and in Behar these are presided over by hereditary headmen, variously called sardár, pradhán, manjhan, marar, gorait, or kabiráj, each of whom bears rule in a definite local jurisdiction, and has under him a chháridar or rod-bearer to call together the pancháyat and to see that its orders are carried out.

The religion of the Doms varies greatly in different parts of the country, and may be described generally as a chaotic mixture of survivals from the elemental or animistic cults characteristic of the aboriginal races, and of observances borrowed in a haphazard fashion from whatever Hindu sect happens to be dominant in a particular locality. The composite and chaotic nature of their belief is due partly to the great ignorance of the caste, but mainly to the fact that as a rule they have no Brahmans, and thus are without any central authority or standard which would tend to mould their religious usages into conformity with a uniform standard. In Behar, for instance, the son of a deceased man's sister or of his female cousin officiates as priest at his funeral and recites appropriate mantras, receiving a fee for his services when the inheritance comes to be divided. Some Doms, indeed, assured me that the sister's son used formerly to get a share of the property, and that this rule had only recently fallen into disuse; but their statements did not seem to be definite enough to carry entire conviction, and I have met with no corroborative evidence bearing on the point. So also in marriage the sister's son, or occasionally the sister (sautéin), repeats mantras, and acts generally as priest. Failing either of these, the head of the household officiates. The possible significance of these facts in relation to the early history of the caste need not be elaborated here. No other indications of an extinct custom of female kinship are now traceable, and the fact that in Western Bengal the eldest son gets an extra share (jêth-angs) on the division of an inheritance seems to show that kinship by males must have been in force for a very long time past. In Bengal the sister's son exercises no priestly functions, these being usually discharged by a special class of Dom. known in Bankura as Deghariá, and in other districts as Dharma-Pandit. Their office is hereditary, and they wear copper rings on their fingers as a mark of distinction. In Murshedabad, on the other hand, most Doms, with the exception of the Bánukia sub-caste and some of the Ánkuría, have the services of low Brahmans, who may perhaps be ranked as Barna-Brahmans. The same state of things appears to prevail in the north of Manbhum. In the Santál Parganas barbers minister to the spiritual wants of the caste.

With such a motley array of amateur and professional priests, any unity of religious organization among the Doms. In Bankura and Western Bengal generally they seem on he whole to lean towards Vaishnavism, but in addition to Rádhá and Krishna they worship Dharem or Dharma-ráj in form of a man with a fish's tail on the last day of Jaishtha with offerings of rice, molasses, plantain, and sugar, the object of which is said to be to obtain the blessing of the sun on the crops of the season. Every year in the month of Baisák the members of the caste go into the jungle to offer sacrifices of goats, fruits, and sweetmeats to their ancestral deity Kálubir; and at the appointed season they join in the worship of the goddess Bhádu, described in the article on the Bágdi caste. At the time of the Durga Puja, Bájuniá Doms worship the drum, which they regard as the symbol of their craft. This usage has clearly been borrowed from the artisan castes among the Hindus.

In Central Bengal Káli appears to be their favourite goddess; and in Eastern Bengal many Doms follow the Panth, or path of Supat, Súpan, or Sobhana Bhagat, who is there regarded as a guru rather than as the progenitor of the caste. Others, again, call themselves Haris Chandis, from Rájá Haris Chandra, who was so generous that he gave away all his wealth in charity, and was reduced to such straits that he took service with a Dom, who treated him kindly. In return the Rájá converted the whole tribe to his religion, which they have faithfully followed ever since.1

The principal festival of the Doms in Eastern Bengal is the Sravannia Puja, observed in the month of that name, corresponding to July and August, when a pig is sacrificed and its blood caught in a cup. This cup of blood, along with one of milk and three of spirits, are offered to Náráyán. Again, on a dark night of Bhádra (August) they offer a pot of milk, four of spirits, a fresh cocoanut, a pipe of tobacco, and a little Indian hemp to Harí Rám, after which swine are slaughtered and a feast celebrated. A curious custom followed by all castes throughout Bengal is associated with

---

1 This is the form of the legend current among the Doms of Dacca. It will be observed that the Chandála of the Márkandeya Purána has been turned into a Dom, and the pious king into a religious reformer. According to Dr. Wise, Haris Chandra is a well-known figure in the popular mythology of Bengal, and it is of him that natives tell the following story, strangely like that narrated in the xviith chapter of the Koran regarding Moses and Joshua.
He and his Ráni, wandering in the forest, almost starved, caught a fish and boiled it on a wood fire. She took it to the river to wash off the ashes, but on touching the water the fish revived and swam away. At the present day a fish called kálosa (Labea calbasu), of black colour and yellow flesh, is identified with the historical one, and no low-caste Hindu will touch it. In Hindustan the following couplet is quoted concerning a similar disaster which befell the gambler Nála, the moral being the same as that of the English proverb—' Misfortunes never come singly' 2 :

``Rájá Nal par bihat pare,
Bhúne machhle jal men tire.''

Digitized by Google
the Dom, and may perhaps be a survival from times when that caste were the recognised priests of the elemental deities worshipped by the non-Aryan races. Whenever an eclipse of the sun or moon occurs, every Hindu householder places at his door a few copper coins, which, though now claimed by the Achārjī Brahman, were until recently regarded as the exclusive perquisite of the Dom.

Similar confusion prevails in Behar under the régime of the sister's son, only with this difference, that the advance in the direction of Hinduism seems to be on the whole less conspicuous than in Bengal. Mahadeva, Kāli, and the river Ganges receive, it is true, sparing and infrequent homage, but the working deities of the caste are Śyām Singh, whom some hold to be the deified ancestor of all Doms, Rakat Mālá, Ghīhal or Gohil, Goraiyā, Bandū, Lakeswar, Dīhwār, Dāk, and other ill-defined and primitive shapes, which have not yet gained admission into the orthodox pantheon. At Deodha, in Darbhanga, Śyām Singh has been honoured with a special temple; but usually both he and the other gods mentioned above are represented by lumps of dried clay, set up in a round space smeared with cow-dung inside the house, under a tree or at the village boundary. Before these lumps, formless as the creed of the worshipper who has moulded them, pigs are sacrificed and strong drink offered up at festivals, marriages, and when disease threatens the family or its live-stock. The circle of these godlings, as Mr. Ibbetson has excellently called them, is by no means an exclusive one, and a common custom shows how simply and readily their number may be added to. If a man dies of snake-bite, say the Magahiyā Doms of the Gya district, we worship his spirit as a Śāmperiyā, lest he should come back and give us bad dreams; we also worship the snake who bit him, lest the snake-god should serve us in like fashion. Any man therefore conspicuous enough by his doings in life or for the manner of his death to stand a chance of being dreamed of among a tolerably large circle is likely in course of time to take rank as a god. Judging, indeed, from the antecedents of the caste, Śyām Singh himself may well have been nothing more than a successful dacoit, whose career on earth ended in some sudden or tragic fashion, and who lived in the dreams of his brethren long enough to gain a place in their rather disreputable pantheon. Systematic robbery is so far a recognised mode of life among the Magahiyyā Doms that it has impressed itself on their religion, and a distinct ritual is ordained for observance by those who go forth to commit a burglary. The object of veneration on these occasions is Sansārī Māi, whom some hold to be a form of Kāli, but who seems rather to be the earth-mother known to most primitive religions. No image, not even the usual lump of clay, is set up to represent the goddess: a circle one span and four fingers in diameter is drawn on the ground and smeared smooth with cow-dung. Squatting in front of this the worshipper gashes his left arm with the curved Dom knife (katārī), and daubs five streaks of blood with his finger in the centre of the circle, praying in a low voice that a dark night may aid his designs; that his booty may be ample; and that he and his gang may escape detection.1

"Labra movet metuens andiri: pulchra Laverna,
Da mihi fallere, da justo sanctoque videri,
Noctem peccatis et fraudibus objicem nubem."2

According to Dr. Wise it is universally believed in Bengal that Doms do not bury or burn their dead, but dismember the corpse at night, like the inhabitants of Tibet, placing the pieces in a pot and sinking them in the nearest river or reservoir. This horrid idea probably originated from the old Hindu law which compelled the Doms to bury their dead at night. The Doms of Dacca say that the dead are cast into a river, while the bodies of the rich or influential are buried. When the funeral is ended each man bathes, and successively touches a piece of iron, a stone, and a lump of dry cow dung, afterwards making offerings of rice and spirits to the manes of the deceased, while the relatives abstain from flesh and fish for nine days. On the tenth day a swine is slaughtered, and its flesh cooked and eaten, after which quantities of raw spirits are drunk until everybody is intoxicated. In Western Bengal and Behar the usual practice is to burn the dead and present offerings to the spirit of the deceased on the eleventh day, or, as some say, on the thirteenth. Before going to the place of cremation the Behar Doms worship Masán, a demon who is supposed to torment the dead if not duly propitiated. Burial is occasionally resorted to, but is not common, except in the case of persons who die of cholera or small-pox and children under three years of age. In these cases the body is laid in the grave face downward with the head pointing to the north.

"By all classes of Hindus," says Dr. Wise, "the Dom is regarded with both disgust and fear, not only on account of his habits being abhorrent and abominable, but also because he is believed to have no humane or kindly feelings. To those, however, who view him as a human being, the Dom appears as an improvident and dissolute man, addicted to sensuality and intemperance, but often an affectionate husband and indulgent father. As no Hindu can approach a Dom, his peculiar customs are unknown, and are therefore said to be wicked and accursed. A tradition survives among the Dacca Doms, that in the days of the Nawáhs their ancestors were brought from Patna for employment as executioners (jallád) and disposers of the dead—hateful duties, which they perform at the present day. On the paid establishment of each magistracy a Dom hangman is borne, who officiates whenever sentence of death is carried out. On these occasions he is assisted by his relatives, and as the bolt is drawn shouts of 'Dohái

---

1 The whole of this business was acted before me in the Buxar Central Jail by a number of Magahiyé Doms undergoing sentence there. Several of them had their left arms scarred from the shoulder to the wrist by assiduous worship of the tribal Laverna.

2 Horace, Epist. i. 16, 60.
"Mahāranī!" or 'Dohái Judge Sáhib' are raised to exonerate them from all blame."

The peculiar functions which the caste performs at all Hindu funerals may be observed by all visitors to Benares, and are described by Mr. Sherring as follows:—"On the arrival of the dead body at the place of cremation, which in Benares is at the base of one of the steep stairs or ghāts, called the Burning Ghāt, leading down from the streets above to the bed of the river Ganges, the Dom supplies five logs of wood, which he lays in order upon the ground, the rest of the wood being given by the family of the deceased. When the pile is ready for burning, a handful of lighted straw is brought by the Dom, and is taken from him and applied by one of the chief members of the family to the wood. The Dom is the only person who can furnish the light for the purpose; and if from any circumstance the services of one cannot be obtained, great delay and inconvenience are apt to arise. The Dom exacts his fee for three things, namely, first, for the five logs; secondly, for the bunch of straw; and thirdly, for the light." It should be added that the amount of the fee is not fixed, but depends upon the rank and circumstances of the deceased. In Eastern Bengal, according to Dr. Wise, the services of the Dom at the funeral yre are not now absolutely essential. Of late years, at any rate in Dacca, household servants carry the corpse to the burning ghāt, where the pyre constructed by them is lighted by the nearest relative.

The degraded position forced upon all Doms by reason of the functions which some of them perform is on the whole acquiesced in by the entire caste, most of whom, however, follow the comparatively cleanly occupation of making baskets and mats. Taking food as the test of social status, it will be seen that Doms eat beef,1 pork, horse-flesh, fowls, ducks, field-rats, and the flesh of animals which have died a natural death. All of them, moreover, except the Bansphor and Chapariyā sub-castes, will eat the leavings of men of other castes. To this last point one exception must be noted. No Dom will touch the leavings of a Dhobi,2 nor will he take water, sweetmeats, or any sort of food or drink from a man of that caste. The aversion with which the Dhobi is regarded is so pronounced that Doms of Behar have assured me that they would not take food from a Muhammadan who had his water fetched for him by a washerman of his own religion. The reason is obscure. Some people say the Dhobi is deemed impure because he washes women's clothes after childbirth; but this fact, though conclusive enough for the average Hindu, would not, I imagine, count for much with a Dom. Moreover, the Doms themselves say nothing of the kind, but tell a very singular story to account for their hatred of the Dhobis. Once upon a time,

---

1 In Murshedsbad and Eastern Bengal they profess to abstain from beef and hold themselves superior to Muchis and Bauris for so doing. In Assam buffalo meat is also forbidden.

2 Some Doms say they will not eat the leavings of Dosadhīs and Chamárś, but this refinement is not general.
they say, Supat Bhakat, the ancestor of the Doms, was returning tired and hungry from a long journey. On his way he met a Dhobi going along with a donkey carrying a bundle of clothes, and asked him for food and drink. The Dhobi would give him nothing and abused him into the bargain, whereupon Supat Bhakat fell upon the Dhobi, drove him away with blows, killed his donkey, and cooked and ate it on the spot. After he had eaten he repented of what he had done, and seeing that it was all the Dhobi’s fault declared him and his caste to be accursed for the Doms for ever, so that a Dom should never take food from a Dhobi or eat in his house. The legend may perhaps be a distorted version of the breach of some primitive taboo in which Dhobis and donkeys somehow played a part.
Doms will not touch a donkey, but the animal is not regarded by the caste in the light of a totem. In this connexion I may mention the curious fact that the Ankuriá and Bisdéliá Doms of Birbhum will not hold a horse or kill a dog, nor will they use a dao with a wooden handle, explaining that their ancestors always worked with handleless dos, and that they are bound to adhere to the ancient custom. The prejudice against killing a dog seems at first sight to suggest some connexion with the Bauris; but it may equally arise from the fact that one of the duties of scavenging Doms in towns is to kill ownerless dogs.

Doms believe their original profession to be the making of baskets and mats, and even the menial and scavenging sub-castes follow these occupations to some extent. About half of the caste are believed to have taken to agriculture, but none of these have risen above the rank of occupancy raiylas, and a large proportion are nomadic cultivators and landless day-labourers. In the south of Manbhum a small number of rent-free tenures, bearing the name sibotar, and supposed to be set apart for the worship of the god Siva, are now in the possession of Doms—a fact of which I can suggest no explanation. The Bajuniá sub-caste are employed to make highly discordant music at marriages and festivals. His women-folk, however, only perform as musicians at the wedding of their own people, it being considered highly derogatory for them to do so for outsiders. At home the Domni manufactures baskets and rattles for children. A single wandering branch of the Magahiyá sub-caste has earned for itself a reputation which has extended to the whole of that group. “The Magahiyá Doms of Champaran,” says Mr. Beames, “are a race of professional thieves. They extend their operations into the contiguous districts of Nepal. They are rather dainty in their operations, and object to commit burglary by digging through the walls of houses: they always enter a house by the door; and if it is dark, they carry a light. Of course all this is merely done by way of bravado. Magahiyás never live long in one place. They move about constantly, pitching their ragged little reed tents or sirkis outside a village or on a grassy patch by the roadside, like our gipsies, till they have done all the plundering that offers itself in the neighbourhood, when they move off again.” The popular belief that all Magahiyá Doms are habitual criminals is, however, a mistake.
The Magahiyés of Gya are peaceable basket-makers and cultivators, who regard thieving with as much horror as their neighbours, and know nothing of the Laverna cult of Sansári Mái, whom they identify with Jagadambé, the small-pox goddess, one of a group of seven sisters presiding over various diseases. There seems, indeed, reason to believe that the predatory habits of the gipsy Magahiyas of Champaran are due rather to force of circumstances than to an inborn criminal instinct; and the success of the measures introduced for their reclamation by Mr. E. R. Henry while Magistrate of Champaran affords grounds for the hope that they may in course of time settle down as peaceable cultivators.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Doms in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>62,387</td>
<td>98,856</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>15,401</td>
<td>9,117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>7,193</td>
<td>17,601</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>7,293</td>
<td>380</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>36,297</td>
<td>52,335</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>1,593</td>
<td>9,46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>16,610</td>
<td>16,525</td>
<td>Pátina</td>
<td>6,116</td>
<td>8,406</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>10,715</td>
<td>10,709</td>
<td>Gaya</td>
<td>7,087</td>
<td>6,773</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>4,960</td>
<td>3,773</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>4,075</td>
<td>5,813</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>6,478</td>
<td>5,199</td>
<td>Tribut (Darbhanga)</td>
<td>11,457</td>
<td>10,618</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>3,687</td>
<td>2,547</td>
<td>(Monsoonpur)</td>
<td>10,047</td>
<td>10,042</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>7,193</td>
<td>17,601</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>7,486</td>
<td>9,955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>7,193</td>
<td>17,601</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>4,211</td>
<td>8,818</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>10,490</td>
<td>7,877</td>
<td>Monjoy</td>
<td>10,799</td>
<td>13,910</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajsháy</td>
<td>1,245</td>
<td>3,494</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>14,961</td>
<td>17,279</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bangalpur</td>
<td>588</td>
<td>468</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>3,927</td>
<td>6,843</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bóra</td>
<td>171</td>
<td>327</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>1,227</td>
<td>1,777</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>1,668</td>
<td>1,531</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>20,455</td>
<td>20,534</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>89</td>
<td>195</td>
<td>Outtack</td>
<td>2,563</td>
<td>1,759</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jaiplugin</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>953</td>
<td>Burdwan</td>
<td>2,118</td>
<td>2,328</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>83</td>
<td>291</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>1,397</td>
<td>1,483</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>94</td>
<td>970</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>4,893</td>
<td>5,929</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>589</td>
<td>599</td>
<td>Hazaribag</td>
<td>7,606</td>
<td>7,303</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naugarj</td>
<td>1,096</td>
<td>623</td>
<td>Lohardagá</td>
<td>5,286</td>
<td>5,673</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimamnano</td>
<td>3,117</td>
<td>1,118</td>
<td>Singhbhum</td>
<td>2,054</td>
<td>2,314</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>386</td>
<td>2,511</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Domkatár, a section of Bábhans in Western Bengal and Behar to whom the members of other sections will not give their daughters in marriage, though they will marry Domkatár women. It perhaps deserves notice that káatr or kátári is the name of the peculiar curved knife used by the basket-making Doms.

Dom Khakha, a raven, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Dom-Pátni, Machhwa or Naqárci, a sub-caste of Pátinis in Bengal.

Domrá, a sub-caste of Turis in Chota Nagpur; a synonym for Dom.

Domtakarái, a mul of the Bharadváj section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Domtáshi, a title of those Doms whose only profession is to sell bamboo articles, originally immigrants from Upper India.

Domtikár, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Don, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madheśí sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.
Dondchatra, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Dong-ba, a rúi or sept of Sherpa Bhotias of Nepal.

Dongwár, a title of those who use canoes, generally Gond, Malla, or Oraon.

Donwár, a kui or section of Bábhans and a sept of Rajputs in Behar; a sept of the Rautáir sub-tribe of Thárus.

Dopátiá, a sub-caste of Mayá-as in Eastern Bengal.

Dosadh, a degraded Aryan or refined Dravidian cultivating caste of Behar and Chota Nagpur, the members of which are largely employed as village watchmen and messengers, and bear a very evil reputation as habitual criminals. Dosadhás claim to be descended from the soldiers of the Pándava prince Bhima or Bhim Sen, and to be allied to the Cheros, who are supposed at one time to have ruled in Behar. Buchanan thought there was “some reason to suspect” that the Dosadhás might be the same tribe as the Chandáls of Bengal, basing this conjecture on the statement that “the two castes follow nearly the same professions and bear the same rank, while the Chandáls pretend to be descended of Ráhu, and, I am told, worship that monster.” In fact, however, the Chandáls do not worship Ráhu or trace their origin to him, and the Dosadhás revere a host of deified heroes, a form of worship entirely unknown to the Chandál. The young men of the caste are often rather good-looking, and many of them have a yellowish brown complexion with wide, expanded nostrils and the tip of the nose slightly turned up. The complexion, however, and the shape of the nose show a range of variations which seems to indicate considerable mixture of blood.

Professor Mantegazza, following Dalton, describes them as “Aryans of a very low type;” and it seems about equally likely that the original stock may have been a branch of the Aryans degraded and coarsened by crossing with lower races, or a non-Aryan tribe refined in feature and raised in stature by intermixture with semi-Aryan castes. In Northern Behar there has probably been some infusion of Mongolian blood; and in all parts of the country some allowance must be made for the fact that members of any Hindu caste except the Dom, Dhobi, and Chamar may gain admission into the Dosadhá community by giving a feast to the heads of the caste and eating pork and drinking liquor in token of their adoption of Dosadhá usage. This privilege, no doubt, is not eagerly sought for, and most of those who join themselves to the Dosadhás after this fashion have probably got into trouble with their own people for keeping a Dosadhá mistress or doing something disreputable. Still the existence of a regular procedure for enrolling recruits from other castes shows that such cases are not unknown, and they must tend in some measure to modify the physical type of the caste.

The caste is divided into eight sub-castes:—Kanaujiya, Magahiya, Bhojpuriya, Pailvar, Kamar or Kanwar, Kuri or Kurin, Dharhi or Dhär, Sihotia or Siroti, Bāhali, Bāhali. The members of nearly all these groups will eat cooked food together, but do not intermarry. The Dharhi, however, who pretend to be descended from a Gōlā who accidentally killed a cow, and disclaim all connexion with the Dosas, are excluded from this privilege; and the Kamar have only recently cleared themselves from the suspicion of eating beef and been admitted to social intercourse with the other sub-castes. Concerning the Bāhali there is some question whether they are Dosas at all, and it has been maintained that they are a distinct caste of gypsy-like habits, and possibly akin to the Bediyas. Most Bāhali, however, insist on their title to be considered Dosas, and in Bengal at any rate the Bāhali and Dosas eat and smoke together, and, though they do not intermarry, behave generally as if they were branches of the same stock. The sections (dih, mut, pärich, or pangat), which are very numerous, are shown in Appendix I. In applying the rule of exogamy to a particular case the caste profess to exclude the sections of (1) the father, (2) the paternal grandmother, (3) the paternal great-grand-mothers, (4) the paternal great-great-grandmothers, (5) the mother, (6) the maternal grandmother, (7) the maternal great-grandmothers, and to follow the double method of reckoning explained in the article on Bais. So that if the proposed bridegroom's maternal grandmother should happen to have belonged to the same section as one of the proposed bride's paternal great-grandmothers, the marriage would be disallowed notwithstanding that the parties themselves belong to different sections. It is obvious, however, that entire conformity with so complicated and far-reaching a scheme of prohibitions requires that genealogies shall be carefully kept up and infringements of the rules jealously watched for by the headmen and panchayats, who in the first instance determine the question whether a particular couple may marry or not. There are indeed officials called paniards or genealogists, who are supposed to act as referees in such matters, but the caste as a whole is on a very low educational level, and it is very doubtful whether the strict letter of these rules is invariably complied with. It will be seen that nearly all the sections of the Magahiya and Pailvar sub-castes are titular, while most of the other sub-castes have local or territorial sections. The Bāhali have no sections, and regulate their marriages by the standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees calculated to seven generations in the descending line. This formula is also used by the other sub-castes as supplementary to their system of exogamy.

Dosas marry their daughters whenever they can afford to do so, but they do not hold the strict view of the spiritual necessity of infant-marriage which is current among the higher castes, and the fact of a girl's marriage... being deferred until she has passed the age of puberty is not deemed to put any special slur on the family to which she belongs. Some Dosáadh, however, hold that an adult bride is not entitled to the full marriage service (biydh), but must be married by the sagai form used at the remarriage of a widow. The marriage ceremony is a somewhat meagre copy of the ritual in vogue among middle-class Hindus. Well-to-do Dosáadh employ Brahmans to officiate as priests; but this practice is not general, and most members of the caste content themselves with getting a Brahman to fix an auspicious day for the event, and to mutter certain formulas (mantras) over the vermilion, the smearing of which on the bride’s forehead constitutes the binding portion of the rite. An infant bride is kept in her parent’s house until she reaches puberty, at the age of twelve or fourteen, when the gaund ceremony is performed, her nails are cut and stained red, and her husband takes her to his own house. Consumption does not take place until after the gaund ceremony. Polygamy is permitted to a limited extent. A man may in no case have more than two wives, and he is not supposed to take a second wife at all unless the first is childless or suffers from an incurable disease. In the Santal Parganas, however, three wives are allowed, and the tendency is to follow the aboriginal usage of unlimited polygamy. A widow may marry again by the sagai form, and it is deemed right, on grounds of domestic convenience, for her to marry her late husband’s younger brother if such a relative survives him. In the event of her marrying an outsider she takes no share in her late husband’s property, and any children she may have had by him remain in the charge of his family. Divorce is permitted by all sub-castes except the Kamár, with the sanction of the panchayat, for adultery and persistent disobedience or ill-temper on the part of the wife. In the Santal Parganas and Palámau a sái leaf is torn in two or a stick broken to symbolise the separation of the couple. Divorced women may marry again by the sagai rite, but they must first give a feast to the members of the caste by way of atonement for their previous misconduct.

Most Dosáadh, if questioned about their religion, will persistently aver that they are orthodox Hindus, and in proof of this allegation will refer to the fact that they employ Brahmans and worship the regular gods. In most districts, indeed, degraded Kanaujia or Maithil Brahmans serve the caste as priests in a somewhat irregular and intermittent fashion, being paid in cash for specific acts of worship and for attendance at marriages. Many Dosáadh, again, belong to the Sri Narayani sect, and some follow the panth, or doctrine of Kabir, Tulsi Dás, Gorakhnath, or Nának. This enthusiasm for religion, however, like the Satnámi movement among the Chamárs of the Central Provinces, appears to be a comparatively recent development, induced in the main by the desire of social advancement and existing side by side with peculiar religious observances, survivals from an earlier animistic form of belief, traces of which may perhaps be discerned in current Hindu mythology. Their tribal deity Ráhu has been transformed by the Brahmans into a Dāitya or Titan, who is supposed to cause eclipses by swallowing the sun and moon. Though placed in the orthodox pantheon as the son of the Danava Viprachitti and Sinhkā, Rāhu has held his ground as the chief deity of the Dōsādhās. To avert diseases, and in fulfilment of vows, sacrifices of animals and the fruits of the earth are offered to him, at which a Dōsādh Bhākat or Chatiyā usually presides. On special occasions a stranger form of worship is resorted to, parallels to which may be found in the rustic cult of the Roman villagers and the votaries of the Phoenician deities. A ladder, made with sides of green bamboos and rungs of sword-blades, is raised in the midst of a pile of burning mango wood, through which the Bhākat walks barefooted and ascends the ladder without injury. Swine of all ages, a ram, wheaten flour, and rice-milk (khīr), are offered up: after which the worshippers partake of a feast and drink enormous quantities of ardent spirits.

The god Ráhu.

Another form of this worship has been described to me by Dōsādhās of Darbhanga and North Bhāgalpur. His worship. On the fourth, the ninth, or the day before the full-moon of the months Aghan, Mágh, Phālgun, or Baisākh, the Dōsādh who has bound himself by a vow to offer the fire sacrifice to Rāhu must build within the day a thatched hut (gahbar) measuring five cubits by four and having the doorway facing east. Here the priest or Bhākat, himself a Dōsādh, who is to officiate at the next day’s ordeal must spend that night, sleeping on the kusa grass with which the floor is strewn. In front of the door of the hut is a bamboo platform about three feet from the ground, and beyond that again is dug a trench six cubits long, a span and a quarter wide, and of the same depth, running east and west. Fire-places are built to the north of the trench, at the point marked d in the plan below. On the next day, being the fifth, the tenth, or the full-moon day of the months mentioned above, the trench is filled with mango wood soaked in ghee, and two earthen vessels of boiling milk are placed close to the platform. The Bhākat bathes himself on the north side of the trench and puts on a new cloth dyed for the occasion with turmeric. He mutters a number of mystic formulae and worships Rāhu on both sides of the trench. The fire is then kindled, and the Bhākat solemnly walks three times round the trench, keeping his right hand always towards it. The end of the third round brings him to the east end of the trench, where he takes by the hand a Brahman retained for this purpose with a fee of two new wrappers (dhotis), and calls upon him to lead the way through the fire. The Brahman then walks along the trench from east to west, followed by the Bhākat. Both are supposed to tread with bare feet on the fire, but I imagine this is for the most part an optical illusion. By the time they start the actual flames have subsided, and the trench is so narrow that very little dexterity would enable a man to walk with his feet on either edge, so as not to touch the smouldering ashes at the bottom. On reaching the west end of the trench the Brahman stirs the milk with his hand to see that it has been properly boiled. Here his part in the ceremony comes to an end. By passing through the fire the Bhākat is believed to have been inspired with the spirit of Ráhu, who has become incarnated in him. Filled with the divine or demoniac afflatus, and also, it may be surmised, excited by drink and ganjá, he mounts the bamboo platform, chants mystic hymns, and distributes to the crowd tulsi leaves, which heal diseases otherwise incurable, and flowers which have the virtue of causing barren women to conceive. The proceedings end with a feast, and religious excitement soon passes into drunken revelry lasting long into the night.

Next in importance to the worship of Ráhu is that of various deified heroes, in honour of whom huts are erected in different parts of the country. At Shorphúr, near Patna, is the shrine of Gaurá or Goráiyá, a Dósdh bandit chief, to which members of all castes resort; the clean making offerings of meal, the unclean sacrificing a swine or several young pigs and pouring out libations of spirit on the ground. Throughout Behar, Salesh or Sálías, said to have been the porter of Bhim Íá, but afterwards a formidable robber in the Morang or Nepal Terai, is invoked; a pig being killed, and rice, ghí, sweatmeats, and spirits offered. In other districts Choár Mal is held in reverence, and a ram sacrificed. In Mirzápur the favoured deity is Bindháchal, the spirit of the Vindhya mountains. In Patna it is either Bandí, Motí Rám, Kárú or Karwá Búr, Mirán, the Pánch Pír, Bháirav, Jagdá Má, Káli, Deví, Patanevarí, or Ketú, the descending node in Hindu astronomy, sometimes represented as the tail of the eclipse-dragon, and credited with causing lunar eclipses; while Ráhu, the ascending node, represented by the head of the dragon, produces a similar phenomenon in the sun. In none of these shrines are there any idols, and the officiating priests are always Dósdh, who minister to the Súdra castes frequenting them. The offerings usually go to the priest or the head of the Dósdh household performing the worship; but fowls sacrificed to Mirán and the Pánch Pír are given to local Muhammadans.

In Eastern Bengal, says Dr. Wise, Sákadvípi Brahmans act as the hereditary purohits of the Dósdh, and fix a favourable day for weddings and the naming of children. To the great indignation of other tribes, these Brahmans assume the aristocratic title of Misra, which properly belongs to the Kanaújía order. The guru, called Gosáin, Faqír, Vaishnava, or simply Sádhu, abstains from all manual labour and from intoxicating drugs. His text-book is the Gyán-ságar, or Sea of Knowledge, believed to have been written by Vishnu himself in his form of Chatur-bhúja, or the four-armed. It inculcates the immaterial nature of god (Nirákára), which is regarded by the Brahmins as a most pernicious heresy. In the Santál Parganas Dhobis and barbers serve the Dosádh as priests.

Dosádh usually burn, but occasionally bury, their dead and perform a śrāddh, more or less of the orthodox pattern, on the eleventh day after death. The female Dosádh is unclean for six days after childbirth. On the seventh day she bathes, but is not permitted to touch the household utensils till the twelfth day, when a feast (bárahi) is given and she becomes ceremonially clean.

The social rank of Dosádh is very low. No respectable caste will eat with them, while they themselves, besides eating pork, tortoises, fowls, and field-rats, and indulging freely in strong drink, will take food from any class of Hindus except the Dhobi and the specially unclean castes of Dom and Chamar. Some of them even keep pigs and cure pork. Their characteristic occupation is to serve as watchmen (chaukidárs), and in this capacity they afford an excellent illustration of the Platonic doctrine ὅτου τις ἄρα δεῦτος φύλαξ, τούτου καὶ φῶς δεῦτος,¹ for they rank among the most persistent criminals known to the Indian police. We find them also as village messengers (gorait), grooms, elephant-drivers, grass and wood-cutters, pankhá coolies, and porters. They bear a high character as carriers, and are popularly believed to repress their criminal instincts when formally entrusted with goods in that capacity. In South Bhagalpur the occupation of a groom is considered degrading, and a Dosádh who takes service in that capacity is expelled from the caste. This seems to be a purely local practice. In Western Bengal and Behar Dosádh occasionally work as cooks and grooms for Europeans. Some of the chaukidárs and gorait hold small allotments of land rent-free in lieu of the services rendered by them to the village,² but generally speaking Dosádh hold a low place in the agricultural system. Their improvidence and their dissolute habits hinder them from rising above the grade of occupancy raiyat, and a very large proportion of them are merely tenants-at-will or landless day-labourers. During the Muhammadan rule in Bengal, says Dr. Wise, Dosádh and Báhalias served in the army, and when Ali Vardi Khán was Nawáb Názim the native historians stigmatised their licentious conduct as a disgrace to the Government. From the days of William Hamilton it has been generally believed that in the early period of our military history "Bengali sepoys almost exclusively filled several of our battalions, and distinguished themselves as brave and active soldiers;" but, as is pointed out by Mr. Shore, for years before the battle of Plassey the troops in Bengal were chiefly composed of recruits enlisted in Hindustan. According to Mr. Reade, most of the sepoys who served under Lord Clive were Dosádh, who of course cannot be regarded as Bengalis in the ordinary sense of the word. It must be remembered, however, that a few generations ago the ² Buchanan, ii, 235, says that in Bhagalpur the Dosádh receives from two to ten bigahas of land rent-free, with ½ part, or a quarter of a seer per maund, of the rent in grain, all these charges being paid by the landlord.

The word Bengal was used in a more extended and less accurate sense than is now the case, and it is quite likely that when Hamilton wrote of Bengali sepoys he merely meant to distinguish Natives of Hindustan from the Madras sepoys (see article Telinga), who were largely employed in our early campaigns in Bengal.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Dosadh in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>696</td>
<td>599</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>97</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>Maniwallah</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>144</td>
<td>1,418</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>134</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>479</td>
<td>396</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>26,064</td>
<td>140,451</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>1,172</td>
<td>1,324</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>26,941</td>
<td>168,984</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C-Murgha</td>
<td>5,885</td>
<td>5,923</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>77,074</td>
<td>90,940</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>1,632</td>
<td>600</td>
<td>Tarut { Tribut States }</td>
<td>256,136</td>
<td>179,755</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kusma</td>
<td>15</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>49</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>73,998</td>
<td>79,090</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Moresbadab</td>
<td>2,436</td>
<td>2,564</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>70,904</td>
<td>82,807</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>1,130</td>
<td>5,923</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>99,992</td>
<td>111,331</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajahshyra</td>
<td>186</td>
<td>936</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>87,127</td>
<td>72,418</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ramgarh</td>
<td>501</td>
<td>238</td>
<td>Purunah</td>
<td>57,374</td>
<td>31,082</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bansa</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>80</td>
<td>Maleah</td>
<td>2,585</td>
<td>2,846</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Banbangal</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>514</td>
<td>Santpur Pargana</td>
<td>5,307</td>
<td>11,033</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>66</td>
<td>1,430</td>
<td>Hararibach</td>
<td>38,333</td>
<td>20,778</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jhalipoor</td>
<td>145</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>25,333</td>
<td>34,998</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kush Behar</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>177</td>
<td>Singibhem</td>
<td>844</td>
<td>410</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>304</td>
<td>Membhum</td>
<td>943</td>
<td>1,074</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>4,030</td>
<td>2,786</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Dosi is a title of Oswál Baniyas.

Doside, a sub-group of the Hele Kaibarttas in Central Bengal.

Dotiyál, a thar or section of Nepál Brahmons.

Dowalbandhi, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Drábirí, Drávirí, a territorial division of the Pancha Drávira Brahmons who live in the south of the Vindhya range, a country of the Dravidian or Tamil language.

Duarbandha, a sub-caste of Sunris in Maldah.

Duërse, a sub-caste of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Dubaitahiá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Dube or Dobe, a title of Gauras, Sáraswat, and Kanaújí Brahmons, and of Bábhans in Behar; a title of the Brahmans who officiate as priests for lower castes in Bengal.

Dubhiár, Dobihár, a mul or section of the Kanaújí sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Dub Ság, a grass, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Dudháiá or Mághayá, a sub-caste of Dhamúns in Behar.

Dudhiá, a section of Mauliks in Western Bengal.

Dudhakotóra, a mul or section of the Ajodhiabasi sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Dud-Kaur, a sub-tribe of Kaurs in Chota Nagpur.

Dudháiá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Province.

Dudháíí, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.
DUDHPURIE. Duran G.

Dudhpuriet, a mui or section of the Naomulié or Majraut sub-caste of Goalés in Behar.

Dudhraj, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Dudhwár or Dojwár, a sub-caste of Dhánukas in Behar who are said never to castrate calves.

Dud-Kharié, a sub-caste of Kharias in Chota Nagpur.

Dudul, a kind of bird, a totemistic sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Dugar, a sect of Desnámi Sannyásis.

Dugra, a variant for Doglá or Dogra, q.v.

Dugiár, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Dukhcháki, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Dulál, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Duliá, a sub-caste of Bágdis in Bengal, who are fishermen, palki-bearers, and general labourers.

Durnala Goárá, a sub-caste of Goalés in Orissa.

Durn, a sub-caste of Sutra dhars in Noakháli.

Durnániá, a section of Goalés in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Durn, a section of Goalés in Behar.

Durnariár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Dumroliá, a section of Goalés in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Dumján, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Dumráhar, a section of Báis Sonás in Behar.

Dumráit, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Dumriá, a mui or section of the Tinmulié Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Dumriá, Dumurían, Dumriár, Dumgi, a totemistic section or sept of Kurmis, Lohars, Mundas, and Mahis in Chota Nagpur, the members of which will not eat the wild fig (dumur).

Dumriába, a totemistic sept of Juáugs in the Tributary States of Orissa, probably a variant of Dumriá, and having reference to the wild fig.

Dundoar, an owl, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Dundu, a kind of eel, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Dundwár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Dungdung, a river-fish, a sept of Mundas and Kharías in Chota Nagpur.

Dungiá, a sub-tribe of Dhimáls in the Darjiling Terai.

Dungmái, a sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Duntakarieh, a mui of the Bharadvája section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Dunyá, a sept of the Tung-jainya sub-tribe of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Dura, a fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Durál, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Durang, a section of Kharías in Chota Nagpur.
Durbichá, a thar or sept of Sunuwars in Darjiling.

Durgbansi, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Durgu, a section of the Kochh-Mandai in Dacca.

Durhar, a string-maker in Hazaribagh. Some of them bear the title of Gosain.

Durihár, a religious group of Jugis.

Durjea, see Darjea.

Duryodhan, a title of Sunris in Bengal.

Dusád, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Dusre, a group of the Sribástab sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.

Dut, a title of Bangaja Káyasths.

Dvádas, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Dvija, a synonym for Brahman.

Dwijáti, Díjáti, “twice-born,” a title of Brahmans, Kshatriyas, and Vaisyas in the scheme of castes attributed to the mythical Manu. In the Census papers the term seems to have been used pedantically by Brahmans or Rajputs who wished to glorify themselves.
ECHAGHATU.

Echaghatu, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Eh-Ar, a sept of the Chandrabansi Rajputs in Behar.

Ekádas, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal and Orissa; a section of the Rauniyár sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Ekádasí, a functional group of Jugis in Bengal.

Ekauná, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs and of Awadhiá Hajáms in Behar.

Ekáhre-Orá, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Ekahre-Ruchaul, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Ekahre-Kanhaulí, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Ekahre-Sagrám, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Karé-Torne, a mul of the Bharadwáj section of Maithil Brahmanas in Behar.

Ekka, tortoise, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Ekpatía, a sub-caste of Maya-rás in Eastern Bengal.

Eksariá, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Ekside, a sub-group of the Hele Kaibartta in Central Bengal.

Emboro, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Erengá-Khariá, a sub-caste of Khariás in Chota Nagpur.

Ergat, a kind of mouse, supposed to live in plum bushes, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ergo, rat, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.
Fadung, a sept of Tipperahs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Fakir, a title of the Hárīta section of Utkal Brahmans in Orissa.

Fakir, an Arabic word, properly denoting a Mahomedan religious mendicant, but vaguely used to denote beggars of all kinds. Of fakirs in the strict sense of the word, the following classes are enumerated by Wilson:

1. The Kádáriá or Bánáwá, who profess to be the spiritual descendants of Saiad Abdul-Kádár Jiláni, of Bagdad. 2. The Chishtiá, followers of Banda-nawáz, whose shrine is at Kalbarga; they are usually Shias. 3. Shútáriá, descendants of Abdul-shutár-i-nák. 4. Tabkátiá, or Madáriá, followers of Sháh Madár; many of these are jugglers, and bear or monkey-leaders. 5. Ma-lang, descended from Jaman Jati, one of Shah Madár's disciples. 6. Rafáí, or Gurz-már, descended from Saiad Ahmed Kabir Rafáí, who appear to beat, cut, and wound themselves without suffering inconvenience, and who, in the belief of the faithful, can cut off their own heads and put them on again. 7. Jaláliá, followers of Saiad Jalá-l-ud-din Bokhári. 8. Sohágíá, from Músá Sohág, who dress like women, wear female ornaments, play upon musical instruments, and sing and dance. 9. Naksh-bandíá, followers of Bahá-ud-din, of Nakshband, distinguished by begging at night and carrying a lighted lamp. 10. Báwá piárí fakiráns, who dress in white. There are other distinctions; and at the Muharram a number of the lower classes assume the character and garb of fakirs, of different ridiculous personations, for the amusement of the populace and the collection of contributions."

Fáluda-wálá, a maker of sherbets and syrups. In Behar the Fáluda-wálá often opens a tea shop during the cold weather.

Fanigá, grasshopper, a totemistic sept of Parhaiyas in Chota Nagpur.

Farakhábádi, a sub-caste of Gareris in Behar.

Fariansa, a sept of the Tungjainya sub-tribe of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Farrásh, Farásh, a servant whose business it is to spread and sweep mats, carpets, etc.

Fatehpuri, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Fatehsing, a sub-caste of Telis in Murshedabad.

Faujdár, a title conferred by the local Rájás of Western Bengal on certain families who were engaged in police duties. The word also denotes the proselytizing officials of the Vaishava sects.

Fenga, a section of Máls in Bankura.

Feringi, a title of the Háríta section of Utkal Brahmans in Orissa.
Gábag, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Gách, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gachai, a sept of Parhaiyas in Chota Nagpur.

Gáchhá or Ghaná, a sub-caste of Talis in Bengal from Gáchhu, a designation of persons who own gāchh or oil mills and sugarcane mills.

Gáchkátá, a wood-cutter, a title of Seulis who cut down date-trees for their juice.

Gadahá, a sub-caste of Doms in Behar who are breeders of donkeys; a section of the Banodi and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Gadhpurná, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Gadáli, Gadál, a section of Kámis; a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gadayá, a section of Saroagis in Behar.

Gadariyá, a synonym for Gareri.

Gádasari, a sub-caste of Kurmíss in Orissa.

Gáddi, a class of Mahomedan herdmen in Behar.

Gáddi, Ghosi, or Ghosin, a sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Gadháriá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Gadhayá, a sub-caste of Dhobíss in Behar who keep donkeys; a title of Beldárs.
Gaharwár, a sept of Suraj-bansí Rajputs and of the Rautár sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Gahatráj, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Gahlaut, a sept of the Chandrabansí division of Rajputs in Behar.

Gah-oh, a rwi or sept of Dejong Lhors, whose ancestor had emigrated from Bhotan and the members of which now work as blacksmiths.

Gahuí, a small caste of Hindu traders found in Hazaribagh.

Gahunágáoná, a mül or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwais in Behar.

Gái, cow, a totemistic sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Gaibling, a sept of Tipperahs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Gaiduhá, a sub-caste of Pásis in Behar.

Gaighatiá, a section of Bháts in Behar.

Gaigmwár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gaím, a section of Maghaiyá Kumbárs in Behar.

Gaím, a group of Maghaiyá Telís in Behar.

Gaín, a sept of Rajputs and a pangat or section of Bánsphor Doms and of Sunris in Behar; a class of Mahomedan singers; a low Nepali caste of musicians.

Gaín or Grámín, literally ‘belonging to a village,’ a term signifying a title of Rádhí and Bándrasí Brahmans in Bengal, whose ancestors were given villages by Rájá Adisura when they were brought from Kanaúj to perform ceremonies at his request.

Gaíntwar, a sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Gaíraha Pipli, a thár or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Gaítháhá, a section of Bhojpuriá Halwáís in Behar.

Gaítháula, a thár or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Gajamer, a thár or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gajbania, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Gajkésar, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gajmer, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Gajniyál, a thár or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Galán, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Gálá-Tánti, a sub-caste of Tántis in Orissa.

Gamaiyá, Pargáná Kharakpur, a dík or local section of the Maghaiyá sub-caste of Kóris in Bhágalpur.

Gambhariá, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Gámel, a section of the Biváhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Gán, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangajá Káyásthás in Bengal.

Gana, a hypergamous division of Tiyars in Behar.

Ganda, a sub-caste of Páns in Chota Nagpur.
GANDA.

Ganda, Gandæk, a title of Dakshin-Ráhi and Bangaja Kayasths in Bengal.

Gandár, Gandá, a title of Goálás in Behar.

Gandhabanik, Gandhabanid, Putuli, the spice-selling, druggist, and grocer caste of Bengal Proper. They claim to be a branch of the Aryan Vaisyas, and trace their descent from Chandra Bhava, commonly called Chánd Saudégar, "an accomplished man, the son of Kotis-Vára, the lord of crores," and Sáha Rájá of Ujjain, mentioned in the Padma Purána. Although this ancient lineage is assumed, the caste no longer wear the Bráhmanical thread; their marriage ritual does not include Kusandiká; and, instead of mourning like the Agarwála Baniyés for thirteen days, they mourn, like pure Súdras, for thirty. A modern compiler of caste genealogies gives them a Baidya father and a Rajput mother, a pratilomaj pedigree wholly fatal to their claim to be Vaisyas. Another story of their origin is current. Kubja, the hunch-backed slave girl of Rájá Kansa, was carrying home spices and sandal wood when Krishna first met her. The son born of their subsequent liaison was naturally the first spice-seller and the father of all Gandhabaniks. A third tradition tells how Siva, being in need of spices for his marriage with Durga, created the first of the Desá Gandhabanik from his forehead, the Sankha from his arm-pit, the Aut from his navel, and the Chhatris from his foot, and sent them out to the four quarters of the globe to fetch what he required. The Chhatris, who went to the east, got back first. All four were then appointed to sell spices to men.

The Gandhabaniks are divided into four sub-castes—Aut-Ásrám, Chhattris-Ásrám, Desá-Ásrám, Sankha-Ásrám. In Dacca, according to Dr. Wise, the three last intermarry and eat together, but this appears not to be the case in Central Bengal. The sections shown in Appendix I are Brahmancial, with the single exception of the one called Ráš-rishi, which I am unable to trace or account for. The prohibited degrees are the same as among the Kayasths.

Gandhabaniks marry their daughters as infants, and receive a bride-price (pan) varying according to the social status of the two families concerned. Thus the Gandhabaniks of Bikrampur in Dacca receive a higher price for their daughters and pay a lower price for their wives than members of families whose reputation stands less high for purity of lineage and propriety of ceremonial observances. The marriage ceremony is of the orthodox type. In Dacca city, says Dr. Wise, the Gandhabanik caste has six powerful dais, or unions; the Dalpatis, or headmen, being persons of great respectability. In one of the dais a curious marriage custom, said to have been observed by their forefathers when they first entered Bengal, is still preserved. The bridegroom climbs a champá-tree (Michelia champaca) and sits there while the bride is carried round on a stool seven times. Should no tree be available, a champá log, placed beneath a canopy or a platform made of champá wood planks, is substituted and ornamented with gilt flowers resembling the real champá blossoms. The other dâta, who follow the usual Sudra ritual, associate with this one in private, but not in public. In all cases the bridal dress is made of yellow silk (chehti) with a red striped border, and the bride wears hers for ten days after marriage.

Polygamy is permitted to the extent that a man may take a second wife if he has no children by the first. Widows are not allowed to marry again, nor is divorce recognised. A woman convicted of unchastity is simply turned out of the caste and ceases to be a member of respectable Hindu society. Her husband burns her in effigy, and performs for her a mimetic śrāddha as if she were actually dead.

In matters of religion the Gandhabaniks conform entirely to the orthodox forms of Hinduism prevalent in Bengal Proper. The large majority of them are Vaishnavas, a few Saktas, and still fewer Saivas. Their patron goddess is Gandheswari, 'our lady of perfume,' a form of Durgá, in whose honour they hold a special service on the full moon of Baisakh (April–May), arranging in a pyramidal form their weights, scales, drugs, and account-books, and placing in front a goblet daubed over with red lead. Flowers, fruit, rice, sweetmeats, and perfumery, are offered, and the caste Brahman repeats several invocations soliciting the favour of the goddess during the ensuing year. These Brahmins, it may be mentioned, are treated on terms of equality by other members of the sacred order, except those who decline to officiate as priests for even the most respectable Sudras.

According to Dr. Wise, the Gandhabanik is a spice-seller, or "épicier," as well as a druggist. He will not sell rice, vegetables, salt, oil, or spirits, but he keeps almost every other grocery in stock. He is often called by the Hindi term Pansari, which signifies a dealer in groceries, spices, and herbs. The comparatively high position of Gandhabaniks among Sudra castes is owing to the circumstance that the sandal-wood and spices, essential for Hindu religious rites, can only be procured at their shops. It may be surmised, however, that their admission into the ranks of the Nava-Sékha is of comparatively recent date, as their name does not appear in the passage of Parásara usually quoted as the standard authority for the composition of that group.

The Gandhabanik, says Dr. Wise, obtains his drugs and spices direct from Calcutta, or from the place where they are produced, and buys quinine, iodide of potassium, and sarsaparilla from English druggists. He also sells tin, lead, pewter, copper, and iron, and retails, if licensed, saltpetre, sulphur, and gunpowder, as well as chemicals used by pyrotechnists, and dispenses medicines ordered by Kabirajás. Although Gandhabaniks possess no pharmacopoeia, and are ignorant of chemistry, they display wonderful sharpness in distinguishing salts and minerals. Every Gandhabanik has the reputation of being a doctor, and, like the druggists of Europe, he is often consulted and prescribes for trifling ailments. Drugs at the present day are sold by apothecary's weight, other articles by the bazar weight of eighty sica rupees to a ser. Kabirajas, however, still use the old Hindu weights—pala, ratii, mahdi, and jau. Boys able to read and write Bengali are apprenticed to a Gandhabanik, who make them familiar with the appearance, names, and prices of drugs, of which, it is said, a genuine Pansari's shop may contain three hundred and sixty kinds. Most of these go to form the different kinds of pdt, or alternative medicine, greatly relied on in Hindu therapeutics. The Gandhabanik is expected to know the proper ingredients in each pdt, as well as the proper quantity of each. In the preparation of pills goat's milk, or lime-juice and water, are used, but by some druggists the juice of the Ghi-Kuwar (Aloe perfoliata) is preferred.
GANDHABANIK.

The Gandhabanik retails charas, bhang, opium, and ganja, but some have scruples about selling the last, and employ a Mahomedan servant to do so. Many shops for the sale of ganja, however, are leased by members of this caste, who pay a Sunri, or a Mahomedan, to manage them.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Gandhabaniks in Bengal in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>32,106</td>
<td>29,160</td>
<td>Deccas</td>
<td>6,834</td>
<td>4,585</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>6,016</td>
<td>18,780</td>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>4,480</td>
<td>4,480</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>10,162</td>
<td>13,657</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>3,300</td>
<td>3,300</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>10,140</td>
<td>10,586</td>
<td>Maimansingh</td>
<td>2,338</td>
<td>5,938</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazri</td>
<td>6,385</td>
<td>7,897</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>1,764</td>
<td>1,764</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hwrah</td>
<td>5,583</td>
<td>5,642</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>5,096</td>
<td>5,096</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>94-Parganas</td>
<td>5,383</td>
<td>12,400</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>1,176</td>
<td>4,090</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>8,516</td>
<td>10,581</td>
<td>Holi Tracts</td>
<td>1,176</td>
<td>1,176</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>2,169</td>
<td>2,169</td>
<td>Malda</td>
<td>684</td>
<td>2,017</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>1,167</td>
<td>7,211</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>1,456</td>
<td>1,456</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>1,106</td>
<td>9,972</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>806</td>
<td>5,408</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gomia</td>
<td>1,500</td>
<td>1,500</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>5,506</td>
<td>5,506</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Banshye</td>
<td>880</td>
<td>1,421</td>
<td>Belur</td>
<td>4,288</td>
<td>4,288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kopilpur</td>
<td>720</td>
<td>1,178</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>948</td>
<td>6,404</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>516</td>
<td>902</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>3,006</td>
<td>3,006</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purna</td>
<td>2,313</td>
<td>5,531</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>5,938</td>
<td>5,938</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>72</td>
<td>Singabhumi</td>
<td>1,196</td>
<td>1,196</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>360</td>
<td>299</td>
<td>Manchbhum</td>
<td>948</td>
<td>948</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,411</td>
<td>161</td>
<td>.......</td>
<td>.......</td>
<td>.......</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Gandhabaniya, a synonym for Gandhabanik.

Gandhar, a small caste said by some to be connected with Mallas, who sing and play on musical instruments.

Gandharva, a the or sept of Manglers in Darjiling.

Gandhar, Gandhar, the caste which supplies Hindu dancing-girls, singers, and prostitutes. Mr. Nesfield classes them with the Kanchan.

Gandhauria, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gandhi, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Gandhi, Gandhari, a perfumer or dealer in scent, an occupation followed by both Hindus and Mahomedans.

Gandura, a big bird, a totemic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.
Ganesh, a subdivision of the Jugi caste, chiefly employed in agriculture, a title of potters in Nepal.

Ganesiá, a section of Ayodhiabási Sonárs in Behar.

Ganesrishi, a section of Mayarás in Bengal.

Ganet, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Gangá, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Gangábhandhu, a kind of religious mendicant, occasionally met with in Behar and the North-Western Provinces.

Gangábási, 'dwellers on the Ganges,' a title of those Doms who take clothes and ornaments from dead bodies and usually live close to the funeral places. They are also called Murdáfarás.

Gangábisaiyi, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Gangagrámi, a gání of the Kásyapa gotra of Bándrana Brahmans in Bengal.

Gangotá, Gangautá, a cultivating, landholding, and labouring caste of Behar. Many of them live on the banks of the Ganges, and this is said to be the origin of the name. Their customs give no clue to their descent, unless we may infer non-Aryan affinities from the fact that in some parts of the country they are known to eat pork and field-rats. Gangotás are divided into two sub-castes—Jethkar and Maghaya—and have two sections—Gangájhi and Jáhnaví. A man may not marry a woman of his own section, nor a woman who comes within the formula chachera, mamera, etc., calculated to four generations in the descending line. He may not marry two sisters at the same time, but may marry his deceased wife's younger sister.

Gangotás profess to marry their daughters as infants, but adult marriage is by no means unknown among the poorer classes. The ceremony is a meagre version of the standard ritual, sindurádan being deemed the essential and binding portion. Polygamy is permitted in the sense that a man may take a second wife with the consent of his first wife if the latter is barren or suffers from an incurable disease. A widow may marry again, but she is expected to marry her deceased husband’s younger brother if there is one. Divorce is not recognised.

The religion of the caste presents no features of special interest. The small-pox goddess, Jagadambé, is worshipped twice or three times a month with offerings of husked rice and incense. At weddings and on occasions of sickness Bhagavati is propitiated with kids, rice, ghee, tulsi leaves, and vermillion. The eatable portions of the sacrifice are consumed by the members of the household. Brahmans who serve the Gangotás are said to incur no degradation by doing so.

Gangotá’s rank with Kurmis and Koiris, and Brahmans will take water from their hands. In Bhagalpur they eat pork, but at the same time profess to abstain from fermented and spirituous liquors.

In Monghyr, on the other hand, their practice in the matter of diet is reported to be the same as that of respectable Hindus of similar social position. Agriculture is their sole occupation. A few have risen to be small zamindars, but the bulk of the caste are occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats and landless day-labourers paid in cash or kind.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Gangotás in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ghya</td>
<td>46</td>
<td></td>
<td>Purana</td>
<td>35,763</td>
<td>18,702</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>273</td>
<td></td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td></td>
<td>640</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tribut</td>
<td>9</td>
<td></td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td></td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>74</td>
<td></td>
<td>Hararbeag</td>
<td></td>
<td>500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>55</td>
<td></td>
<td>Lohardagá</td>
<td></td>
<td>336</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>8,707</td>
<td>8,113</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Gangotri, a sub-caste of Brahmans in Behar.

Gangthaiyá, a mūl or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goālás in Behar.

Gangtiáit, a kul or section of Bāhans in Behar.

Ganguli, a gāīn of the Sābarna gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Gangulwär-Sakuri, a mūl of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Gangulwär-Dumra, a mūl of the Sāndil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Gangye-pá, dwelling behind a hill, a mūl or sept of Dejong Lhoria, the members of which form the lowest class of Bhotias.

Ganhwariá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Ganjhu, Gaunju or Gonjhu, a sub-caste of Surnis in Behar; a title of Binjhiás, Gonde, Khandáie Kharwár, Musahár, Rástwár, Rautiá, and Parhaiyás in Chota Nagpur.

Ganjhu Baiswär, members of the Kharwar caste who are worshippers of Vishnu.
Ganjwär, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar who deal in liquor.

Ganrar, a boating, fishing and trading caste of Eastern Bengal, identified by M. Vivien de St. Martin with the Gangarīdae of Pliny and Ptolemy. They claim to be descended from Madhesia Kándús, whose ancestors were brought to Dacca five generations ago by the Muhammadan Government from Súrya-garhī in Bhaqalpur to act as rowers on board the imperial dispatch boats. The caste is most numerous in Dacca, but they are also met with in Silhet, Tipperah, and Maimansing, working as cultivators. Buchanan mentions that the Ganrar of Rangpur originally came from Dacca, two hundred families being in his time domiciled along the banks of the Brahmaputra.

In former times the Ganrar had the reputation of being the bravest of all boatmen, and the river dákāits never dared to attack boats manned by them. Now-a-days they are great traders, carrying in their large cargo-boats, called Patiūr, rice, cotton, and linseed to Calcutta, Bhagwéngolah, and other centres of trade. They generally do business on their own account, and being honest and straightforward, obtain advances of money on favourable terms from the bankers.

Ganrārs use the three-pronged harpoon (tena) with great dexterity to kill alligators and Gangetic porpoises, a float being attached to the weapon with a rope. Porpoise oil is in great repute for burning, and as an embrocation for rheumatism. It usually sells for three to five rupees a man. Turtles are frequently harpooned for food, and turtle eggs are deemed a great delicacy. Ganrārs work at almost any trade, but in Dacca they will not take to cultivating the soil. The women are principally employed in parching grain and selling it in bāzāra.

They all belong to one gotra, the Aliman, and the purohit is a Patit Brāhman. By religion the caste is mainly Vaishnava, but deities unknown to the Brāhmancial Pantheon are also worshipped. Like most of the low castes, the Ganrar set afloat the Berā in honour of Khwájah Khizr, and pay special adoration to Sat Nárayana. On the last day of Srāvan they sacrifice a turtle to Manasā Devi, the goddess of snakes, and make offerings in the month of Paus to Bura-Buri. The Ganrārs of Dacca, through Brāhmancial influence, have relinquished the worship of Khala-Kumari, who is regarded by the Ganrārs of Rangpur as the Naid of the river. This worship, probably like that of Bura-Buri, a survival of an earlier animistic faith, is only found in outlying districts, where Hinduism has imperfectly established its sway.

Ganrārs rarely eat flesh, but they freely indulge in spirits, and often in ganja. At the present day they marry their daughters as infants, and, unlike the Kándus, from whom they profess to be descended, forbid widows to marry again. Divorce is not recognised.
GANROL.

Gánrol, a section of the Sát-muliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Gánten, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Ganwádr (abbreviation of gáon-war), a villager, as opposed to an inhabitant of a town: hence, an illiterate and stupid person.

Gántítá, headman of a gaon or village; a title of Bhuiya feudatories in Gangpur and Bonai.

Gapraí, a section of the Am-ashta Káyasths in Behar.

Gárá, a section of Sunris in Behar.

Garabing, a big river-snake, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Garáét, a section of the Játhot division of the Parbatti-Kurin sub-caste of Gónris in Behar.

Garahía, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Garé, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Garai, a section of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Garai or Gorai, a title of Kalus or Telis in Western Bengal, generally adopted by wealthy Kulin members of the caste.

Garain, a section of Kurmis and Sunris in Behar.

Gárál, a low sub-caste of Chandás who prepare chirá or parched rice.

Garaur, a sept of Goálás in Chota Nagpur.

Garbáriá, a section of Lohárs in Behar.

Garbetá, a sub-caste of Káibarttas in Behar.

Garbháit, Gorváit, or Sághár, a sub-caste of Kewats in Behar.

Gáre, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Garri, Gadariya, Bhendrih, the shepherd, goatherd, and blanket-weaver caste of Behar. Gareris appear to have no traditions, and cannot give any account of their origin beyond the vague statement that they came 'from the west.' It is possible that they may be an offshoot from the Goélés, differentiated by keeping sheep and taking to the comparatively degraded occupation of weaving, but I can offer no evidence in support of this conjecture, except the rather remarkable fact that Gareris will take both boiled rice (kahti) and sweetmeats, etc. (pakk), from members of the Goálá caste.

The Gareris of Behar are divided into four sub-castes—Dhengar, Farakhábádi, Gangájali, and Nikhar—of whom the Dhengar have the exogamous sections shown in the Appendix. The other sub-castes appear to regulate their marriages by the standard formula mamerá, chacherá, etc., calculated to six generations in the descending line.

Marriage. The practice of infant-marriage is firmly established among the Gareri. Tilak, consisting of a loin-cloth (dhoti), some chupattis, and two or three rupees, is paid to the bridegroom on an auspicious day by the parents of the bride. The marriage ceremony is of the standard type. Polygamy is permitted to the extent that a man may marry a second wife if his first wife is barren. A widow may marry again by the sagai form. It is considered right for her to marry her late husband’s younger brother if there is one, but she is not positively obliged to do so. Some say that divorce is not recognised. If a woman has an intrigue with a man of another caste, she is excommunicated and turned adrift, but indiscretions within the brotherhood admit of being atoned for by various modes of penalty awarded by the headman (manjan) and panchayat, and chiefly by a feast to the members of the caste. Others hold that divorce may be had on the oath of the husband, and that a divorced woman may marry again by sagai.

In respect of religious and ceremonial observances the Gareris generally conform to the usages of the Vaishnava sect, and comparatively few Saivas are found among them. Many are followers of Daryá Dás, a Gareri, who founded a corrupt Vaishnava sect distinguished by abstinence from fish, flesh, and spirits. His disciples do not worship him as a deity, but simply regard him as their guru or spiritual guide. The purohits of the caste are Kanaujia, or sometimes Jyoshi Brahmans; while Bairági or Dasmáni ascetics serve them as gurus. Their household worship, in which priests take no part, is addressed to Bandi, Goraiya, Dharam Ráj, Narsingh, the Páanch Pir, and Káli, to whom the males of the family offer cakes, rice boiled in milk, sweetmeats, and plantains on the 30th Sráwan. The offerings are eaten afterwards by the members of the family and the desuri relations who can claim to participate in domestic worship. When a flock of sheep is sold, the Gareri keeps back a ram; and having assembled his brethren, sacrifices it to Banjári, after which its flesh is eaten by those who follow the Saiva ritual.

The large majority of the caste find employment as shepherds, goatherds, or blanket-weavers, and comparatively few have taken to cultivation. Mr. Hoey gives the following account of the manner in which their characteristic occupation is carried on in the neighbourhood of Lucknow:

“One Gareri will attend a flock of 100 sheep and goats, and is at no expense for fodder. He drives them out to graze on wild pasture. Goats and sheep drop young twice a year, and as many as four kids or lambs at a birth are not unusual. In a flock of one hundred sheep and goats let there be 60 sheep. It is the custom to cut the wool three times in the year,—after the cold weather, the

---

1 Monograph on Trade and Manufactures in Northern India, by W. Hoey, Bengal Civil Service, p. 106. This valuable work is based on notes collected by Mr. Hoey while engaged in revising the assessments of license-tax in Lucknow city during 1879 and 1880—a fact which accounts for the minute attention paid to the profits of particular trades.
hot weather, and the rains. The idiom for shearing is pairi karna.
The average is a quarter of a seer of wool at each pairi. Thus 60 sheep will yield 1 maund 5 seers of wool in a year. If the wool is sold, it will fetch about one rupee per 3 seers. But Gareris frequently weave their wool into small blankets (kamli) of 1½ seers each, which sell for one rupee each. But in this case they are at a cost of ⅛ anna per kamli paid to a behna for carding the wool. Thus from 60 sheep the Gareri may have either 45 seers of wool, value Rs. 15, or 30 kamlis, to sell at Rs. 30. In the latter case he pays the behna Re. 1-6-6 and clears Rs. 28-9-6. The latter method of disposing of the wool is chosen by Gareris who have grown sons and daughters, or wives without children, who weave.

"The lowest estimate which any Gareri has given me of the lambs dropped by 60 sheep in one year is 90. These sell as lambs for 8 annas each, as one-year olds for from Re. 1 to Re. 1-8, and as two-year olds for Rs. 2. This is an average computation.

"Gareris milk ewes, but draw never more than ½ seer per diem, for they have regard to the value of the lambs. Sheep's milk is sold to Halwais at 1 anna per seer to make khud. There will always be 12 sheep in 60 in milk, and they thus bring 3 annas per diem by milk.

"Sheep's manure is sold to Dhobis for washing, and Muraos purchase it as a high-class manure for defasli fields. It sells at Re. 1 per 5 maunds. The pen where 60 sheep are kept at night will, when swept in the morning, give 10 seers.

"Now take the 40 goats in the mixed flock of 100 sheep and goats. The estimate of kids from these is set at 90 in the year, and their milk 12 seers per diem. Goat's milk sells at 1 anna per seer.
Kids are sold in the first year at from 12 annas to Re. 1 each, and in the second year from Rs. 2 to Rs. 3 (if females) and Rs. 4 (if males). Goats when in milk are given bhush, but 4 annas at most per diem is spent on 40.

"Thus a flock of 100 sheep and goats in the proportion taken above is worth Rs. 405 per annum at the lowest computation—the sheep Rs. 157-8, the goats Rs. 247-8—after paying all expenses."

According to Dr. Wise, the Gareri is reckoned higher in rank than the Ahir, and equal to the Majroti and Krishnaut Goalés, with whom, as has been mentioned above, Gareris will eat both kachi and pakki food and will smoke in the same hookah. It is not clear, however, that this intercourse is reciprocal, and that the Goalás will accept food on the same terms from a Gareri, while the fact that Gareris make wethers themselves must necessarily involve some measure of social degradation. In Behar and Bengal this caste is generally reckoned a clean one, from whose members a Brahman can take water; but in Puraniya, says Buchanan, it is impure. The Garerí is often found working as a domestic servant, refusing, however, to carry bathing-water for his master or to rinse his body-clothes after bathing. He cannot, without incurring expulsion, serve as a shepherd with any but Gareri masters. He may, however, take household service with any class, even with Christians.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Gareris in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>116</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>10,144</td>
<td>9,718</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>54</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>14,881</td>
<td>12,633</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>33</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>13,150</td>
<td>12,655</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mymensingh</td>
<td>230</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>Tirhut (Darbhanga)</td>
<td>10,855</td>
<td>10,481</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>50</td>
<td></td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>7,070</td>
<td>9,884</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>217</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>8,750</td>
<td>6,965</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munsabad</td>
<td>294</td>
<td>622</td>
<td>Moneypur</td>
<td>4,471</td>
<td>6,069</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>16</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>4,118</td>
<td>7,946</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kangra</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td>Furlah</td>
<td>2,855</td>
<td>4,372</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>13</td>
<td></td>
<td>Malah</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>310</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pilibhit</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>122</td>
<td>630</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnea</td>
<td></td>
<td>37</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>125</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td></td>
<td>11</td>
<td>Purba</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>935</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td></td>
<td>23</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>8,124</td>
<td>6,766</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td></td>
<td>9</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>287</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bardwadipur</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainamansingh</td>
<td>3</td>
<td></td>
<td>Nandnhim</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>522</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Garbansi, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gargari, a gáin of the Sándilya gotra of Ráhí Brahmanas in Bengal.

Garbharsi, an eponymous sept of Savars; a section of Nápits and Tántis in Bengal.

Garhatiá, a sept of Kumhars in Chota Nagpur.

Garhbiyar, a section of the Karan sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.

Garhi, synonym for Gareri, q.v.

Garhiá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Garhnáik or Singha, leader or lion of the fort, a title of Khandáits in Orissa.

Garhuk or Garaucá, a sub-caste of Kahárs in Behar.

Gárvwár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gari, monkey, a totemistic sept of Mundás and Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Gariá, a sub-caste of Dhobís in Western Bengal.

Garjang, a sept of Tipperahs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Garówá, a sub-caste of Ka-hárs in Behar.

Garral, Garial, a title of Telís.

Garria, a kind of bird, a totemistic sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Garur, vulture, a totemistic section of Rautís in Chota Nagpur, and of Málís in Bankura.

Garwál, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.
Garwe, a stork, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Garyá, a sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Gatání, a section of Mahesris in Behar.

Gatpará, Gaptákhá, 'pock-puncturer,' a term applied to those who practise inoculation.

Gatsorá, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Gáudá, a sub-caste of Telis in Orissa.

Gaudanhá, a section of the Banodhiá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Gaudhal, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Goría sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Gaudhaniá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gauláni, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gauli, a section of Bhojpuriá Halwáis in Behar.

Gaunagahuná, a mul or section of the Timuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Gauna-Kulin, a hypergamous division of Ráhi Brahmans in Bengal made by Rájá Ballá Sen.

Gaura, a sub-caste of Káyasths and Sonárs, a section of Bábhans and a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gaura or Gauriya, a territorial division of the Pancha Gaura Brahmans, who live in the country of the Lower Gaiges, deriving its name from Gaura, the ancient capital of the Hindu dynasty of the Pál Rájás.

Gaura, Gorho, a sub-caste of Goálás in Bengal and Orissa.

Gauráli, a samáj or local group of the Basishtha gotra of Páschátya Baidik Brahmans in Bengal.

Gaurangi, a class of Vaishnava, followers of Gauránga.

Gaurihár, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Gauripur, a dih or local section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Koiris in Bhagalpur.

Gauro, a sept of Thárus in Behar.

Gautama, a section of Bábhans in Behar. The name denotes the Vedic sage Sáradwáta, the husband of Ahaláyá, who was seduced by Indra. It has probably been borrowed from the Brahmanical system in comparatively recent times. Most of the Bábhan section-names are territorial. The name also does duty as a sept of the Suryabansi Rajputs in Behar; a section of Brahmans; a thar of the Átri gotra of Nepál Brahmans; a section of Káyasths, Mayarás, Tántis, Baidyás, Goálás, Subarnabaniks, Sunris, and San-kháris in Bengal.

Gautháhá, a section of Bhojpuriá Halwús in Behar.

Gáwá, a group of the Bárendra Goálás in Bengal.

Gáwál, a gotra or section of Agawáls.

Gaya, a section of Awadhiá Hajáms in Behar.

Gayalpúre, a section of the Bahánnajáti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.
Gáyán (a singer), a class of Muhammadans believed to have been originally Shándárs. They have learned from their teachers the myth that they are descended from Jihád Gáyán, who accompanied Sháh Jalal in his conquest of Silhet, and state that they emigrated from that country in covered canoes, differing in build from those used by other Bediyás.

The Gáyán is usually a cultivator, and when he is absent from home his wife watches the crops and tends the cattle. Any relationship with other Bediyás is warmly repudiated, for which reason the Farazi sect sometimes concedes to the Gáyán the rights and privileges of other Mussulmans. This concession has transformed these vagrants into rigid Puritans. The Gáyán women are secluded, and the other Bediyás are reproached for indecency in allowing their women to wander about unveiled and unprotected.

The Gáyán sing Bengali songs in public, to the music of the violins, known as sárangí and behlá.

Gáywál, Gayal, Gayli, a degraded sub-caste of Debal Brahmans, who act as priests in the Vishnupada temple at Gya. They are remunerated by fees from pilgrims who offer pindas to the names of their ancestors. The name is also incorrectly applied to the touts or recruiters who are sent out from Gya by the Gaywals to collect pilgrims.

Gáysari, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Orissa.

Gede, duck, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Gehani, a section of Kamárkalla Sonárs in Behar.

Gehuaná, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Géláng, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gélra, a section of Oswáls in Behar.

Ghager, field-bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghali, a section of the Bárajáti sub-caste of Khatriás in Bengal.

Ghajári, a class of bird-catchers occasionally met with in Behar. I have been unable to ascertain whether the name has any definite and uniform relation to caste.

Ghale, a section of Gurungs and Murmis in Darjiling.

Ghaleh, a thar or sept of the Das-Gurung sub-tribe of Gurungs, so named after a village. The Gurung chief of Ghaleh in former times ruled at a place called Dong-ti in Nepal, and all the Gurungs were under his sway.

Ghali, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gahmela, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar.

Ghármhotle, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Ghaná or Gháchhuá, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Ghani, a section of Kaibarttas in Orissa.

Ghaniá, a title of Bangaja Káyađhás in Bengal.

Ghani, fish, a totemistic sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Ghanteswari, a gáin of the Sábarna gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.
Ghar, Ghár, a title of Dakshin-Ráhí and Bangaja Káyasths.

Gharámi, a thatcher, an occupation followed by members of several different castes.

Gharbait or Raut, an endogamous sub-caste of Amats in Behar.

Gharbári, a householder, a title of religious sectarians who live a secular life.

Gharbári Atit, a class of Atit in Behar which, whatever may have been its original mode of formation, does not now differ materially in manner of life from any ordinary occupational caste.

Gharbeta or Gharbait, a sub-caste of Dhánuks in Behar.

Gharikárak, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Chota Nagpur.

Ghar Ráut, a division (not exogamous) of the Ráut Mohtar sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Gharruk, a sub-caste of Kahárs in Behar.

Gharti, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Gharti-ghaure, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Ghartyál, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Gharu, a mul or section of the Kanaújiá sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Gharuí, a title of Kaibarttas and of Goálás in Western Bengal.

Gharwár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Gháscharáí, a title of Goálás who graze cattle.

Ghaserá, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal who cut grass for sale.

Ghási, a sub-section of the Kantásá section of Utkal Brah- mans in Orissa.

Ghási, a Dravidian fishing and cultivating caste of Chota Nagpur and Central India, who attend as musicians at weddings and festivals and also perform menial offices of all kinds. Ghási women act as midwives and nurses, and I have come across a case of a Brahman girl being nicknamed Ghásimani in her infancy and made over to a Ghási woman to bring up in order to avert the malevolent influences supposed to have caused the early death of previous children of the same mother.

relations to the Gharti are rather obscure, but I understand that persons, who infringe the law of exogamy by marrying or having intercourse with a woman of their own thars are in Nepal liable to be sold as slaves or Kamáras. (ii) A section of Kamáras. (iii) A sub-tribe of Mangars.
The Ghásis of Chota Nagpur are divided into three sub-castes—Sonáti, Simarloká, and Hári. They have only one section (Kasiér), probably a corruption of Kásyapa. Ghásis marry their daughters in infancy when they can afford to do so, but adult-marriage is by no means uncommon. Their marriage ceremony is a debased form of that in ordinary use among orthodox Hindus. Polygamy is permitted without any limit being imposed on the number of wives. Widow-marriage and divorces are freely practised, and the women of the caste are credited with living a very loose life.

The caste ranks socially with Doms and Musahars. They eat beef and pork, and are greatly addicted to drink. Their origin is obscure. Colonel Dalton regards them as Aryan helots, and says:

"But far viler than the weavers are the extraordinary tribe called Ghásis, foul parasites of the Central Indian hill tribes, and submitting to be degraded even by them. If the Chandáls of the Puráns, though descended from the union of a Brahmani and a Sudra, are the 'lowest of the low,' the Ghásis are Chandáls, and the people who further south are called Pariahs are no doubt of the same distinguished lineage. If, as I surmise, they were Aryan helots, their offices in the household or communities must have been of the lowest and most degrading kinds. It is to be observed that the institution of caste necessitated the organization of a class to whom such offices could be assigned, and when formed, stringent measures would be requisite to keep the servitors in their position. We might thence expect that they would avail themselves of every opportunity to escape, and no safer asylums could be found than the retreats of the forest tribes. Wherever there are Kols there are Ghásis, and though evidently of an entirely different origin, they have been so long associated that they are a recognised class in the Kol tradition of creation, which appropriately assigns to them a thriftless career, and describes them as living on the leavings or charity of the more industrious members of society. There are not fewer than 50,000 Ghásis in the Kol countries. Their favourite employment is no doubt that of musicians. No ceremony can take place or great man move without the accompaniment of their discordant instruments—drums, kettle-drums, and huge horns—to proclaim the event in a manner most horrifying to civilized ears."

The Simarloká sub-caste have a curious aversion for Káyasths, which they account for by the story that once upon a time some Ghási musicians, who were escorting the marriage procession of a Káyasth bridegroom to the house of his betrothed, were tempted by the valuable ornaments which he wore to murder him and cast his body into a well. The youth besought them to let him write a letter to his relatives informing them that he was dying and bidding them perform his funeral obsequies. This the Ghási agreed to, after making him swear that he would not disclose the manner of his death. The Káyasth, however, did not think the oath binding, and on the letter being delivered the Ghási were straightway given up to justice. For this reason, say the Simarlokás, trust not a Káyasth, for he is faithless even in the hour of death.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Ghásis in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>5</td>
<td></td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>5</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>3</td>
<td></td>
<td>Moulchyr</td>
<td>304</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>47</td>
<td></td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>861</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>160</td>
<td></td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>127</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>41</td>
<td></td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>339</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>226</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>14</td>
<td></td>
<td>Balesore</td>
<td>46</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>67</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,014</td>
<td>2,789</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>3,119</td>
<td>4,200</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>30</td>
<td></td>
<td>Lohardanga</td>
<td>12,705</td>
<td>16,334</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>40</td>
<td></td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>3,978</td>
<td>5,057</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>27</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>4,155</td>
<td>2,100</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>5,555</td>
<td>9,983</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Ghasuria, grass-cutters. The Ghatak, a section of Báb-hans in Behar.

Ghatak, a title of Brahmans who by profession are match-makers and genealogists. Each sub-caste of Bráhmans in Bengal, as well as the Baidya and Káyasth castes, has its recognised staff of Ghataks, who are responsible for arranging suitable marriages and preserving the social and ceremonial purity of each family belonging to it. The organization of the society of Ghataks, the Herald’s College of Bengal, is referred to Ballal Sen, who settled the Ráahi Ghataks in Jessore, Bakarganj, and Bikrampur, where, with the exception of a few who have emigrated to Calcutta, they are domiciled at the present day. The Ghatak registers of the Ráahi Bráhmans, like those of the Kulin Káyasths, are said to go back twenty-three generations, or five hundred years, and although any Bráhman may become a Ghatak, the highest estimation, and the title Pradhán, or chief, is only bestowed on the individual who can show a long and unbroken pedigree of Ghatak ancestors.

There are three grades of Ghataks. The first can repeat off-hand the names of all the members of the main as well as collateral branches of any family in his particular part of the country; of the families with which they have married, and of the issue of such marriages. The second grade embraces those Ghataks who can only give the name of the Kúl or family into which a Bráhman or his relatives have married; while the third comprises such as can only name the Bans or lineage to which the Bráhman belongs. It is not uncommon for one Ghatak to challenge another to display his powers of memory, and public contests are held somewhat after the manner of the logical disputations of the Middle Ages.

Ghataks seldom officiate at religious ceremonies, and always employ purohits for their own requirements. According to Dr. Wise, every Kulin Bráhman in Eastern Bengal is compelled to employ a Ghatak in negotiating the marriages of his family, otherwise the whole race of Ghataks revolt and ostracise him. The rich Bráhman zemindár, who are willing and able to pay a large sum for an unexceptionable Kulin bride, often try to convince the Ghataks that their families... are of purer and more honourable descent than they actually are. Bribes are often offered to establish the claim, but are rarely accepted. Disputes, however, are common, and the Ghataks who favour a claim that is fallacious, and who attend at an unauthorised marriage, fall in the estimation of those who have questioned its soundness and declined to be present. The scruples of a single Pradhán Ghatak often mar the otherwise perfect satisfaction of a parent on the marriage of his son to a family of higher rank than his own; and should all the leaders unite in forbidding the marriage, it is impossible for him to win any permanent promotion beyond that laid down in their registers.

Ghatakár, a synonym for Kumbhár.

Ghatakárpar, "potahersd," the nom-de-plume of a poet at the Court of Vikramáditya who is said to have been a potter; hence, a title of Kumhárás.

Ghatáni, a section of Kámis; a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Ghatíyá, a sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans in Orissa.

Ghát-mánjhi, a title of Pátnis in Bengal.

Ghatoar, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Ghát-Pátni, Balamí, or Ghát-wál, a sub-caste of Pátnis in Bengal.

Ghatrág, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Ghatra-Kárár, a sub-caste of Kámrás in Western Bengal.

Ghátu, a section of Máls in Bankura.

Ghátwál, (i) in Behar, a title of Mallahs who have charge of ferries and landing-places; (ii) in Western Bengal and Chota Nagpur a title of the holders of service tenures who act as rural police and are attached in that capacity to certain tracts of country or hill passes (ghátás). Most of them belong to Dravidian tribes or castes, such as Bhumij, Kharwár, Bauri, etc.

Gházipuriá, a division (not exogamous) of the Raut Mehtar sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Ghi, butter clarified, a totemistic sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Ghibihár, the ghi-eater, a title of the Bahiot sub-caste of Amats and Dhanuks in Behar who are personal servants in the houses of the higher castes. The term also denotes a sub-caste of Kewats in Bhagalpur, who are said to have been outcasted for eating the jhuthá or leavings of their masters.

Ghimirya, a thar or section of Nepálí Brahmans.

Ghingpá, a rui or sept of the Bed tahan-gye sub-tribe of Dejöng Lhoris or Bhotias of the south.

Ghióhaddá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Ghising, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Ghiuádhrá, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majrauté sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ghogro, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.
Ghonié, a thar or sept of the Das-Gurung sub-tribe of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Ghuni, a title of Bágdis, so-called from ghuni, a fish-trap.

Ghuniá, a sub-caste of Kewats in Western Bengal and of Mallas or fishermen in Behar.

Ghunri, a kind of fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorá, horse, a totemistic sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorábach, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorailá, a title of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ghorásaine, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Ghorcharhá, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar; a section of the Banodhá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Ghosh, a group of the Purba Kuliya Sadgops and a title of Kaíyasthas and Goálás in Bengal.

Ghoshál, a gáin of the Bátsya gotra of Rárhi Brahman in Bengal.

Ghoshli, a gáin of the Sándilya gotra of Rárhi Brahman in Bengal.

Ghos, a group of the Purba Kuliya Sadgops and a title of Kaíyasthas and Goálás in Bengal.

Ghosi Bangsi, Ghosi, Ghosin, Gonsia, a sub-caste of Goálás, q.v.

Ghosin, a class of Mahomedan herdsmen in Behar.

Ghosináik, Nálk, a sub-caste of Telis or oil-pressers in Hazaribagh.

Ghritakausika, a section of Brahman, Baidyas, and Kaíyasthas in Bengal.

Ghulám-Káyasth, a synonym for Sudra.

Ghumlái, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Ghundáne, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Ghuni, a title of Bágdis, so-called from ghuni, a fish-trap.

Ghuniá, a sub-caste of Kewats in Western Bengal and of Mallas or fishermen in Behar.

Ghunri, a kind of fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorá, horse, a totemistic sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorábach, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorailá, a title of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ghorásaine, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorá, horse, a totemistic sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorábach, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorailá, a title of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ghorásaine, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorá, horse, a totemistic sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorábach, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorailá, a title of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ghorásaine, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorá, horse, a totemistic sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorábach, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorailá, a title of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ghorásaine, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghunriá, a sept or section of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorá, horse, a totemistic sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorábach, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Ghorailá, a title of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Ghorásaine, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.
Giridhari, a class of Vaishnavas.

Giritar, a mul or section of the Maghaya sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Girnám, a class of Sannyásis or hermit.

Gislihi, bird, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Gnyambipá, a rui or sept of the Bed tehan-gye sub-tribe of Dejong Lhoris or Bhotias of the south.

Goá, a section of the Biyáhu and Kharidáhá Kálwárs in Behar.

Goáit, a kul or section of Bábhans and Gonrhis in Behar.

Goál, a synonym for Goál.

Goal, cow, a totemistic sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Goálā, Goir, Ahir (Sansk. Abhira), the great pastoral caste of India. According to Manu, an Abhira is the offspring of a Brahman by an Ambastha girl.

Lassen describes the Abhira as a non-Aryan pastoral race, dwelling near the mouth of the Indus, and remarks that the modern word Ahir means cowherd. At the present day the designation Ahir seems to be confined to Behar and parts of Upper India, Goálā being more commonly used in Bengal. The traditions of the caste bear a highly imaginative character, and profess to trace their descent from the god Krishna, whose relations with the milkmaids of Brindában play a prominent part in Hindu mythology. Krishna himself is supposed to have belonged to the tribe of Yádavas, or descendants of Yado, a nomadic race, who graze cattle and make butter, and are believed to have effected an early settlement in the neighbourhood of Mathurá. In memory of this tradition, one of the sub-castes of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces is called Yado or Jadu-bansi at the present time. Another story quoted by Buchanan makes out the Goálás to be Vaisyas, who were degraded in consequence of having introduced castration among their herds, and members of the caste who are disposed to claim this distinguished ancestor may lay stress upon the fact that the tending of flocks and herds is mentioned by the authorities among the duties of the Vaisya order.

Taken as a whole, the Goálás traditions can hardly be said to do more than render it probable that one of their earliest settlements was in the neighbourhood of Mathurá, and that this part of the country was the centre of distribution of the caste. The large functional group known by the name Goálā seems to have been recruited not merely by the diffusion along the Ganges Valley of the semi-Aryan Goálás of the North-Western Provinces, but also by the inclusion in the caste of pastoral tribes who were not Aryans at all. These of course would form distinct sub-castes, and would not be admitted to the jius connubii with the original nucleus of the caste. The great differences of make and feature which may be observed among Goálás seem to bear out this view, and to show that whatever may have been the original constituents of the caste, it now comprises several heterogeneous elements. Thus even in a district so far from the original home of the caste as Singbhum, we find Colonel Dalton remarking that the features of the Mathurábasi Goalás are high, sharp, and delicate, and they are of light-brown complexion. Those of the Magadha sub-caste, on the other hand, are undefined and coarse. They are dark-complexioned, and have large hands and feet. "Seeing the latter standing in a group with some Singbhum Kols, there is no distinguishing one from the other. There has doubtless been much mixture of blood." These remarks illustrate both the processes to which the growth of the caste is due. They show how representatives of the original type have spread to districts very remote from their original centre, and how at the same time people of alien race, who followed pastoral occupations, have become attached to the caste and are recognised by a sort of fiction as having belonged to it all along.

1 Ind. Alt. 1, 947 and 652, note 4.

Owing to the wide range of the caste, and to the double process by which its members have been recruited, the internal structure is extremely complicated, and the number of sub-castes and sections unusually large. Taking the Goálás of the North-Western Provinces as the type, we find the following seven divisions recognised:—Desí, Nandbansi, Jadubansi, Surajbansi, Goalbansi, Ahir, and Kathia. These again are subdivided into a very large number of sections, the names of which appear for the most part to have reference to locality rather than to descent. According to Sir Henry Elliot traces of hypergamy may be found among these groups, but his information on this point seems to be incomplete.

Among the Goalás of Behar a different series of sub-castes has been developed, and none of the names current in the North-Western Provinces are met with. As a rule, too, the names of the groups are in Behar of a different type, and instead of being based, as in the North-West, upon descent from a particular stock or from some mythical progenitor, have reference either to the number of müls or sections with which intermarriage is prohibited, or to some departure from traditional usage on the part of its members. Náumulia and Sátmulia are instances of the former type, the peculiarities of which are explained more fully in the paragraphs on marriage below. Sátmulia has the alternative title Kishnaut, and seems to arrogate descent from the god Krishna. Náumulia is also called Majraut, a name which I am unable to interpret. In Bhagalpur members of the Kishnaut and Majraut groups will not make butter—an occupation which they consider degrading—and confine themselves to dealing in milk. The Goría or Dahiéré sub-caste is said to have been degraded because its members make butter without first scalding the milk—a practice enjoined by the Hindu scriptures and recognised as a crucial test of purity by all Goálás. Dr. Wise spells the name Daira, and says it is generally believed to be merely a corruption of the Bengali dārī, a beard, adding as a reason that many Dahiéré Goalás have become Mahomedans and wear beards. This seems to be a little far-fetched: a more probable etymology is from dahi, curds. The Kantitahá derive their name from their custom of branding cows with a kánti, or hook, a practice confined to Ahirs and never resorted to by the higher grades of Goálás, except at sriddha, when the Dharm-Sánr is branded and let go. The Kanaujia and Bargowár sub-castes believe their ancestors to have migrated to Behar from the North-Western Provinces, and on this ground claim to be superior to, and hold themselves aloof from, the other sub-castes. The Separi are a writer sub-caste, largely employed as patwaris in some parts of Behar. They are looked down upon by the other sub-castes, because they do not call in the Chamai, the barber, or the Dhobi at the birth of a child, but cut the navel string and perform all necessary offices themselves.

Turning now to Bengal, we find the Pallab or Ballabh sub-caste tracing their descent from one Ghám Ghosh, who is said to have sprung from the sweat of Krishna; the Bágre or Ujainia sub-caste affect to have come from Ujain; while the Gaura Ghosh or Gop-Goálás, also known as Lathiás, pretend to be pure Sudras, and resent the suggestion that they should intermarry with any other sort of Goálás. The Rárhi or Bhoga Goálás, like the Kantitahá in Behar, are cut off from intermarriage with the rest and generally looked down upon, because they brand their cows with red-hot iron and castrate bull calves. Two curious groups are found in Dacca—the Sádá or white Goálás and the Lál or red Goálás, the names being derived from the colour of the clothes worn by the bride and the members of the bridal procession. With the Sádá Goálás all of these are dressed in white, while the Lál Goálás wear red. The Sádá are reckoned the higher of the two, and a pan or bride-price is given when a girl of this group marries a Lál Goálás. In all cases of intermarriage between Sádá and Lál Goálás the colour of the clothes to be worn by the bridal party follows that of the group to which the bridegroom belongs.

Goálás are very strong in Orissa, and a large proportion of the Uriyas employed as personal servants by Europeans belong to that caste. It is a question whether the Gaura or Gopopúria sub-caste or the Mathurábási rank higher. Both are very particular in all matters touching their ceremonial purity, and the Mathurábási lay stress on the duty of making occasional pilgrimages to the original home of the caste at Brindában. The Dumalá or Jadupuria Goará seem to be a group of local formation. They cherish the tradition that their ancestors came to Orissa from Jadupur, but this appears to be nothing more than the name of the Jágavas, the mythical progenitors of the Goálá caste transformed into the name of an imaginary town.

In Chota Nagpur the distribution of sub-castes is very much what might be expected. In parts of Singbhum and the adjoining Tributary States a large Goálá population exists, holding rather a subordinate position in relation to the dominant Hos and Bhuiyas, but on the whole the most flourishing of the peasantry in that part of the country. These people belong to the sub-castes known in Orissa, and appear to have entered Chota Nagpur from the south. According to Colonel Dalton, the Magadcha Goálás are suspiciously like Hos, and in most Ho villages a few of them will be found receiving pay for looking after the Hos' cattle. The Mathurá-bási Goálás, who are of a much more Aryan type and claim to be pure Gopas, will not condescend to take service with Dravidians. Without forsaking their hereditary calling, they frequently manage to gain possession of substantial farms, where they keep large herds of cows and buffaloes, and deal in milk and ghi. In the north and west of the division numerous representatives of the Behar sub-castes are met with, who come in from the crowded and over-cultivated districts of Behar to feed their cattle on the forest-clad table lands of Hazaribagh, Lohardaga, and Sarguja. Here they lead a nomadic life during the dry season, living in tents of bamboo matting and moving from place to place as the supply of forage requires.

The character of the exogamous subdivisions of the Goálás and of the rules by which intermarriage is regulated differs markedly in different parts of the country. In Bengal the caste recognises six gotras, borrowed from the Brahmanical system, and forbids a man to marry a girl who belongs to the same gotra as himself. The gotra of the mother, or, to speak precisely, of the maternal grandfather, is not excluded. The intermarriage of sapindas is also prohibited, though the rules on this point observed by the Goálás are hardly so elaborate as those followed by the higher castes. In Behar the Brahmanical gotras are unknown, and marriage among the Goálás is regulated by a very large number of muls or exogamous groups of the territorial type, the names of which are given in the appendix. In some places where the existing muls have been found inconveniently large, and marriage has been rendered unduly difficult, certain muls have broken up into purukhs or sub-sections. Where this has taken place, a man may marry within the mul, but not within the purukh, the smaller and more convenient group taking the place of the larger one. Some difference of opinion prevails concerning the precise manner in which the rule of exogamy is worked, and the subject is one of such extreme intricacy that it would be unreasonable to look for uniformity of practice everywhere. The Satmulia or Kishnaut Goálás in Bhagalpur forbid a man to marry a woman belonging to the following sections or muls:

(a) His own mul.
(b) His mother's mul.
(c) His maternal grandmother's mul.
(d) His maternal great-grandmother's mul.
(e) His paternal grandmother's mul.
(f) His paternal great-grandmother's mul.
(g) His paternal great-great-grandmother's mul.

To these the Naomulia add:

(h) The mul of his paternal grandmother's mother.
(i) The mul of his paternal great-grandmother's mother.

In some cases a further complication is introduced by taking into account not only the bride's mul, but also that of some of her female ancestors, so that if, for example, the mul of the proposed bride's maternal grandmother should happen to have been the same as that of the proposed bridegroom's paternal grandmother, no marriage could take place between the parties, although the mul of the bride herself might not correspond with any of those prohibited to the bridegroom.

Elaborate as the system is, an examination of the annexed table will show that the prohibitions of intermarriage based on the mul or section require to be supplemented by the standard formula: Chacherá, mamera, phuphéra, maserá, ye chár nátá bacháke shádi hotá hai (“The line of paternal uncle, maternal uncle, paternal aunt, maternal aunt,—these four relationships are to be avoided in marriage”). To a certain extent this rule overlaps the rule of exogamy reckoned from the mul. Thus in the first generation the whole of the paternal uncle's descendants, both male and female, would be excluded by the rule prohibiting marriage within the section. In the second and subsequent generations agnates would be barred, but descendants through females would not, for the paternal uncle's daughters having necessarily married out of the section, their children would belong to some other section, and their second cousins would be able to marry. On the other hand, the rule of exogamy, if it stood alone, would permit the marriage of first cousins in three out of four possible cases. A reference to the table will show how this conclusion is arrived at; for Propositus belonging himself to section A might, so far as the rule of exogamy is concerned, marry the daughters of his paternal and maternal aunts, who would not belong to any of the muls barred for him. The rule defining the prohibited degrees is usually calculated to four generations in the descending line.
Table illustrating exogamy as practised by Sátmulia and Naomulia Goáliás.

[The small letters α to n show the mule. The Sátmulia exclude the 'Seven mules' α to g inclusive; the Naomulia further prohibit marriage within h and i.]

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{pat. } g \cdot g \cdot f. &= \text{mat. } g \cdot g \cdot m. \\
\text{pat. } g \cdot g \cdot m.'s \text{ mother.} \\
\text{pat. } g \cdot f. &= \text{pat. } g \cdot m. \\
\text{mat. } g \cdot f. &= \text{mat. } g \cdot g \cdot m. \\
\text{pat. uncle = his wife.} \\
\text{pat. aunt = her husband.} \\
\text{father = mother.} \\
\text{mat. aunt = her husband.} \\
\text{mat. uncle = his wife.} \\
\text{first cousin.} \\
\text{first cousin.} \\
\text{Propositus.} \\
\text{first cousin.} \\
\text{first cousin.}
\end{align*}
\]
These elaborate precautions against consanguineous marriages appear to be unknown in Orissa and Chota Nagpur. In Chota Nagpur the Goalás have totemistic sections of the type common in that part of the country. A man may not marry a woman who belongs to his own totem, and is also bound to observe the standard rule concerning prohibited degrees. Regarding Orissa the information available on this point is defective, and I have been unable to ascertain the names of the exogamous subdivisions of the caste and the rules governing intermarriage.

Among the Goalás of Bengal and the higher Goalás of Orissa, the orthodox view of Hindu marriage is on the whole accepted. Girls are married as infants; widow-marriage is strictly prohibited, and divorce is unknown. If a woman commits adultery with another Goalá or with a man of higher caste, the matter is hushed up: an intrigue with a low-caste man is punished with instant exclusion from caste.

In Behar infant-marriage has established itself as a usage essential to the maintenance of social respectability; but a widow is allowed to marry again, and is generally expected to marry her late husband's younger brother. Under no circumstances may she marry the elder brother.

With the Goalás of Chota Nagpur both adult and infant-marriage are recognised, the latter being regarded as a counsel of perfection, which well-to-do persons may be expected to act up to. The rule that the rukhsati or final ceremony celebrating the departure of the bride to the house of the bridegroom and the commencement of regular connubial relations shall ordinarily take place four months after the wedding shows pretty clearly that infant-marriage cannot have been introduced in the strict sense in which it is understood in Bengal. A bride-price is paid, varying from Rs. 5 to Rs. 25, according to the status of the families concerned, and out of this sum the bride's father is expected to provide his daughter with ornaments. Brahmans officiate at the wedding. The smearing of vermilion on the bride's forehead is believed to be the most important part of the ceremony. Widows may marry again by the meagre ritual known as sagai. At this no Brahman attends; new adris and some sweetmeats are presented to the bride and to her mother, and either the bridegroom himself or some widow of the company puts vermilion on the bride's forehead. This completes the marriage; no rukhsati is required, and the parties begin to live together at once. Among the Goalás of Singbhum a widow is required to marry one of her late husband's younger brothers; and failing these, she must select a husband from among the exogamous group to which her husband belonged. This deserves notice, as being in all probability a survival of earlier custom which has elsewhere fallen into disuse.

The usages current in Orissa do not differ very materially from those which prevail in Behar. In both infant-marriage is the standard to which every one seeks to conform, but it may be conjectured that this has not been so in Orissa for very long. The Goalás there say that if by chance a girl should remain unmarried in her father's house after she has attained puberty, the breach of ceremonial requirements may be got over by giving her in marriage to an old man or a man otherwise unfit for marriage. After the marriage she is at once divorced by her husband, and is then competent to marry again by the ritual appointed for widows. I have mentioned above that the higher Goalás of Orissa affect a high standard of orthodoxy, and look down upon the Behar and Bengal divisions of the caste. Among them widow-marriage is said to be forbidden. Most Uriya Goalás, however, allow a widow to remarry by the usual form.

Some curious particulars concerning the birth customs of the Orissa Goalás may be given here. During labour and after delivery the mother is kept in a separate house, from which fresh air is excluded as much as possible, and which is kept artificially heated for a period of twenty-one days. Branches of kendu (Embryopteris Glutinifera) and ligu (Ligneolaris) are hung near the front door of the house; iron nails are driven into the door-posts, and chimuai (Hemidesmus Indicus), and bhoka (Semecarpus Anacardium) are laid in the infant's bed. After the navel string has been cut the child is bathed in hot water in which leaves of basanga (Justicia Adhatode), arka (Asclepios Gigantea), bigunia (Viter Negnanda), daukari, and dzatura (Datura natal) have been boiled. On the fifth day after the birth zarada (Cytisus Cajan), mung pulse, biri (Phaseolus Mungo), rice, and wheat are fried together and distributed to friends. The worship of the goddess Shashthi is performed on the sixth day, when Vidbáté, or Brahmá, is believed to enter the house and write its destiny on the child's forehead. On this occasion two lumps of cowdung are placed at each side of the door, and for fifteen days red lead is smeared on them, and dib grass well moistened laid on the top. On the eighth day a feast is given to relatives and members of the caste. Finally, on the 21st day new cooking pots are brought into use, an elaborate entertainment is prepared, and the child is named. During this period of three weeks not only the mother, but also the father, is deemed to be impure, and is required to abstain from all his ordinary occupations.

There is little to be said about the religion of the caste. In Bengal most of them are Vaishnavas, and celebrate the Janmáštami or festival of the birthday of Krishna with great circumstance. They employ Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, but these are looked upon as degraded, and are not received upon equal terms by the higher orders of the priestly caste. In Behar the tendency to Vaishnavism does not seem to be so strong, and a considerable proportion of the caste are said to belong to the Saiva and Sákta sects. There Goalás Brahmans occupy a higher position than in Bengal, and are deemed as respectable as the Brahmans who serve other castes of the same status. It is, however, only for marriage, súrdh, and the worship of Sat Narain and the greater gods that the services of Brahmans are required. When it is only a question of propitiating the host of minor gods, who play so important a part in the domestic religion of the people, the householder himself officiates as priest. By Goalás special reverence is paid to Bisahari, Ganpat GOALÁ. 290. GOBANSI.

Gobil, Gosawan, the god of cattle disease, Kalumánjhi, and a number of gauĩs or ghosts. To these vague shapes flowers, sweetmeats, milk, rice, and occasionally sacrifices of goats, are offered and partaken of by the worshippers. Monday and Friday are considered the most auspicious days, Saturday being reckoned peculiarly unlucky. At the time of the Sankrántion on the last day of Kartik, October-November, a pig is turned loose among a herd of buffaloes, who are encouraged to gore it to death. The carcase is then given to Dosádhis to eat. The Goáls or Ahirs, who practise this strange rite, aver that it has no religious significance, and is merely a sort of popular amusement. They do not themselves partake of any portion of the pig.

In point of social standing the Goáls of Behar rank with Kurmis, Amáts, and the other castes from whose hands a Brahman can take water. In Bengal they occupy a lower position, and are counted as inferior, not only to the Naba-Sákhs, but also to the cultivating division of the Kaibarta caste. The Orissa Goáls, on the other hand, affect a high standard of ceremonial purity, and look down upon the Behar and Bengal divisions of the caste. Most Goáls combine cultivation with their hereditary pursuits, and in Orissa and Singbhum some members of the caste hold landed tenures of substantial value.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Goáls in 1872 and 1881:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
<th>DISTRICT.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>99,225</td>
<td>72,262</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>1,520</td>
<td>2,305</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>80,672</td>
<td>69,262</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>9,012</td>
<td>11,009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>17,445</td>
<td>16,155</td>
<td>Chittagong Hill Tracts</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>74,633</td>
<td>58,996</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,860</td>
<td>2,170</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>67,268</td>
<td>46,124</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>270,665</td>
<td>396,671</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>47,653</td>
<td>77,000</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>320,650</td>
<td>424,731</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>45,184</td>
<td>37,137</td>
<td>Monsooper</td>
<td>356,665</td>
<td>506,117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>21,200</td>
<td>18,956</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>398,665</td>
<td>349,112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>11,488</td>
<td>12,672</td>
<td>Genschah</td>
<td>375,746</td>
<td>358,513</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>20,698</td>
<td>17,974</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>130,412</td>
<td>165,274</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>20,411</td>
<td>36,411</td>
<td>Monshyru</td>
<td>179,664</td>
<td>217,618</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>6,938</td>
<td>5,172</td>
<td>Harsipur</td>
<td>335,172</td>
<td>343,830</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahye</td>
<td>4,594</td>
<td>9,573</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>123,636</td>
<td>181,629</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranipur</td>
<td>5,046</td>
<td>6,551</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>16,389</td>
<td>16,575</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barpah</td>
<td>6,140</td>
<td>7,925</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>24,959</td>
<td>52,244</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kalna</td>
<td>11,484</td>
<td>11,785</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>105,940</td>
<td>140,700</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parbani</td>
<td>480</td>
<td>4,444</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>45,277</td>
<td>68,963</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>258</td>
<td>1,233</td>
<td>Halinore</td>
<td>5,646</td>
<td>68,631</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jafargiri</td>
<td>2,913</td>
<td>3,316</td>
<td>Lohardagã</td>
<td>69,353</td>
<td>78,677</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>6,758</td>
<td>6,940</td>
<td>Singbhuam</td>
<td>36,353</td>
<td>35,573</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>17,512</td>
<td>22,590</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>38,058</td>
<td>39,091</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pans purs</td>
<td>287</td>
<td>954</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>29,008</td>
<td>45,743</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Goalabhuiyá, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in Western Bengal.

Goálbsansi, a sub-caste of Goáls in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Goár, a synonym for Goála.

Gobans, cow-born, a sept of Bairágis in Chota Nagpur.

Gobansis, a title of the family of the Bajás of Pachet, in the district of Manbhum, referring to the legend that the founder of the house was deserted in the woods as an infant and was suckled by a cow.

Gobargárhá, a mul or section of the Naomulí or Majraut sub-caste of Goálas in Bankura.

Gobariá, a synonym for Sikhári Bhuïyá, q.v.

Gobhil, a gotra or section of Agarwáls.

Gobindpúriá, see Gobindpúriá.

Gobolachán, a totemic sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur who cannot eat beef.

Gobra, Gobra, a sub-caste of Baurís, so designated from their purifying the ground with cow dung where they eat, while the other Baurís (Jhántias) simply sweep the ground; a sub-caste of Máltás and Lohárs in Bankura.

Gochálya, a sept of the Tangjaní or Naluí sub-tribe of Chákmas in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Gochchháši, a pání of the Bharadwája gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Gochhpúriá, a pur or section of Sákadwípi Brahmans in Bankura.

Godáhiá, Godágá, a sub-caste of Goálas in Behar who brand cattle with a red-hot iron, see Gujír.

Godahíyá, a sub-caste of Kümhrás in Behar.

Godánwijá, a mul or section of the Kamarkálí sub-caste of Sonárs and of Lohárs in Behar.

Godná-wálí, a female tattooer. In Eastern Bengal, according to Dr. Wise, Bediya women travel about the country with a bag, containing a variety of drugs, a cupping horn (Singá), and a scarificator (Nárán). They attract attention by bawling “To tattoo, to cup, and to extract worms from decayed teeth!” They also prescribe for female disorders. It is said that small grubs are kept in a bamboo tube, and while the patient’s attention is occupied by the talk of the operator, a maggot is presented as if it had been extracted from the hollow tooth. For this trick the Godná-wálí receives a suitable fee.

In tattooing the juice of the Bhangra plant (Indigofera linifolia) and woman’s milk are the materials used, and the punctures are made with needles or the thorns of the Karanda (Carissa Carandas). While the operation is being performed, a very equivocal mantra is recited to alleviate pain and prevent any subsequent inflammation.

In respectable Hindu families an old nurse usually tattoos the girls. Now-a-days the ordinary tattoo design, either circular or stellate, is made at the top of the nose in the centre of the forehead; formerly the fashionable stain (Ullikhi) was at the same spot, but a line extended along the bridge of the nose, branching out into two curves over each ala. Tattoo marks were originally distinctive of Hindu females, but Muhammadan women copied them, and it is only since the Fárazi revival that they have discontinued the habit.
Chandál women are often employed to cure goitre by tattooing. A circular spot on the most prominent part of the swelling is punctured with a bamboo spike, and common ink mixed with the sap of the Káli Koshijia rubbed in.

Godo, crocodile, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Gográmi, a gáis of the Bha-radhája gotra of Bárendra Brah-mans in Bengal.

Goh, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Goherwar, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Gohori, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Goil, a section of Agarwáls.

Goin, a half-gotra or section of Agarwáls.

Goit, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goálás in Behar; a totemistic sept of Bhuiyás in Chota Nagpur.

Goita, a sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Gojía, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Hazaribagh.

Gola, a sub-caste of Bhandáris in Orissa.

Gond, a non-Aryan tribe, classed on linguistic grounds as Dravidian, properly belonging to the Central Provinces, but found also in the Tributary States of Chota Nagpur, in the south of Lohardágá and in Singbhum. In the States of Sargujá, Koreá, and Udaipur most of the feudal tenures held on terms of military service directly under the Chief are in the hands of Gonds—a fact which suggests that the tribe must have been among the earliest permanent settlers in that part of the country. The Gonds of Bengal are divided into four sub-tribes:—Gond, Ráj-Gond, Dhokar-Gond, and Golaíja, a sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Golángya, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Golchíá, a section of the Oswál Baniyás.

Goldár, a title of Kalwárs in Behar.

Gole, a section of Murmís in Darjiling.

Goleg-pá, go, a head, and leg, good—the peaceful, a sub-sept of the Nah-pá sept of Sherpa Bhotias.

Golmetah, a section of Mag-hayá Dhobís in Behar.

Golóar, sweet potato, a totemistic sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Golrám, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Golsáx, see Hawáigá.

Golvar, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Gomdan, a section of Murmís in Darjiling.

1 The present article deals only with the Gonds of Bengal, and does not attempt to give an exhaustive account of the entire tribe.
Doroé-Gond or Náik. The Gond represent the bulk of the tribe, while the Raj-Gond are supposed to be descended from families who attained to the dignity of Chief. The Dhokar-Gond are a wandering race, who make a living by begging and thieving. The Doroé-Gond or Náik are found only in Singbhum. According to Colonel Dalton, they were the military retainers of the Mahápatra of Bámangháti, a feudatory of the Rája of Moharbanj, who were driven out of Bámangháti with their leader and permitted to settle in Singbhum in consequence of his having rebelled against his lord paramount. Their sections, shown in Appendix I, are totemistic. One of them, Beard (hawk), occurs also among the Santálas.

Gonds practise both infant and adult-marriage, but under Hindu influence the former practice tends continually to become more popular and to be looked upon as a badge of social distinction. The ceremony is modelled on that in use among the lower castes of Hindus. Sinduradán and marriage to a mango-tree form prominent parts of the ritual, while according to some the binding portion of the rite consists in the village barber pouring a vessel of water over both bride and bridegroom. Widows are allowed to marry again, the usual practice being for the widow to marry her late husband’s younger brother. No religious ceremony is in use on such occasions, nor is it customary to send for the Brahman and Hajjám, who officiate at the marriage of a virgin. All that is necessary is to assemble a sort of committee of relations, before whom the bridegroom gives the bride a new cloth and a lác bracelet and promises to maintain her in a suitable fashion. The proceedings end, as is the manner of the non-Aryan tribes, with a feast, at which every one gets very drunk.

The Bengal members of the tribe affect to be orthodox Hindus, and worship the standard gods with the assistance of a degraded class of Brahmans, who also officiate at their marriages. Although to this extent they have embraced the popular religion, they still worship the characteristic deities of the non-Hinduised Gonds—Bar Deo and Dulhá Deo. They burn their dead, but the relatives mourn for three days only, after which period they purify themselves by bathing and shaving, and make offerings of bread and milk to the spirit of the departed. Their social rank is very low, as in spite of their professed conformity to Hinduism they eat fowls and other unclean food. Concerning their appearance and characteristics, Colonel Dalton has the following remarks:

"Socially, I consider the Hinduised or semi-Hinduised Gonds to be the least interesting of the great families of the aborigines of India. They have none of the lively disposition of the Oraons or of the free, dignified demeanour which characterises many of the Singbhum Kols. They are in character reserved, sullen, and suspicious. They are indifferent cultivators and careless about the appearance of their homesteads, and they are withal singularly ill-favoured; and though some of the wealthier families have formed a series of alliances with other races, which have improved their looks, I can point to many who have tried this in vain, and who show to this day features more closely resembling the lower Negro type than any I have met with amongst the tribes of Bengal. They often have short crisp curly hair, and though it is said, and no doubt truly, that this is far removed from the regular woolly covering of a Negro’s head, I have generally found such hair in conjunction with features very noticeably Negro in type, and accompanying a very dark skin. They are larger and heavier in build than the Oras and Kols, and with none of the graceful physique to be found in both these tribes.”

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Gonds in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>47</td>
<td></td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>7,161</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>2,860</td>
<td>9,636</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1,161</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>5</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Singhpur</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>3</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>Railmora</td>
<td>6</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B.B. Parganas</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>22,275</td>
<td>17,600</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>16</td>
<td></td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>7</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>2,843</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhaurpur</td>
<td>35</td>
<td></td>
<td>Singhbhum</td>
<td>1,898</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shaham</td>
<td>11,855</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>68,618</td>
<td>72,374</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>11,005</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Gonda, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gondh, a sub-caste of Binds in Behar.

Gondli, a kind of grain, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Gondrari, a tree, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Gonduk, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Gonkhó, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Gonr, a sub-caste of Kándus in Behar; a section of the Biyábhit and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar; a stone-cutter and maker of stone plates and household utensils.

Gonrhí, a title of Malláhs in Behar.

Gonrhí, Gunrhí, Malláh, Machhud, a fishing and cultivating caste of Behar, who claim descent from Níkhád or Níshád, a mythical boatman, who is said to have ferried Ram Chandra across the Ganges at Allahabad.
The fact that the word Níshád, which is used in the Rig Veda as a general name for the non-Aryan races, should appear in the traditions of the Gonrhí as a personal eponym, suggests the conjecture that the caste may be descended from one of the aboriginal tribes whom the Aryans found in possession of the Ganges Valley. This view derives some support from the physical appearance of the caste, which approaches to the non-Aryan type. The internal structure of the group throws no light on its origin, unless we may attach weight to the fact that one of the sub-castes bears the name of Kolh. The other sub-castes are Banpar, Cháb or Chábi, Dhoár, Kurin, Parbatti-Kurin, Khunaut or Khulaut, and Semári. All of these are strictly endogamous, except the Kolh and Kurin sub-castes, which admit of intermarriage with each other, though not with members of other sub-castes. Some members of the Cháb sub-caste deny that they have any connection with the Gonrhi. The section-names, which are shown in the Appendix, are in common use as titles among many other castes in Behar. Their precise bearing on marriage is not easy to ascertain. Gonrhis are not as a class intelligent enough to be able to explain their own customs very clearly, nor have they a sufficiently strong organization to secure uniformity of practice in different parts of the country. Thus according to some accounts the Cháb, Dhoár, and Kolh regulate their marriages solely by the standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees, and the Khunaut sub-caste have no exogamous sections, while within the Parbatti-Kurin sub-caste only a special group, known as Játhot, observes the rule of exogamy in respect of its section-names. The rest of the sub-castes regard these names as titles having no special significance. The Kurin have no section-names, and affect to know nothing about the regular custom of exogamy, but they do not allow a man to marry a woman who lives in the same village as himself. The Banpar and Seméri sub-castes, on the other hand, appear to have distinct sections, and also count prohibited degrees down to six, or as some say seven, generations in the descending line. In determining whom a man may marry regard is paid not merely to his own section, but to the section to which his mother and his paternal and maternal grandmothers belonged.

Gonrhis marry their daughters as infants or as adults according to their means. Infant-marriage is deemed the more respectable, but no special disgrace attaches to a family because one of the daughters attains the age of puberty before being married. The marriage ceremony is of the standard type. Polygamy is permitted only to the extent that a man may take a second wife if his first wife is barren or suffers from an incurable disease. A widow may marry again by the sagati form, of which sindurán constitutes the binding portion. She may marry her late husband's younger brother, but is not compelled to do so. Divorce is permitted with the consent of the pancháyat, on the ground of misconduct or incompatibility of temper. Divorced wives can marry again. Some hold, however, that a woman taken in adultery is debarred from this privilege, and I gather that divorce is generally regarded with disfavour by the respectable members of the caste.

Most Gonrhis are Vaishnava Hindus, but a few members of the Saurapatya sect of sun-worshippers are found among them. They employ Maithil Brahmans for the worship of the greater gods, but these priests are not usually recognised as equals by other members of the sacred order. They have a large number of minor gods, and many of them belong to the Pândh Pîrya creed—an obscure but widely-spread cult, which appears to have arisen from the contact of Islam with the animistic beliefs of its aboriginal converts. Some, again, worship a water-god, called Koîlâ-Bâbâ, described as an old grey-bearded person who, as Gàngâjî kâ Beldâr, ‘the navvy of our lady the Ganges,’ saps and swallows up whatever opposes the sacred stream. Before casting a new net or starting on a commercial venture, offerings of molasses and seven kinds of grain, kneaded into balls, are offered to him, and at the end of the ceremony one of the balls is placed on the edge of the water, another on the bow of the boat. Another rite common to many, if not to all, fisher castes is the Bârwarias or Bârâhî Pûjâ, when a subscription is made, and in the absence of a Brâhman, a pig is sacrificed in a garden or on a patch of waste land outside the village. Jài Singh, Amar Singh, Chand Singh, Diyal Singh, Kewal, Marang, Bandi, Goraiyâ, and a river named Kamalâjî, are also regularly worshipped. Jài Singh, who is also a favourite deity of the Tiyar caste, is said to have been a Gonrhi of Ujjain, who had a large timber trade in the Sunderbuns. On one occasion the Râja of the Sunderbuns imprisoned 700 Gonris in consequence of a dispute about the price of wood. Jài Singh slew the Râjâ and released the prisoners, and has ever since been honoured with daily worship. Goats, sweetmeats, wheaten cakes, pûn supâri, and flowers are offered to him at regular intervals, and no Gonrhi will light a pipe or embark on a fishing excursion without first invoking the name of Jài Singh. Once a year, in the month of Srâwan, a flag is set up in honour of Hanumán on a bamboo pole in the courtyard, and offerings of sweetmeats and fruits are presented to the god. These offerings are received by the Brâhmans who officiate as priests, while the articles of food given to the minor gods are eaten by the members of the caste. The dead are burned, usually on the brink of a river, and the ashes thrown into the stream. In Supul the practice is to burn in a mango grove. Srâddhâ is performed on the thirteenth day after death.

The social status of the Gonrhi caste appears to vary in different parts of the country, and does not admit of very precise definition. All that can be said is that they rank below Barhis, Kumhârs, and Laheris, and that although Brâhmans do not ordinarily take water from their hands, this rule is not observed everywhere. Their own practice in the matter of diet inclines towards laxity, as they eat scaleless as well as scaly fish, pork, water tortoises, and field-rats, and indulge freely in strong drink. There are, however, many Bhakats among them who abstain from liquor and from all kinds of animal food, and are held in respect by reason of their abstinence. The caste will take water and sweetmeats from Kewats, Dhânuks, and Gangotâs, but will not eat cooked food prepared by members of those castes. They believe boating and fishing to be their original and characteristic occupation, but many of them are engaged in agriculture as tenure-holders, occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats, and landless day-labourers.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Gonrhis in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>1,663</td>
<td>464</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>254</td>
<td>81</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>1,323</td>
<td>943</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>106</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhishambazar</td>
<td>455</td>
<td>5,157</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>2,930</td>
<td>1,726</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mridangpur</td>
<td>1,663</td>
<td>15,544</td>
<td>Pasana</td>
<td>11,724</td>
<td>21,355</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hulgill</td>
<td>1,456</td>
<td>637</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>11,193</td>
<td>12,458</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>1,456</td>
<td>637</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>19,166</td>
<td>17,243</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sylhet</td>
<td>3,954</td>
<td>991</td>
<td>Sylhet (Munsafpur)</td>
<td>168,255</td>
<td>116,233</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>12,257</td>
<td>10,619</td>
<td>Shir Ghorai</td>
<td>85,305</td>
<td>42,523</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>3,577</td>
<td></td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>66,123</td>
<td>42,523</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>11,129</td>
<td>10,738</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>37,415</td>
<td>36,754</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>7,332</td>
<td>8,303</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>17,845</td>
<td>18,245</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>678</td>
<td>1,095</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>63,000</td>
<td>43,698</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajbhadpur</td>
<td>3,768</td>
<td>1,714</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>30,141</td>
<td>40,020</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Raniganj</td>
<td>508</td>
<td>1,195</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>1,006</td>
<td>1,943</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>3,741</td>
<td>3,677</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>2,750</td>
<td>2,907</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fabbur</td>
<td>1,136</td>
<td>5,944</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>4,347</td>
<td>4,263</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>540</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>363</td>
<td>334</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jatpur</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>17,313</td>
<td>23,931</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>361</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>1,552</td>
<td>1,917</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dakshpur</td>
<td>5,567</td>
<td>5,828</td>
<td>Hasaribagh</td>
<td>1,750</td>
<td>2,907</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Farrpur</td>
<td>5,408</td>
<td>5,295</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>7,250</td>
<td>12,358</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balkanganj</td>
<td>2,407</td>
<td>978</td>
<td>Sinebhum</td>
<td>1,750</td>
<td>2,907</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manirahang</td>
<td>10,901</td>
<td>23,563</td>
<td>Manbhumi</td>
<td>1,671</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Gonria, a sub-caste of Goalás in Behar.

Gop or Ghosh, a sub-caste of Goalás in Bengal.

Gopa, a synonym for Goalá; a title and a section of the Kanaunia and Gorá sub-castes of Goalás in Behar.

Gopál, a synonym for Goalá.

Gopálghataki, a mel or hyper-gamous sub-group of Ráhí Brahmans in Bengal.

Gopál-Kárikar, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in Murshedabad.

Gop-Goálá, a synonym for Goalá.

Gopijan, a sect of Vaishnavas; a synonym for Sadgop.

Gopurbba, a gúan of the Bharadwája gotra of Uttar-Bérendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Gorahat, a small class of Bhuiyás in the south of Chota Nagpur who make a living by washing for gold in the sands of the rivers.

Goraherí, a synonym for Gareri in Behar.

Gorai, a title of Kaibarttas.

Gorái, a title of the headmen of the Dom caste in Bhagalpur, who have under them servants, called Chharidárs, to execute or communicate their orders to villages; a watchman and messenger in Behar, usually of the Dosadh caste.

Gorái, Korait, Baikar, a non-Aryan caste of musicians, comb-makers, and cotton-carders found in the southwest of the Lohardágá district, and perhaps in Hazaribagh. It may be inferred from the totemistic character of their sections, a list of which is given in Appendix I, that they are an offshoot from one of the aboriginal races, while the variant Korait rather suggests that they may be connected with the Kora caste. Resemblances between names, however, are but blind guides in questions of tribal affinity, and I doubt whether we can safely do more than surmise that Korait may probably have been the original name of the caste, which was corrupted into Gorait from its similarity in sound to the familiar title of the village messenger and watchman. Their specialised and comparatively degraded avocations, and the fact that they are not employed as village messengers, exclude the supposition that the converse process can have been at work, and that the bond of a common occupation may have formed a number of Goraites properly so called into an endogamous group bearing that name. Indeed, although nearly every village in Behar and Chota Nagpur has its Gorait, the profession, owing perhaps to its members being so scattered, shows no tendency towards hardening into a caste.

Gorait. 298

Marriage.

Gorait marry their daughters both as infants and as adults, but the former practice is deemed the more respectable, and is followed by all who can afford it. After the bride has been selected, the parents of the bridegroom go to her parents' house to see her. On this occasion a feast is given by the bride's people, at which the liquor—an essential element in all non-Aryan rejoicings—is provided by the father of the bridegroom, and four annas, eight annas, or one rupee is presented to the bride as muk-dekhi, or fee for the privilege of seeing her face. On the next day the girl's parents visit the boy, and are entertained wholly at his father's expense. Lastly, if both parties are satisfied with this mutual inspection, the boy's people go to the bride's house and present to her a new sari, a he-goat, and Rs. 3 to buy ornaments with. These constitute the bride-price (dali).

On the day before the wedding the bridegroom's party march in procession to the bride's house and stop there for the night. Next morning the fathers of the bride and bridegroom shake hands and embrace one another (samdhimila'n). Then, in the presence of some elders of the caste, the headman of the village and the priest of the rural gods (pdlm), who are received with great ceremony, the marriage is completed by the bride and bridegroom smearing vermillion on each other's foreheads (sindurdán), while the elders solemnly exhort them to work hard, eat, drink, and prosper and not get divorced. This meagre ceremony takes place in a bamboo marriage shed (marhua) erected in the courtyard. Brahmans are not called in, and the village barber takes no part in the ceremony. On the evening of the same day the bridegroom's party take the bride and bridegroom, both seated in the same palanquin, to the latter's house, where sindurdán is again performed. On that night the bridegroom, if he has attained puberty, sleeps with the bride. After three days the couple go to the bride's house and stay there nine days, returning finally to their own home on the tenth day.

Polygamy is permitted, and there is no rule limiting the number of wives. A widow may marry again, and her choice is not fettered by the obligation to marry her late husband's younger brother. The ritual used at the marriage differs from that in use at the marriage of a virgin in that no marheca is constructed and the money portion of the bride-price is only Re. 1. Sinduridū is performed in the presence of the widow's relatives, but there is no marriage procession, and the bride is taken home without any display. According to some authorities if the widow elects to live on with her brother-in-law, it is sufficient to announce this intention to the relatives, and no ceremony of any kind is required.

A divorce (chhorā-chhuri) may be granted by the caste council (panchéyat) if the wife is proved to be unchaste, or if she frequently runs away to her father's house without the permission of her husband. Proceedings may also be initiated by the wife on the ground that her husband is too old for her or is an habitual drunkard. Divorced women may marry again by sagai.

Goraits profess to be Hindus, but they have not yet attained to the dignity of employing Brahmans. They worship Devi Mai and a tribal spirit called Purubia, to whom a goat is sacrificed once a year. In cases of illness an exorcist (ma'it baiga) is called in to detect the demon or witch who is giving trouble. If this personage ascribes the visitation to the wrath of the tribal god, the pahn is sent for, and a goat, pig, sheep, or fowl sacrificed. Those who can afford to do so burn the dead, but the bodies of the poor are buried with the head to the north. No regular śrāddh is performed. On the tenth day after death the nearest relative of the deceased gets himself shaved and gives a feast to the friends of the family.

In point of social status Goraits rank with Lohrés and Ghásis, and no respectable people will take water from their hands. They eat beef, pork, and field-rats, and indulge freely in spirituous and fermented liquors. As has been already stated, they find employment as hired musicians at weddings and various kinds of festivities, as makers of bamboo combs and carders of cotton. Some are employed in agriculture as non-occupancy raiyats or agricultural labourers (Đhāngars) engaged by the year for a lump sum of Rs. 5 paid down at the time of hiring, one kat and a half (about 38 seers) of paddy per month, and four yards of cloth at the end of the year.

In 1881 there were 61 Goraits in Hazaribagh, 3,856 in Lohardagá, and 43 in Singbhum. There was no separate entry for Goraits in 1872.
Prem Ghuno gotra. They make butter and sell milk and curds. Also a sub-caste of Dhobis in Manbhum, and of Chamárs in Behar who will not make shoes and disown the title Muchi.

Goriár, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Goro, a sub-caste of Khatwes in Behar; a sub-caste of Goálés in Chota Nagpur.

Gorsár, a sub-caste of Dhobis in Behar.

Goru, cow, a totemistic section of Jagannáthi Kumhárás in Orissa.

Gosain, Goswámi, Gonesá, Gonsiá, a master of his passions, a religious mendicant; a title of a class of Brahmans, the original disciples of Chaitanya, who are spiritual guides of the worshippers of Vishnu. In Bengal the term is usually applied to Jugis and the Grihi or Grihastha Vaishnavas, who are allowed to marry and follow secular pursuits. It is also used as a common title, just as Banarji, Bhatácharji, etc. Socially it denotes a class of people who manufacture and sell threads, corresponding to Jugis. A synonym for Bharági.

Gosainji, a synonym for Brahman.

Gosainpanthi, a sect of religious mendicants.

Gosti, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Goswálambí, a guín of the Bharadwája gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Gotama, Gautama, a section of Brahmans.

Gotanyá, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Gothar, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Gothi, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Gothwál, a section of Goálés in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Gotramási, a section of Béruis in Bengal.

Gotsobhni, a muñ or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálés in Behar.

Govariyá, a hypergamous group of Tiyars found in Bhagalpur.

Govindpuriá, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal and of Loháras in the Santál Parganas.

Gowe, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Gozár, a title of Dhobis in Behar.

Grahábipra, “Planet-Brahman,” a title of Kóhárji Brahmans.

Graháchárji, Grahácháriya, “Teacher of the Planets,” a title of Kóhárji Brahmans.

Grandan, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Gránjá, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Grihasodháni, a guín of the Bátaya gotra of Uttár-Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Grihasth, a synonym for Bábhan; a functional group of Jugis in Bengal composed of four families—Dhanái Mandel, Jnanbar, Bhagan Bhaján, and Paban.

Grihi, householders, a sept of Mál Pabaériás in the Santál Parganas.

Gúá, areca-nut, a sub-sept of the Hemrom sept of Santáls; a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Guábári, a mu or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Guáburi, the highest thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling, whose members, in the absence of a Brahman, are called in to perform the ceremony of nuarmi, that is, the purification of a woman after birth of a child. They are also employed for the ceremonies of marriage and funerals.

Gudar, a group of the Aoghar sect of Saiva ascetics founded in Guzerat by a Dañámi mendicant named Brahmagirí. See Aoghar.

Guha, a title of Káyasths in Bengal.

Guhai, Gonhhi, a sub-caste of Baniyas.

Gui, a title of Dakshin-Ráhí Káyasths; of Mayará, Tántis, and of Kaibarttás in Bengal.

Gujiá or Godágá, a sub-caste of Ahirs or Goálás in Behar who are cow-doctors.

Gujráti or Gurjara, a territorial division of the Pancha Dravira Brahmans who live in the south of the Vindhya range in Gurjarashtra, the country of the Gujráti language. Persons bearing this title are found in Behar, they claim to have originally come from Gujrat, and are usually engaged in trade. In Patna they are said to make pickles.

Gulgo, a sept of the Bhumij tribe in Manbhum.

Gulguliá, a wandering non-Aryan tribe, who live by hunting, teaching monkeys to dance, selling indigenous drugs, begging, and petty thieving. Their origin is obscure, but it seems likely that they are a branch of the Bediyás. I have been unable to obtain any trustworthy information regarding the internal structure of the caste. Some Gulguliás in Gya assured me that they had three sub-castes—Bantari, Pachpaniá, and Sukwár—and I mention this statement in case it may be of use to other inquirers. My informants seemed to be stupid and ignorant men, and I doubt whether their evidence was worth much. They have a legend that Rukmini, the reputed ancestress of the Pási caste, had a son, called Mohábébé, who in his turn had seven sons, Gaiduha, Byadhá, Tirsuliá, Magháyá, Turk (the Mahomedan Pási), Gilehri, and Gulguliá. These seven sons challenged each other to jump off the top of a palmýra tree (tár). Gilehri (the squirrel) jumped first and landed unhurt. Tirsuliá, who went second, was killed on the spot, whereupon Mohábébé, seeing that Gilehri had led the others into trouble, smote him with his hand and cursed him to be reckoned among the inferior animals and to be fortunate only in this, that he should jump from great heights and come to no harm. This is the reason why the squirrel is a good jumper and bears the marks of five fingers on his back. The story goes on, in a somewhat inconsequent fashion, to say that the next to leave the family was Gulguliá, who observed that his brothers, after serving their customers with tári, always washed the cup, however low the caste of the man who had drunk from it. This struck the youngest brother—in folklore it is usually the youngest brother who takes a line for himself—as showing a great want of self-respect, and he at once decided to throw over his family and adopt a wandering life. His descendants are true to the traditions of their mythical eponym, and during the dry season at least have no fixed habitations. In the rains they build themselves a sort of tente d'abri about eight feet long by six feet wide, of two bamboo uprights and a ridge pole covered in with a tilt of sirki matting (Saccharum sara, Roxb.), which reaches to the ground on either side. The whole thing can be struck and carried off at a moment’s notice if the owner and his family want to change their quarters in a hurry—a common chance with a tribe of predatory instincts, whom the police are ever ready to credit with every petty theft that baffles their slender detective ability. Such huts or rather tents are usually found on the outskirts of large villages, and the Gulguliás, though they will never admit that they have a fixed residence anywhere, do in fact usually return, if not to the same village, at least to the same neighbourhood, for the rainy season, when frequent shifting even of the most portable habitation is apt to cause much discomfort, especially to people who keep no beasts of burden and carry their house themselves.
GULGULIA.

Gulguliás affect to practise infant-marriage, but admit that poverty often leads to a girl’s marriage being deferred until she has passed the age of puberty. As is the case with gypsies in other parts of the world, their women have a certain reputation for chastity, and sexual indiscretions are said to be rare. When anything of the kind occurs, the woman in fault is turned out of the caste, and the man with whom she has gone wrong is fined Rs. 10 or so by the chief of the pancháyat. This official is elected by an assembly of the local representatives of the caste, and holds office until displaced by the same authority. The marriage ceremony is a meagre copy of the ritual followed by low-caste Hindus. The functions of priest are usually performed by two men selected at the time from the family of the bride and bridegroom, but sometimes the village barber is called in to officiate. A bride-price of from four to six maunds of rice and Rs. 3 in cash is usually paid. Polygamy is allowed, but is rarely resorted to owing to the extreme poverty of the caste. A widow may marry again, and it often happens that she marries her deceased husband’s younger brother. To him in any case belongsthe custody of her children by her late husband, but in some cases it would appear that the pancháyat of the caste exercises the right of allotting the children to the widow in the event of her marrying an outsider.

The religion of the Gulguliás appears to be a form of the animism which characterises the aboriginal races. They worship a host of spiritual powers, whose attributes are ill-defined, and who are not conceived as wearing any bodily form. This at least may be inferred from the fact that they make no images, and that Baktáwar, the tutelary deity of the Patna Gulguliás, is represented by a small mound of hardened clay set up in an earthen plate. Among their objects of worship we find also Jagdámá or Devi, Rám Thákur, Baren, Setti, Goraiya, Bandi, Parameswari, and Dák. In Hazaribagh they worship Dánu in the form of a stone daubed with five streaks of red lead and set up outside the house. The offerings made to these deities consist usually of rice, milk, fruit, and sweetmeats, which are afterwards eaten by the worshippers.

In disposing of the dead they have the curious practice of pouring some country spirit into the dead man's mouth and killing a fowl, so that the spirit may be satisfied and may not come back to trouble his relatives with bad dreams. The corpse is then burned and the ashes thrown into a tank.

Although the squirrel is the reputed ancestor of the caste, Gulguliás are so far from regarding the animal as sacred that its flesh forms their favourite food. Spearing squirrels with a series of seven reeds (narsar), which fit one into the other like the joints of a fishing rod, is a pursuit at which they are specially expert, and some say that the name Gulguliá is derived from a peculiar noise, sounding like gui gui, which they make in order to attract the squirrel's attention while they are gradually bringing the narsar within stabbing distance. Another theory is that they are called Gulguliás, 'the chatterers,' because they use a peculiar patois or thieves' slang understood only among themselves. The narsar is also used for spearing birds. Gulguliás never cultivate themselves, but they are in the habit of gleaning what is left on the ground after the crops are cut. Begging, pilfering, and exhibiting goats and monkeys are their chief means of livelihood. They buy monkeys from the Birhors, whom they affect to look down upon for their promiscuous habits in the matter of food. Gulguliás themselves profess to abstain from beef, but they eat pork, field-rats, a variety of small birds and animals, and the leavings of all Hindu castes except the Dhobi, Dom, Musáhar, Hári, and Chamár. Their women sell drugs and profess to cure a variety of small ailments, such as earache, toothache, rheumatism, and the like. It is rumoured that they also know remedies for barrenness, and will supply medicines which facilitate parturition and bring about abortion.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Gulguliás in 1881. There is no separate entry of them in 1872:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Occupation</th>
<th>Patna</th>
<th>Ghogra</th>
<th>Darbhanga</th>
<th>Monghyr</th>
<th>Purniah</th>
<th>Hasaribagh</th>
<th>Singbhum</th>
<th>Manbhum</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Funerals</td>
<td>254</td>
<td>99</td>
<td>113</td>
<td>77</td>
<td>125</td>
<td>456</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>92</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Guli, a sub-caste of Bégdis, the men cultivate, while the women catch and sell fish.
GUMI.

Gumi, a section of Goalas in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Gurniá, a sub-caste of Goalas in Behar.

Gun, Gura, a title of Káyasthas in Bengal.

Gundi, a section of Kaibarttas in Orissa.

Gundki, a kind of wood, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Gundli, a section of Mahilias in Chota Nagpur.

Gundri, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Gungambhir, a section of Kanaújá Loháras in Behar.

Gunj, a kind of fruit, a totemistic sept of Loháras in Chota Nagpur.

Gunwariéi, a section of Rajputs in Bhagalpur, to which the Rája of Sonbarsé belongs.

Gupta, a title of Dakshin-Rárhí and Bangaja Káyasthas, and of Siddha Baidyas in Bengal.

Gupta Rai or Rai Gupta, a title of Baidyas in Bengal.

Gur, a gáin of the Kasyapa gotra of Rárhí Brahmans in Bengal; a title of Támblísa.

GURUNG.

Gura Gáin, a thar of the Dhánjaya gotra of Nepáli Brahmanas.

Guráh, a section of Goalas in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Gureni, a muñ or section of the Tinmuliá Madhesí sept of Halwáis in Behar.

Guriá, the confectioner caste in Orissa. Also a sub-caste of Malláhs in Behar.

Guri-Báwá, a sub-caste of Korás in Chota Nagpur.

Gurjar Gaura, a sub-caste of Gaura Brahmanas.

Gurnáchhan, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gurni, a vegetable, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Guromani, a section of Mangars in Darjiling.

Guru, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur who cannot eat beef.

Gurum, a synonym for Gurung in Darjiling.

Gurumbo, Gyu-rumbo, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhöris whose ancestor had emigrated from Bhotan.

Gurung, Gurungá, Gurungáh, one of the best of the fighting tribes of Nepal, divided into two endogamous sub-castes and a number of septs shown in Appendix I. Gurungs marry their daughters as adults, and like most Nepalese castes allow great license in the matter of divorce on repayment of the bride-price to the woman's father. Divorced women may marry again by the full ceremony, a privilege denied to the widow who may live with a man, especially with her late husband’s younger brother (but not the elder) as his concubine, but cannot go through any ceremony. The caste was once Buddhist, and is now Hindu, Bhim Sen, the second of the Pandava brethren, being their favourite deity. They still retain pronounced traces of the primitive animism which they professed before their conversion to Buddhism, and worship the mountains and rivers, offering flowers and grass to the former and food to the latter. This worship seems to be of a propitiatory kind, and is celebrated more particularly for recovery from illness or relief from domestic calamity. Brahmans serve them as priests, but if no Brahman is available, a member of the Guaburi thar may take his place and may perform the ceremonies of marriage and disposal of the dead and nuarmi or purification after childbirth. All Gurungs bury their dead, except members of the Urunta thar, who burn their dead on a hill top and throw the ashes in the air. At funerals a man of the Leh-lama thar casts earth on the grave and recites mystical formulae (mantras) supposed to put the soul of the dead man to rest. In other respects the ceremony is the same as that used by the Sunuwar tribe. Gurungs abstain from beef, pork, or vermin, but eat the flesh of the buffalo and wild pigs and the domestic fowl. The four castes—Chattri or Khas, Gurung, Mangar, and Sunuwar—are classed together as mukhya or chief. With members of the other castes included in this group a Gurung will not formally intermarry, but if one of them runs away with his daughter, he will accept the bride-price of Rs. 140 or some definite fraction of that amount. A woman thus married cannot cook rice or dal for her husband, but may make bread or cook meat. If a Gurung steals a wife from one of the other castes in this manner, her children will be admitted into the Gurung caste, but once admitted they may not eat rice cooked by their mother. If he marries a girl of the Kirant group, her children are not reckoned as Gurungs.

Guru Táshi, the blessed rm' Gyéséin, a section of the or sept of the Tongdu sub-tribe of Dejong Lhoris, of which Guru Pema was guide.
Guta, a title of Dakshin-Bárhi Káyasaths in Bengal.
Gyángri, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Gyásáin, a section of the Amashta Káyasaths in Behar.
Gyon-sah-pá, he of the new monastery, a rui or sept of the Bed tsahan-gye sub-tribe of Dejong Lhoris or Bhotias of the south.
Habibpur Phupidih, a mu`l or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goélès in Behar.

Habin, a tree, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hádá, a section of Goélès in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Hadauriár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Hadkwél, a section of Goélès in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Hadung, black tree-ant, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Háfiz, a reciter of the Koran.

Hah-po, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhoris whose ancestor had emigrated from North Bhotan.

Haiboru Lángi, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Haidibuthá, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Haio, a ikar or sept of Mangeris in Darjiling.

Hajam, a synonym for Bhandári.

Hajám, ¹ Naí, Náu, Nauá, the barber caste of Behar, popularly supposed to have been specially created by Viswakarmá for the convenience of Mahádeva. There are seven sub-castes—Awadhiá, Kanaujía or Biáhut, Tirhutiá, Sribástab or Bástar, Magahiyá, Bangáli, and Turk-Nauwá. Of these, the Awadhiá claim to have come from Oudh; the Kanaujía from Kanauj; the Tirhutiá are located on the north, and the Magahiyá on the south of the Ganges; the Bangáli are immigrants from Bengal into the border districts of Behar; and the Turk-Nauwá are Muhammadans. The sections of the Awadhiá and Kanaujía sub-castes are shown in Appendix I. Most of them are of the territorial type. The former observe a highly complex system of exogamy, which forbids marriage into the sections to which the following relatives belong:—(1) Father, (2) paternal grand-mother, (3) paternal great-grand-mothers, (4) paternal great-great-grand-mothers; (5) mother, (6) maternal grand-mother, (7) maternal great-grand-mothers. In applying these rules to a particular case, the double method of reckoning explained in the article on Bás is resorted to; so that if one of the bridegroom's paternal great-great-grand-mothers should have belonged to the same section as one of the bride's great-grandmothers, the marriage will be disallowed, although the bride and bridegroom themselves belong to different sections. The other sub-castes appear either to have no sections or to have borrowed a few of the Brahmanical gotras. All observe the standard formula for determining prohibited degrees, calculated to seven, or, in the case of the Awadhia, to four generations in the descending line.

¹ Mr. Nesfield calls the Hindu barber Nápit, and says that the name Hajám is confined to the Muhammadan barber. This, however, is not the case in Behar.

With rare exceptions, Hajams marry their daughters as infants, and ordinarily pay a small bridegroom-price (tilak), varying with the means and relative status of the families. The ceremony is of the standard type, sindur-dan being considered the essential and binding portion. Polygamy is permitted if the first wife be barren, but even in this case a man may not have more than two wives. He may marry his wife's younger sister during the former's lifetime, but not an elder sister. In all the sub-castes, except the Biáhut and Sribásab, widows may marry again, and are restricted by no positive conditions in their selection of a second husband, though it is considered right and proper for a widow to marry her deceased husband's younger brother if there is one. Divorce is not generally recognised by the Hajams of Behar: a faithless wife is turned adrift and ceases to be a member of the caste. In Paláman, the Santál Parganas, and parts of Darbhanga adultery by the wife and incompatibility of temper are admitted as grounds of divorce. A pancháyat is summoned to decide the question, and if cause is shown for a divorce a stick is solemnly snapped in two, a leaf torn, or an earthen vessel broken in pieces to symbolise the rupture of the marriage bond. Divorced wives may marry again by the sagai form.

The religion of the caste does not differ materially from the average Hinduism of the middle classes in Behar. Kanauji or Srotri Brahmans serve them as priests, and are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. In addition to the minor gods recognised throughout Behar, the head of a Hajám household worships Baniráman or Gaiyán with offerings of castrated goats, molasses, sweetmeats, betel leaves, and ganja. Dharm Dás, said to have been a Hajám himself, is also worshipped in similar fashion. The dead are burned, and the ceremony of śrāddh is performed on the thirteenth day after death. Periodical libations (tāypan) are offered in the month of Asin for the benefit of deceased ancestors.

The social standing of the caste is respectable, and Brahmans will take water from their hands. They themselves will eat kachholi food prepared by Brahmans, Rajputs, Bábhans, and high-caste Banias, and will take pakki articles from members of those castes from whom Brahmans will receive water. Their own rules regarding diet are the same as are followed by most orthodox Hindus, but they are believed not to be very particular as to the use of spirituous liquors.

The importance of the place taken by the barber in the constitution of the Hindu village community and the religious sanctions on which many of his functions depend are well brought out by Mr. Nesfield in the following remarks:

"Every child after the age of six months or a year undergoes the ceremony of having its head for the first time touched with the razor. This is a ceremony of no little importance in the eyes of a Hindu, and is called churn karan. It is performed in the presence of some deity, or rather in that of his image, who is believed henceforth to take the child under his special patronage. The cutting off of the birth-hair is believed to remove the last trace of the congenital taint inherited from the maternal womb, and hence the ceremony has the same significance as that of a baptismal or lustral rite. The custom of cutting off the birth-hair has been widely practised among backward races elsewhere, and is not at all confined to the natives of India. The germs of the barber caste may therefore have existed in times before the Aryan had appeared.

"In funeral ceremonies the Népit plays an important part. He shaves the head and pares the nails of the dead preparatory to cremation. He shaves the head of the man who puts the first light to the pyre. Ten days afterwards he shaves the head of every member of the household. By this time, after taking a final bath, they are purified of the contagion of death.

"In the celebration of marriage ceremonies he acts as the Brahman's assistant, and to the lowest castes or tribes, who cannot employ a Brahman, he is himself the matrimonial priest. The important part he plays in marriage ceremonies has led to his becoming the match-maker among all the respectable castes. It is he who hunts out the boy, finds out whether his clan or caste is marriageable with that of the girl, settles the price to be paid on both sides, takes the horoscopes to the Brahman to be compared, so as to see if the stars are favourable, carries the presents from one house to the other, and so forth. His function as match-maker is not an unimportant one in a state of society in which the rules of caste have imposed endless restrictions on the freedom of marriage.

"Shaving is not the only service that he is expected to render to his constituents. He is the ear-cleaner, nail-cutter, supper, and bleeder, etc. In short, he performs any kind of operation on the body of man that requires a sharp knife, from shaving a beard to lancing a boil. He might therefore be fitly styled a barber-surgeon. In this double capacity he is the exact counterpart of the barber-surgeons of mediaeval Europe, out of whom the modern medical profession has sprung. His wife acts as nurse to the mother and child for the last six days of the confinement. During the first six days they are in charge of the midwife—some woman of the less respected castes of Chamár, Dhánuk, or others. She also pares the nails of the newborn child, and receives a fee for doing so." In Behar the Hajám is sent round with invitations to weddings and funerals, and announces the birth of a child to the relations in the neighbourhood. For this he gets a small fee, which is higher in the case of a first-born child, especially if it be a son. The ordinary charge for shaving is one pice, but the regular village barber gets a variety of periodical perquisites, and does not charge by the job. Among these perquisites Mr. Grierson mentions kharecon, an armful of the crop given at harvest-time; kera, a smaller bundle; and púri, three handfuls. Many Hajáms, besides practising their hereditary functions, are also cultivators themselves, but none of them appear to have risen above the status of occupancy raiyats. In some parts of the country they hold tenures granted to them rent-free or at a quit-rent by the local zamindars as remuneration for their professional services. In the Chota Nagpur estate such tenures go by the name of bhittand, a term which includes the holdings bestowed upon table-servants, gold and silversmiths, grooms, chodbars or mace-bearers, palanquin-bearers, khakts or mendicants, and prostitutes. While actually in attendance on the Raja, all these people usually received a small daily allowance in addition to the proceeds of their tenures. These lands are not alienable by the holders, and are believed to be liable to resumption when service is no longer required. In the Pachet estate in Manbhum, these petty chakaran are usually rent-free, but in a few they are subject to a very small quit-rent or mughuli jamā.

1 Behar Peasant Life p. 319.

The Turk-nauwā or Muhammadan barber is not so intimately associated with religious offices as his Hindu namesake, and holds a far lower social position. His services are not indispensable, and he is therefore less independent and wayward than the Hindu barber is popularly supposed to be. Musicians (Bajuniā) used formerly to be selected from among Muhammadan barbers, but of late the two classes have been gradually separating. Like barbers in other countries, they dabble in medicine and surgery; consequently they are often styled Bhedī, from their skill in extracting worms from decayed teeth, and Más-Kāta, from circumcising boys. In many parts of the country they are also the Abdāl, who geld bulls; but any Mussulman peasant will castrate kids. When not otherwise employed, they cultivate the soil. Their women sell mantra, or magical formulæ, against toothache, earache, and neuralgic pains; and prepare liniments to cure colic and other internal disorders.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Hajāms in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bīrbhūm</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bā-Parānas</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dīnajpur</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rāmpur</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pārīpur</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahābād</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thīrīhur {Monpurpur}</td>
<td>50,356</td>
<td>31,001</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dāranga</td>
<td>31,001</td>
<td>31,001</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Bīrbhūm, Bā-Parānas, Dīnajpur, Rāmpur, Darjiling, Pārīpur, Patna, Gya, Shahābād, Thīrīhur, and Dāranga are all in the Chota Nagpur. Behar.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Hajāms in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bīrbhūm</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bā-Parānas</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dīnajpur</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rāmpur</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>150</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pārīpur</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahābād</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thīrīhur {Monpurpur}</td>
<td>31,001</td>
<td>50,356</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dāranga</td>
<td>31,001</td>
<td>50,356</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Hajeri, a kind of tree or bush, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hajjam Thākur, a title of barbers in Behar.

Hajrā, Házrā, (i) in Bengal a title of Kāhrttas; (ii) in Behar a title of Dōsādh, used in practice as a synonym for the caste.
Hakim, a Mahomedan physician.

Hakkak, a maker of glass beads, a lapidary; an occupation usually followed by Mahomedans.

Haladhar, a title of Chasantadhobas and Kaibarttas in Bengal.

Halalkhor (halal, ‘lawful,’ and khordan, ‘to eat,’) one to whom all food is lawful; hence, a sweeper. A class of Mahomedan mehtars; also a class of musicians; a synonym for Mehtar, Khakrob, and Bhangi.

Haldar, a title of Srotriya Brahmans, Kaysaths, Baniyas, and Telis; a title of honour amongst the lower castes, such as Kaibarttas, Kapalis, Chandals, Chasantadhobas, Mahals, and some Mahomedans in Bengal.

Halda-Paramnik, a sub-caste of Naptas in the 24-Parganas.

Halwai, the confectioner caste of Behar, often confounded with the Kandu, who is properly a grain parcher, though he also deals in sweetmeats. The two castes, however, are entirely distinct, and do not intermarry with one another. The name Halwai is derived from halda, a sweetmeat made of flour, clarified butter, and sugar, coloured onds, raisins, and pistachio nuts.

The sub-castes and sections of Halwais are shown in Appendix I. They give no clue to the origin of the caste, which is clearly a functional group composed of members of respectable middle-class castes who adopted the profession of sweetmeat-making. The sections, which are very numerous, seem to be of the territorial type, and bear no traces of either totemism or eponymy. The rule of exogamy is carefully observed. A man may not marry a woman of his own section, or of the sections to which his mother and his paternal grand-mother belong. These sections, moreover, are taken into account on both sides; so that if the proposed bride’s mother belonged to the same section as the bridegroom’s paternal grand-mother, no marriage can take place, although the parties themselves belong to different sections. Prohibited degrees are reckoned by the standard formula calculated to seven generations in the descending line.
As a general rule Halwáis marry their daughters as infants, but they do not take an extreme view of the necessity of doing so, and no slur attaches to a man who from poverty or any other reason is unable to get his daughter married before she attains the age of puberty. In fact some Halwáis of the Kanaují sub-caste have assured me that they do not think it right to get their daughters married under eleven or twelve years of age. The marriage ceremony in vogue does not differ materially from that used by other Behar castes of about the same social standing. Sindurduán, or the smearing of vermillion on the bride's forehead and the parting of her hair, is deemed to be the binding portion of the ritual. Polygamy is permitted when the first wife is barren, but in no case may a man have more than two wives. A widow may marry again by the sagai form. She is free to choose any one she will for her second husband, provided that the prohibited degrees are observed; and she is not required to marry her late husband's younger brother or cousin, as is the custom in some castes. In practice, however, it often happens that she does marry the next brother, as he in any case can claim the custody of the children she may have had by her first husband. A very singular custom is observed when a bachelor marries a widow. The ceremony takes place, as is the usual practice, in the widow's house, but before going there the bridegroom is formally married in his own house to a sword or a piece of iron, which he bedaub with vermillion as if it were his bride. With this may be compared the usage common among the Kándu caste of marrying to a sword a daughter who by reason of some physical defect is not considered likely to find a husband. The theory seems to be that the full marriage ceremony is a sort of sacrament, which must be partaken of by every one at least once in life. On the question of divorce there is some difference of practice among the sub-castes. The Kanaují and Pachimi-Madhésia do not recognise the authority of the pancháyat as between husband and wife, and if a woman proves faithless turn her out of the house without further ceremony. In the Magahiya and Purbíya-Madhésia sub-castes a charge of unchastity on the part of the wife or of persistent ill-treatment on the part of the husband is laid before the pancháyat or caste council, who, after taking evidence and hearing what both parties have to say, may dissolve the marriage, either party being at liberty to marry again.

The majority of the caste are Vaishnavas, and comparatively few adherents of other sects are found among them. For religious and ceremonial purposes they employ Maithil Brahmans, who are received on equal terms by all other members of the sacred order, except by those who regard it as unworthy of a Brahman to serve any man as priests. The minor god Ghanináth is worshipped on Saturdays with offerings of rice, fruit, and sweetmeats, which are afterwards eaten by the members of the household. At marriages a fee of one anna is paid by the bride, and two annas by the bridegroom for the worship of this deity. The members of the caste also hold in honour Bandí, Goráiyá, and other minor gods of Behar, and many of them are adherents of the Panch Piriya sect. Halwás burn their dead and perform the ceremony of śraddha on the thirty-first day after death.

The social standing of the Halwá is respectable, and Brahmans will take water from his hands. "His art," says Mr. Nesfield, "implies rather an advanced stage of culture, and hence his rank in the social scale is a high one. There is no caste in India which is too pure to eat what a confectioner has made. In marriage banquets it is he who supplies a large part of the feast, and at all times and seasons the sweetmeat is a favourite viand to a Hindu requiring temporary refreshment. There is a kind of bread called purí, which contains no sugary element, but yet it is specially prepared by men of the confectioner caste. It consists of wheaten dough fried in melted butter, and is taken as a substitute for the chapati or wheaten pancake by travellers and others who happen to be unable to have their bread cooked at their own fire. With the exception of Brahmans, there is no class of men in India which declines to eat a buttered pancake prepared by the Halwái; and considering the immense amount of fuss (involving even forfeiture of caste) which is attached to the domestic fire-place, this says much for the respect in which the Halwái is held. As in the case of the Bāri, the caste which makes leaf-plates for all classes of the community, considerations of general convenience have no doubt contributed something to the social respectability of the confectioner caste." The rules of the caste regarding their own diet are much the same as those followed by other Hindus of about the same standing. None of them will eat the leavings of the higher castes, even of the Brahmans who serve them as priests; and members of the Madhesia sub-caste profess to abstain from wine. Only a small proportion of the caste have taken to agriculture, and those are mostly occupancy raiyats. Men of the Magahia and Bantriá sub-castes are often servants or petty shop-keepers, and many Magahia Halwás combine grain-parching with the characteristic business of their caste. The Mahomedan Halwás found in most districts of Bengal are an entirely distinct class, and there is no reason to suppose that they are recruited by conversion from among the ranks of the Hindu confectioners. According to Dr. Wise, the art of preserving fruits in sugar or vinegar is unknown to the Hindus, and all the preserves procurable in the bazars of the East are made by the Musalmán Halwái, who, however, destroys by too many spices and by excess of sugar the natural flavour of the fruit. The Halwái prepares jams of mango, cocoanut, ginger, and bél, and candies oranges, citrons, and bél fruit. The pickles (āchar), consumed in large quantities by all Muhammadans, are of three kinds, prepared with vinegar, mustard oil, or salt. The Halwái likewise makes his own vinegar with sugar, molasses, and water, and with it preserves vegetables and fruits of all kinds. Mangoes and limes are, however, often preserved in mustard oil to which pounded mustard seed has been added. Jára, or fruit in brine, is highly recommended as an aid to digestion when eaten as dessert. Arab pedlars bring the best to Bengal, but in Dacca the aromatic lime, known as kāghare, from the fineness of its rind, is usually preserved in this way.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Halwais in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>994</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>148</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>159</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>119</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>220</td>
<td>217</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>351</td>
<td>339</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>105</td>
<td>107</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munsabad</td>
<td>112</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>1,994</td>
<td>1,858</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajabahye</td>
<td>85</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranthapur</td>
<td>196</td>
<td>196</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>136</td>
<td>136</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bara</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purna</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>187</td>
<td>189</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpore</td>
<td>149</td>
<td>149</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>532</td>
<td>535</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dakso</td>
<td>641</td>
<td>635</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baskaranj</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainmanish</td>
<td>37</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1873</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>9,716</td>
<td>10,418</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>11,195</td>
<td>12,905</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>4,453</td>
<td>4,383</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tirhub { Munderpur }</td>
<td>45,577</td>
<td>10,727</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dharbhanga</td>
<td>35,233</td>
<td>35,233</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>1,106</td>
<td>1,167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champanar</td>
<td>5,599</td>
<td>4,705</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhaaratpur</td>
<td>21,096</td>
<td>22,287</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purna</td>
<td>7,889</td>
<td>7,670</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Malda</td>
<td>69</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>8,624</td>
<td>4,178</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Belasore</td>
<td>1,060</td>
<td>1,044</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,079</td>
<td>2,213</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardagha</td>
<td>3,006</td>
<td>3,003</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Singdharam</td>
<td>104</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>9,640</td>
<td>9,738</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>253</td>
<td>253</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Hamdábadí, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Hán, nest of ants, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hanidi, a section of the Bahám-najáti sub-castes of Khatri in Bengal.

Hándi, earthen vessel, a sub-sect of the Murmu sept of Santás.

Hangam, the king's officer, a sept of the Misákholia sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Hanjait, kutuná fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hanre, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hánriá, a mul or section of the Timmuliah Madheiah sub-caste of Halwais in Behar.

Hansa, wild goose or swan, a totemistic sept of Mundas and Gonds in Chota Nagpur; a section of Kumhrs in Jessore.

Hánsá, a section of the Magahiya, Pachainiya, and Tirhutiya sub-castes of Doms in Behar.

Hansadaha-Parámanik, a sub-caste of Nápis in the 24-Parganas.

Hansarishi, a Brahmanical section of Khatri in Bengal.

Hansarwar, duck, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

lársá, Hasdak or Hadsagíar, a totemistic sept of the Bhumij, Turis, Kharwars, Kóras, Hos, Kúrmis, Kórwás, Santás and Málhís in Chota Nagpur, the members of which will not touch, kill, or eat a wild goose.

Hansi, a title of Tántis in Bengal and a section of Majraut Goálás in Behar.
HANSI-TANTI. 314

Hansi-Tánti, a sub-caste of Tántis in Orissa.

Hansnemba, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Hánsotá, a section of the Pachainyá sub-caste of Domas in Behar.

Hánthi, elephant, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hanuman, monkey, a totemistic sept of Mundas and Chikas in Chota Nagpur; a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Har, a gátin of the Kásyapa gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Hár, plough, a totemistic sept of Korwas in Chota Nagpur; a section of the Tírhutiyá sub-caste of Domas in Behar.

Hará, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Harabans, a sept of the Suryabansí sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Harariá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Harbang, a sept of Tipperáhs in the Hill Tracts of Chittángong.

Harbans, a sept of Chamárs and Dománs in Chota Nagpur, the members of which cannot wear bones in any shape.

Hári, Mihtar, Har-Santán, a menial and scavenger caste of Bengal Proper, which Dr. Wise identifies with the Bhuinmálí and regards as “the remnant of a Hinduisèd aboriginal tribe which was driven into Bengal by the Aryas or the persecuting Muhammadans.” This conjecture is borne out by the physical features of the caste, and by the fact that Harchanpúriá, a section of the Banodhíá and Jaiswár Kalwárí in Behar.

Hardá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Hardí, turmeric, a totemistic sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Hardiál, a section of Bás Sonárs in Behar.

Hardwar, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hardwár, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárí; a mul or section of the Ayodhiá-básí sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Hargambái, a section of the Amsáhta sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.

Hargamiá, a section of Awádhiá Hajáms in Behar.

Hargurra, bone, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hári, a synonym for Korá, used inaccurately by outsiders only; a synonym for Bhuinmálí; a sub-caste of Ghásí in Chota Nagpur; a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur whose ancestors are said not to have washed their mouths after eating; a section of the Dhaprá sub-caste of Domás in Behar.
wherever we can trace the affinities of the menial castes we find them to have been largely recruited, if not entirely drawn, from the ranks of the aboriginal races. The internal structure of the Hari caste throws no light upon its origin, as at the present day there are no sections, and marriage is regulated solely by counting prohibited degrees. The sub-castes are the following:—Bará-bhágíyá or Káorá-páík, Madhya-bhágíyá or Madhaukul, Khore or Khoriyá, Siuli, Mihtar, Bangáli, Maghayá, Karaiyá, Purandwár. Of these, the Mihtar sub-caste alone are employed in removing night-soil; the Bará-bhágíyá serve as chaukidárs, musicians, and palki-bearers; the Khore keep pigs; the Siuli tap date-palms for their juice; and the rest cultivate. Some authorities include Ghási among the sub-castes of Hari, but I have preferred to treat them as a separate caste.

Háris admit both infant and adult-marriage, but the former practice is deemed the more respectable, and all parents endeavour to get their daughters married before the age of puberty. Adult-marriage, however, still holds its ground, and sexual intercourse before marriage is said to be more or less tolerated. Their marriage ceremony presents some curious features, which seem to be survivals of non-Aryan usage. After the bride-price has been settled and a lucky day fixed for the marriage, the parties meet in the bride’s house. The bride and bridegroom are seated opposite to each other, each on the thigh of the father or nearest male relative of a full age. They then change places, the bride sitting on the lap of the bridegroom’s father and the bridegroom on that of the bride’s father. This is repeated five times. After that the right hand little finger of the bridegroom’s sister’s husband is pricked, and a drop or two of blood allowed to fall on a few threadsof jute, which are rolled up into a tiny pellet. This the bridegroom holds in his hand, while the bride attempts to snatch it from him. Her success in the attempt is deemed to be of good omen for the happiness of the marriage. Last of all, the bridegroom smears vermillion on the forehead of the bride. Polygamy is permitted, but is rarely resorted to in practice, as few Háris can afford to maintain more than one wife. There seems to be no definite rule on the subject, and the caste inclines rather to the practice of the aboriginal races than to the more civilised restriction which allows a second wife to be taken only in the event of the first being barren. Some, however, favour this latter view, and hold that even if offspring fail, a man may in no case have more than three wives. A widow may marry again by the ceremony called chumaumá or nikáh, of which the binding portion is the exchange of garlands of flowers, but she is not permitted to marry her husband’s younger brother. No reason is assigned for thus prohibiting an alliance which is usually regarded with special favour by the castes which permit widow-marriage. But it may represent an advance towards the entire abolition of widow-marriage—a step which has already been taken by the Bhuinmálí-Háris of Eastern Bengal. Divorce is permitted with the sanction of the puncháyat of the caste. In some districts a leaf is torn in two to symbolise separation. Divorced wives may marry again by the nikāh form.

Although Hāris profess to be Hindus and worship Kāli and other of the standard gods in a more or less meagre fashion, it seems probable that they have embraced Hinduism at a comparatively recent date. In Hughli, indeed, they employ Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, but these Brahmans are looked down upon by other members of the sacred order, and are generally regarded as only a little less degraded than Hāris themselves. In other districts they have priests of their own caste, who bear the pretentious title of Pandit.
The dead are usually burnt, and the ashes thrown into the nearest river. A pig is sacrificed on the tenth day after death to appease the spirit of the departed, the flesh being eaten by the relatives. On this occasion the nephew (sister’s son) of the deceased person officiates as priest.

Their social rank is of the lowest. No one will eat with a Hāri or take water from his hands, and members of the caste are not permitted to enter the courtyard of the great temples. Some of them hold land as occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats, and many find employment as agricultural day-labourers. Tapping date-trees, making bamboo combs, playing musical instruments at weddings and festivals, carrying palanquins, serving as syces, and scavenging, are among their characteristic occupations; but the removal of night-soil is confined to the Mihtar sub-caste. Their women often act as midwives. They are troubled by few scruples regarding diet. Fowls, pork, field-rats, scaly or scaleless fish, and the leavings of other castes, are freely eaten; while in districts where the aboriginal races are numerous, Hāris will even indulge in beef. Their partiality for strong drink is notorious.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Hāri caste in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>31,416</td>
<td>23,906</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>6,550</td>
<td>5,280</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>9,636</td>
<td>8,770</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>571</td>
<td>409</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bārbhum</td>
<td>23,352</td>
<td>24,097</td>
<td>Hill Tracts</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>20,916</td>
<td>22,954</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,954</td>
<td>1,540</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>44,700</td>
<td>42,610</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>1,540</td>
<td>1,456</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>17,783</td>
<td>16,783</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>3,903</td>
<td>2,947</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sā-Pargana</td>
<td>70,837</td>
<td>52,353</td>
<td>Dārbarpur</td>
<td>6,658</td>
<td>6,833</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>6,800</td>
<td>6,800</td>
<td>Serai</td>
<td>3,326</td>
<td>3,688</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kultana</td>
<td>5,060</td>
<td>5,060</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>3,059</td>
<td>3,401</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessor</td>
<td>2,961</td>
<td>4,390</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>2,125</td>
<td>2,125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>18,854</td>
<td>19,176</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>14,679</td>
<td>13,404</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>16,051</td>
<td>16,383</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>3,197</td>
<td>8,822</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>3,998</td>
<td>4,703</td>
<td>Puranė</td>
<td>30,320</td>
<td>29,040</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kangaur</td>
<td>8,511</td>
<td>7,972</td>
<td>Mardah</td>
<td>14,679</td>
<td>13,404</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bāgra</td>
<td>6,839</td>
<td>7,616</td>
<td>Santal Pargana</td>
<td>1,565</td>
<td>1,374</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pāla</td>
<td>3,141</td>
<td>3,331</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>3,391</td>
<td>3,401</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>988</td>
<td>1,064</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>6,749</td>
<td>7,754</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaigiri</td>
<td>4,866</td>
<td>5,410</td>
<td>Bālaore</td>
<td>3,390</td>
<td>4,445</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>2,099</td>
<td>2,199</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>12,078</td>
<td>12,078</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Itāna</td>
<td>4,554</td>
<td>2,780</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>1,671</td>
<td>1,671</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patīdhar</td>
<td>1,288</td>
<td>2,696</td>
<td>Lohardagā</td>
<td>2,605</td>
<td>1,149</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bākareswar</td>
<td>1,490</td>
<td>1,574</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>1,250</td>
<td>1,567</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Māmanāthpur</td>
<td>5,051</td>
<td>6,396</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>11,146</td>
<td>13,314</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>500</td>
<td>1,001</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Hári or Bangáli, a sub-caste of Doms in Behar who are probably immigrants from Bengal.

Haríambá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Hariáme Rakhwári, a mul of the Bátysya section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Hariáme-Sibá, a mul of the Bátysa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Hariáme-Balirájpúr, a mul of the Bátysa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Hariáme-Katmé, a mul of the Bátysa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Hariáme-Ahíl, a mul of the Bátysa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Harichandán Khándait, a sub-caste of Khandáits in Puri.

Harihobans, a sept of the Suryabansi Rajputs in Behar.

Hari Majumdári, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Ráhí Brahmanas in Bengal.

Harín, deer, a totemistic sept of Chiks and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hárita, an eponymous section of Bábhans in Behar; a section of the Srotriya sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans.

Hariyán or Jehariyá, a sub-caste of Mauliks in Chota Nagpur.

Hariyana, a sub-caste of Gaurá Brahmans.

Harkár, a sub-caste of Doms in South Behar who are scavengers.

Harkar, Harkál, a sub-caste of Háris in Bengal.

Harnátar, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Haróha, a thar or sept of Sarkis in Darjiling.

Harpati, ‘plough-owner,’ a group of Maghaiya Telis in Behar.

Hará, myrabolam, a totemistic sept of Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Har-Santán, a synonym for Hári.

Harśariá, a section of Lohárs in Behar.

Hartakiá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Hasá, earth, a sept of Goálás in Chota Nagpur.

Hasada, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur, see Hánsdá.

Hasanpuriá, a section of Lohárs in Behar.

Hasárá, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hasdajía, a synonym for Hansda, q.v.

Hassa ara, a kind of vegetable, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hastaddá, a totemistic section of Turis in Chota Nagpur, signifying an eel.

Hastgárme, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Hastuar, a sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Hastwár, a totemistic section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur.
and Orissa who will not touch a tortoise.

 Háti, a section of Goélès in Behar; a sub-sept of the Saren sept of Santáls.

 Háth, a pangat or section of Bánsphor Doms and of Dosadh in Behar.

 Háthi, elephant, a totemistic sept of Khariás and Kharwars and a section of Kumbárs in Chota Nagpur; a title of Bangaja Káyasthas; a section of Sunris in Behar.

 Háthi or Hátti, elephant, a totemistic sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

 Háthiakán, a section of the Sátmulia Magháyá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

 Háthiá Kándhá, a section of Koránch Kándus in Behar.

 Háthián, a territorial section of Barhis in Behar.

 Háthsukhá, a section of Madhesié Kándus in Behar.

 Háti, elephant, a title of Khándáta in Orissa.

 Hátiá, a sub-caste of Bhuinmális found in Noakháli.

 Hátsalabá, elephant, a totemistic sept of Juángs in Orissa.

 Hátsor, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesié sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

 Hátuá, a sub-caste of Bhandáris in Orissa.

 Háturí, a pán or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.

 Háturíá Baidya, a doctor who attends markets, or, according to Dr. Wise, a quack, a meddlesome fellow.

 Háuwáli, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

 Hátwál, a title of Bagdis and Háris in Bengal.

 Hausakar, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

 Hawáigára, a maker of fire-works, always a Mahomedán, often called Golás, and in Behar Atash-baz. In Bengal the Hindu málákár makes a few simple fire-works for weddings, but this is never his exclusive business.

 Házará, a title of Káyasth, Kaibartta, Sadgop, Chásádhoiba, Kapáli, and Hári castes in Bengál; of Dosadh in Behar; a section of Kewats.

 Házará-Samáj, a sub-caste of Dhabás in Central Bengal.

 Hazári, a pangat or section of Dosadh and Kádars in Behar.

 Hazári párí, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

 Hedling, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

 Hej, a hypergamous group of the Bárendra Káyasths in Bengal.

 Hekoriá, tomato, a totemistic sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

 Hele-Kaibartta, or Helo, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Bengal.

 Hern, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Káyasths.

 Hembaran, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

 Hembowar, ancestor, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.
HEMPHA.

HEMPHÁ, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Hemram, a kind of fish, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hemramiá, betel palm, a totemistic section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Hemremina, a sept of Khwaris in Chota Nagpur.

Hemriák, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Hemrom, a kind of fish, a totemistic sept of Birhors and Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Hemrom, Hembaram, betel palm, a sept of Santals.

Hemromi, ashes, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hemron, a totemistic sept of Bhumij, and Mahili, the members of which may not eat the horse.

Hendur, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa, the members of which do not observe the Jita parab, and celebrate marriage in the open and not in a house.

319

Heride, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hermanía, a sub-caste of Telis in Behar.

Hersiriá, a mulor section of the Kamar Kalla sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Herung, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hes, a title of Dakshin-Ráhri and Bangaja Káyasthas.

Hesá, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Hiapela, a sub-caste of Telis in Chota Nagpur.

Hijrá, eunuch, a person of equivocal malformation, supposed to be a hermaphrodite and usually wearing female attire and bearing the name of a man.

Hindúa, a section of Tántis in Behar.

Hinga, a section of the Oswál Baniyás in Bengal.

Hingu, an exogamous section of Baidyas in Bengal.

Hirni, a mul or section of the Kanaújia sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Larka Kolh, a non-Aryan tribe of the district of Singbhum, classed for linguistic purposes as Kolhian. The name Ho seems to be merely a contracted form of the word horo, 'man,' which is used by the cognate tribes of Munda and Santál as their national designation. The two latter tribes, it should be noted, are not called horo by outsiders, and a Santál will as often as not describe himself by the title of Mánjhi. In the case of the Hos, the tribal name of the original stock whence Hos, Mundas, and Santáls are sprung has obtained popular recognition, in a slightly altered form, as the distinctive name of the branch which inhabits Singbhum, and which may now be regarded as a separate tribe. For intermarriage between Hos and Mundas or Santáls, though not absolutely forbidden by custom, is certainly uncommon, and may be expected soon to fall into disuse. The internal structure of the tribe is shown in Appendix I. They have no sub-tribes, but the septs are very numerous, and many of them appear to be totemistic. Six of the sept names are common to them and to the Santéls. The rule of exogamy is strictly observed, and a man may on no account marry a woman of his sept. With this exception their views on the subject of prohibited degrees appear to be lax, and I understand that marriages with near relatives on the mother's side are tolerated provided that a man does not marry his aunt, his first cousin, or his niece. For the rest I have nothing to add to the passages quoted below from Colonel Dalton's classical account of the Ho tribe, which, so far as I can ascertain, is substantially correct at the present day. Owing to the use in the Census returns of the general name Kol to denote Mundas, Hos, and Oraons, it has been found impossible to draw up any statistical table showing the number of Hos in 1872 and 1881. In the former year 150,925 Kols were registered in Singbhum, while in 1881 the number of Kols in that district is given as 187,721, to which may be added 5,999 returned under various sept names. If, then, we might assume that all persons registered in Singbhum as Kols were really Hos, the figures would stand thus: 1872, 150,925; 1881, 188,260. But Oraons and Mundas are also found in Singbhum, and it is impossible to separate them from the total set down for Kols. I have therefore thought it best not to attempt to construct any statistical table showing the distribution of the tribe. It is the less necessary to do so as there are probably not many Hos outside of Singbhum. The tribe are fairly fortunate in their relations to the land, and presumably for this reason are not accustomed, like the Mundas and Oraons, to leave their homes during the cold weather to assist in gathering in the rice harvest of Bengal Proper.

"The Hos appear to have no traditions of origin or migrations that throw much light on their history. They generally admit that they are of the same family as the Mundas, and that they came from Chota Nagpur. The Oraons sometimes say that the exodus of the Hos was caused by their invasion, but I cannot believe that the Hos could ever have given way to so inferior a race; and the tradition usually received is that the Oraons made friends with the Mundas and were allowed to occupy peaceably the north-western corner of the plateau, where the latter apparently have never taken root. The Hos are the only branch of the Kols that have preserved a national appellation. The Mundas of Chutiá Nágpur are sometimes called Kokpát or Konkpát Mundas, and that may be a national word; but Ho, Hore, or Horo means in their own language 'man,' and they are not the only people that apply to themselves exclusively the word used in their language to distinguish human beings from brutes. They probably left Chutiá Nágpur before their brethren there had assumed the Sanskrit word 'Munda' as their distinctive name, taking with them their old constitution of confederate village communities under hereditary headmen, which system they have retained to the present day. But they did not find in Singbhum an unoccupied country. It is admitted on all sides that one part of it was in possession of the Bhuiyas, and another held by the people who have left many monuments of their ingenuity and piety in the adjoining district of Manbhum, and who were certainly the earliest Aryan settlers in this part of India,—the Sarawaks or Jains. The former were driven from their possessions in what is now the Kolhán, and fell back into Paráhat. What became of the Jains we know not. They have left their marks in Dhalbhum and the eastern and northeastern quarters of the district; and it is not improbable that the Sódras, Goálás, and Kurmis, now settled in Paráhat, Kharásán, Sáraikalá, and Dhalbhum, may be remnants of the colonies they founded. But it is also probable that many were absorbed into the family that conquered them; and this may account for the greater beauty of the Hos as compared with other Kols, and for their having in use a number of common vocables of Sanskrit origin, though they insulated themselves as much as possible, despised the Hindus, and for a long time had little or no intercourse with them.

"I propose to select the Hos as the branch of the people who, from their jealous isolation for so many years, their independence, their long occupation of one territory, and their contempt for all other classes that came in contact with them, especially the Hindus, probably furnish the best illustration, not of the Mundáris in their wildest state, but of what, if left to themselves and permanently located, they were likely to become. Even at the present day the exclusiveness of the old Hos is remarkable. They will not allow aliens to hold lands near their villages; and indeed if it were left to them no strangers would be permitted to settle in the Kolhán. Now there are settlements of Goálás, Kurmis, and others; but though such settlements are under the authority of the Kol mántí of the pír, the Kols hold little communication with them, and jealously watch and circumscribe the spread of their cultivation. They argue that they are themselves rapidly increasing, and the waste lands should all be reserved for their progeny. The only persons of alien race they tolerate, and, so far as suits their own convenience, associate with, are the few Tántís (weavers), Goálás (herdsmen), potters, and blacksmiths who ply their respective trades for the benefit of the community; but these people, who are in all probability remnants of the Aryan colonies that the Hos subjugated, must learn their language and generally conform to their customs. The old Hos will not conform to theirs. It is only the rising generation that takes kindly to the acquisition of another language. The Hos have a tradition concerning the creation of the world and the origin of the human race, which is given in Colonel Tickell's account of the tribe, published in volume ix of the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, p. 797. Ote Borám and Sing Bonga were self-created; they made the earth with rocks and water, and they clothed it with grass and trees, and then created animals,—first, those that man domesticates, and afterwards wild beasts. When all was thus prepared for the abode of man, a boy and girl were created, and Sing Bonga placed them in a cave at the bottom of a great ravine; and finding them to be too innocent to give hope of progeny, he instructed them in the art of making ili, rice-beer, which excites the passions, and thus the world became peopled. When the first parents had produced twelve boys and twelve girls, Sing Bonga prepared a feast of the flesh of buffaloes, bullocks, goats, sheep, pigs, fowls, and vegetables; and making the brothers and sisters pair off, told each pair to take what they most relished and depart. Then the first and second pair took bullocks and buffaloes' flesh, and they originated the Kols (Hos) and the Bhumij (Matkum); the next took of the vegetables only, and are the progenitors of the Bráhmans and Kshatriyas; others took goats and fish, and from them are the Súdras. One pair took the shell-fish, and became Bhuiyás; two pairs took pigs, and became Santáls. One pair got nothing; seeing which the first pairs gave them of their superfluity, and from the pair thus provided spring the Ghásis, who toil not, but live by preying on others. The Hos have now assigned to the English the honour of descent from one of the first two pairs—the elder. The only incident in the above tradition that reminds one of the more highly elaborated Santál account is the divine authority for the use of strong drinks.

"The Hos of Singbhum and the Mundáris of the southern parganas of the Lohardagá district are physically a much finer people than the Bhumíj, the Santáls, or any other of the Kolarians. The males average five feet five or six inches in height; the women five feet two. The average height of a number of the Juáng tribe I found to be—for males, less than five feet; and for women, four feet eight. In features the Hos exhibit much variety, and I think in a great many families there is considerable admixture of Aryan blood. Many have high noses and oval faces, and young girls are sometimes met with who have delicate and regular features, finely chiselled straight noses, and perfectly-formed mouths and chins. The eyes, however, are seldom so large, so bright, and gazelle-like as those of pure Hindu maidens; but I have met strongly-marked Mongolian features, and some are dark and coarse like the Santáls. In colour they vary greatly,—28, 29, and 30 of Brossac's table; the copper tints are the commonest ones. Eyes dark brown (about 2 of Brossac); hair black, straight, or wavy, and rather fine; worn long by males and females, but the former shave the forehead. Both men and women are noticeable for their fine erect carriage and long free stride. The hands and feet are large, but well formed. The men care little about their personal appearance. It requires a great deal of education to reconcile them to the encumbrance of clothing; and even those who are wealthy move about all but naked, as proudly as if they were clad in purple and fine linen. The women in an unsophisticated state are equally averse to superfluity of clothing. In remote villages they may still be seen with only a rag between the legs, fastened before and behind to a string round the waist. This is called a botoi. The national dress is, however, a long strip of cloth worn as a girdle round the loins, knotted behind, and the ends brought between the legs and fastened to the girdle in front; but in the principal group of villages about Chaibásé the young women dress themselves decently and gracefully. The style of wearing the hair is peculiar, collected in a knot artificially enlarged, not in the centre of the back of the head, but touching the back of the right ear. Flowers are much used in the coiffure. The neck ornaments most in vogue a year or two ago were very small black beads; but in this one small item of their simple toilette fashion changes, and the beads most prized one year are looked on with repugnance the next. As with the Santáls, very massive bracelets and armlets are worn, and anklets of bell-metal. It is a singular sight to see the young women at the markets subjecting themselves to the torture of being fitted with a pair of these anklets. They are made so that they can just, with great violence, be forced on. The operation is performed by the manufacturers, who put moistened leather on the heel and instep to prevent excoriati Child-birth.

After the birth of a child both mother and father are considered unclean, bisi, for eight days, during which period the other members of the family are sent out of the house, and the husband has to cook for his wife. If it be a difficult case of parturition, the malignancy of some spirit of evil is supposed to be at work, and after divination to ascertain his name a sacrifice is made to appease him. At the expiration of the eight days the banished members of the family return, friends are invited to a feast, and the child is ceremoniously named. The name of the grandfather is usually given to the first-born son, but not without an ordeal to ascertain if it will prove fortunate. As the name is mentioned, a grain of uríd (pulse) is thrown into a vessel with water; the name is adopted if it floats, rejected if it sinks.

"Owing to the high price placed on daughters by their fathers, the large number of adult unmarried girls seen in every considerable village in the Kolhán is a very peculiar feature in the social state of the community. In no other country in India are spinsters found so advanced in years. In many of the best families grey-headed old maids may be seen, whose charms were insufficient to warrant the large addition to the usual price, called pan, imposed in consideration of the high connection that the union would confer. The pan is calculated, and for the most part paid, in cattle, indicating that the custom dates from a time when there was no current coin; and fathers of mánkis dignity demand from forty to fifty head of cattle for each of their girls. Dr. Hayes, finding that in consequence of this practice the number of marriages was annually diminishing and immoral intimacy between the sexes increasing, convened in 1868 a meeting of representative men for the express purpose of discussing this question; and after a long debate it was unanimously agreed that a reduction should be made. It was resolved that in future a pan was not to exceed ten head of cattle; and that if one pair of oxen, one cow, and seven rupees were given, it should be received as an equivalent for the ten head. For the poorer classes it was fixed at seven rupees. Even thus modified the pan in Singbhum is higher than it is in Chutiá Nagpur for the multitude. The mánkis and headmen of the latter country, conforming to the Hindu customs, have given up exacting it. In olden times young men counteracted the machinations of avaricious parents against the course of true love by forcibly carrying off the girl, and still at times evade extortion by running away with her. Then the parents have to submit to such terms as arbitrators think fair. This abduction it was necessary to put a stop to, and elopements are not considered respectable; so, until the conference, prices had a tendency to rise rather than fall. The old generation of mánkis vehemently opposed any reduction. The second generation, since the accession of the British, are now in the ascendant, and they entertained more enlightened views; but, notwithstanding the compact, I have not yet heard of a marriage in high life in which the reduced pan has been accepted. It is certainly not from any yearning for celibacy that the marriage of Singbhum maidens is so long postponed. The girls will tell you frankly that they do all they can to please the young men, and I have often heard them pathetically bewailing their want of success. They make themselves as attractive as they can, flirt in the most demonstrative manner, and are not too coy to receive in public attentions from those they admire. They may be often seen in well-assorted pairs returning from market with arms interlaced, and looking at each other as lovingly as if they were so many groups of Cupids and Psyches; but with all this the ‘men will not propose.’ Tell a maiden you think her nice looking, she is sure to reply, ‘Oh yes, I am; but what is the use of it? the young men of my acquaintance don’t see it.’ Even when a youth has fully made up his mind to marry, it may happen that fate is against the happiness of the young couple: bad omens are seen that cause the match to be postponed or broken off; or papa cannot, or will not, pay the price demanded. When a young man has made his choice, he communicates the fact to his parents; and a deputation of the friends of the family is sent to the girl’s house to ascertain all that should be known regarding her family, age, appearance, and means. If the information obtained and the result of the inspection be satisfactory, and the omens observed on the road have been propitious, an offering is made on the part of the young man; and if it be received, the deputation are invited to stay, and are feasted. The report of the deputation being favourable, a day is fixed for a meeting between the parents, and the terrible question of the pan discussed. At this point many matches are broken off, in consequence of greed on one side or stinginess on the other. The amount agreed on has to be paid before the day can be fixed for the marriage; and when delivery of the cattle is made, a pot of beer has to be given from the bride’s side for each animal. At last if all this is got over, the appointed day arrives, and the bride is escorted to the village for her intended by all her young female friends, with music and dancing. The young men and girls of the village, and those invited from neighbouring villages, form a cortege for the bridegroom. They go out and meet the bride’s party, and, after a dance in the grove, in which the bride and bridegroom take part, mounted on the hips of two of their female friends, they enter the village together, where there is a great feast, a great consumption of the rice-beer, and much more dancing and singing. Ceremony there is none; but the turning point in the rite is when the bride and groom pledge each other. A cup of beer is given to each; the groom pours some of the contents of his cup into the bride’s cup, and she returns the compliment. Drinking the liquor thus blended they become of one kili, that is, the bride is admitted into her husband’s tribe, and they become one. This has, I believe, succeeded an older custom of drinking from the same cup. After remaining with her husband for three days only, it is the correct thing for the wife to run away from him and tell all her friends that she loves him not, and will see him no more. This is perhaps reparation to the dignity of the sex, injured by the bride’s going to the bridegroom’s house to be married, instead of being sought for and taken as a wife from her own. So it is correct for the husband to show great anxiety for the loss of his wife and diligently seek her; and when he finds her, he carries her off by main force. I have seen a young wife thus found and claimed and borne away, screeching and struggling, in the arms of her husband from the midst of a crowded bazaar. No one interferes on these occasions, and no one assists. If the husband cannot manage the business himself, he must leave her alone. After this little escapade the wife at once settles down, assumes her place as the well-contented mistress of the household, and, as a rule, in no country in the world are wives better treated. Dr. Hayes says:—'A Kol or Ho makes a regular companion of his wife. She is consulted in all difficulties, and receives the fullest consideration due to her sex.' Indeed, it is not uncommon in the Kolhán to see husbands so subject to the influence of their wives that they may be regarded as henpecked. Instances of infidelity in wives are very rare. I never heard of one, but I suppose such things occur, as there is a regulated penalty. The unfaithful wife is discarded, and the seducer must pay to the husband the entire value of the pan.

"The Hos are fair marksmen with the bow and arrow, and great sportsmen. From childhood they practise archery; every lad herding cattle or watching crops makes this his whole pastime, and skill is attained even in knocking over small birds with blunt arrows. They also keep hawks, and the country in the vicinity of their villages is generally destitute of game. In the months intervening between the harvest-home and the rains they frequently go in large parties to distant jungles; and with them, as with the Santals, there is every year in May a great meet for sport, in which people of all classes of the neighbourhood and surrounding villages take part. From the setting in of the rains to the harvest the time of the people is fairly employed in cultivation, to which they pay great attention. The women have their full share of labour in the fields; indeed, the only agricultural work they are exempted from is ploughing. They work from early morn till noon; then comes the mid-day meal, after which their time is pretty much at their own disposal. The young people then make themselves tidy, stroll about the village, or visit neighbouring villages; and the old people, sitting on the gravestones, indulge in deep potations of rice-beer, and smoke, or gossip, or sleep. Amongst the amusements of the Hos I must not omit to mention pegtops.
They are roughly made of blocks of hard wood, but their mode of spinning and playing them, one on another, is the same as with us. Pegtopping has been noticed as an amusement of the Khásias of Assam. Their agricultural implements consist of the ordinary wooden plough tipped with iron; a harrow; the kõdãli or large hoe; a sickle; the tëngi or battle-axe, which is used for all purposes; the block-wheeled dray; and an implement with which to remove earth in altering the levels of land to prepare it for irrigation and rice cultivation. The latter consists of a broad piece of board firmly attached to a pole and yoke, so that its edge touches the ground at an angle as it is drawn by oxen or buffaloes attached to it.
The Hos make these agricultural implements themselves; every man is to some extent a carpenter, handy with his adze and clever in simple contrivances. The Kols plough with cows as well as oxen; but it is to be recollected that they make no other use of the animal, as they never touch milk. Buffaloes are preferred to bullocks as plough cattle. They have a rude kind of oil-press in every village.
The Mundáris and Larkas raise three crops of rice,—the early or gôrd, the autumnal or bôd, and the late or bôrd crop. Indian corn and the millets, marud and gondü, are also cultivated as early crops.
Wheat, gram, mustard seed, and sesamum they have also taken to as cold weather and spring crops. Tobacco and cotton they have long cultivated, but not in sufficient quantities even for their own consumption. They have no notion of weaving, and if left to their own resources for clothing would probably resume their leaves; but every village has one or two families of Tántis, or weavers, who are now almost indistinguishable from the Hos. The villagers make over their cotton to the weavers, and pay for the loom labour in cotton or grain.

"The Hos are a purely agricultural people, and their festivals are all connected with that pursuit. In describing these festivals I avail myself of information on the subject kindly collated for me by W. Ritchie, Esq., District Superintendent of Police, Singbhum. The chief requisite for festivities of all kinds is the preparation of an ample quantity of the home-made beer called illi. It is made from rice, which is boiled and allowed to ferment till it is sufficiently intoxicating; its proper preparation is considered one of the most useful accomplishments that a young damsel can possess. The Hos keep seven festivals in the year. The first or principal is called the Māgh parab or Desauli Bonga. This is held in the month of Māgh, or January, when the granaries are full of grain, and the people, to use their own expression, full of devilry. They have a strange notion that at this period men and women are so overcharged with vicious propensities that it is absolutely necessary to let off steam by allowing for a time full vent to the passions. The festival, therefore, becomes a Saturnale, during which servants forget their duty to their masters, children their reverence for parents, men their respect for women, and women all notions of modesty, delicacy, and gentleness,—they become raging Bacchantes. It opens with a sacrifice to Desauli of three fowls,—a cock and two hens, one of which must be black,—offered with some flowers of the palás tree (Butea frondosa), bread made from rice-flour, and sesamum seeds. The sacrifice and offerings are made by the village priest, if there be one; or if not, by any elder of the village who possesses the necessary legendary lore. He prays that during the year they are about to enter on they and their children may be preserved from all misfortune and sickness, and that they may have seasonable rain and good crops. Prayer is also made in some places for the souls of the departed. At this period an evil spirit is supposed to infest the locality, and to get rid of it the men, women, and children go in procession round and through every part of the village, with sticks in their hands as if beating for game, singing a wild chant and vociferating violently till they feel assured that the bad spirit must have fled,—and they make noise enough to frighten a legion. These religious ceremonies over, the people give themselves up to feasting, drinking immoderately of rice-beer till they are in the state of wild ebriety most suitable for the process of letting off steam. The Ho population of the villages forming the environs of Chāibásé are at other seasons quiet and reserved in manner, and in their demeanour towards women gentle and decorous. Even in the flirtations I have spoken of they never transgress the bounds of decency. The girls, though full of spirits and somewhat saucy, have innate notions of propriety that make them modest in demeanour, though devoid of all prudery; and of the obscene abuse so frequently heard from the lips of common women in Bengal, they appear to have no knowledge. They are delicately sensitive under harsh language of any kind, and never use it to others; and since their adoption of clothing, they are careful to drape themselves decently as well as gracefully. But they throw all this aside during the Māgh feast. Their natures appear to undergo a temporary change. Sons and daughters revile their parents in gross language, and parents their children; men and women become almost like animals in the indulgence of their amorous propensities. They enact all that was ever portrayed by prurient artists in a Bacchanalian festival or Pandean orgy; and as the light of the sun they adore, and the presence of numerous spectators seem to be no restraint on their indulgence, it cannot be expected that chastity is preserved when the shades of night fall on such a scene of licentiousness and debauchery. This festival is not kept at one period in all the villages. The time during which it is held in different villages of a circle extends over a period of a month or six weeks; and, under a preconcerted arrangement, the festival commences at each village on a different date, and lasts three or four days, so the inhabitants of each may take part in a long succession of these orgies. As the utmost liberty is given to girls, the parents never attempting to exercise any restraint, the girls of one village sometimes pair off with the young men of another, and absent themselves for days. Liaisons thus prolonged generally end in marriages. The ordinary Ho dance is similar to the rosa danse of the Santals,—an amorous, but not a very rapid or lively movement; but the Māgh dance is like a grande galoppe,—a very joyous, frisky, harum-scaram scamper of boys and girls through the village and from one village to another. The Mundāris keep this festival in much the same manner as the Hos, but one day is fixed for its commencement everywhere,—the full of the moon in Mágh,—and there is less commingling of the boys and girls from different villages. The resemblance to a Saturnale is very complete, as at this festival the farm-labourers are feasted by their masters and allowed the utmost freedom of speech in addressing them. It is the festival of the harvest-home,—the termination of one year's toil and a slight respite from it before they commence again. At this feast the Mundāris dance the jādāra, remarkable for the very pretty and peculiar manner in which the lines of performers interlace their arms behind their backs. The next in the order of festivals is what is called Bah Bonga by the Hos, corresponding to the Sarhūl of the Mundāris. Bah means flower; and the festival takes place when the sāl tree is in full bloom in March or April,—a favourite season with many tribes, for it is then that the death of Gautama is commemorated. With the Hos and Mundāris it is held in honour of the founders of the village and the tutelary deity or spirit, called Darhā by the Oraons. The boys and girls collect basketful of the flowers, make garlands of them, weave them in their hair, and decorate their houses with them. Each house makes an offering of these flowers, and sacrifices a cock. The people dance for a couple of days and nights incessantly, and refresh themselves meanwhile with beer; but in the Kolhān it is the quiet style of dance, and there are no open breaches of decorum. The dance on this occasion of the Mundāris is called the bahni. The boys and girls poussette to each other, clapping their hands and pirouetting, so as to cause dos-á-dos concussions, which are the source of much mirth. The selection of the sāl flowers as the offering to the founders of the village is appropriate, as there are few villages that do not occupy ground once covered by sāl forest; and at this period new ground, if there be any, is cleared for cultivation. The third festival is the Damura, which is celebrated in May, or at the time of the sowing of the first rice crop.
It is held in honour of the ancestral shades and other spirits, who, if unpropitiated, would prevent the seed from germinating. A he-goat and a cock are sacrificed. The fourth festival is the Hird Bonga, in June; the Mundéris call it Harihur. It is to propitiate Desauli and Jähir Bűrli for a blessing on the crops. In the Mundéri villages every householder plants a branch of the bhola in his field and contributes to the general offering, which is made by the priest in the sacred grove, a fowl, a pitcher of beer, and a handful of rice. In Singbhum a he-goat is offered. This is followed by the Bhau-taul Bonga, which takes place in July. Each cultivator sacrifices a fowl, and after some mysterious rites a wing is stripped off and inserted in the cleft of a bamboo and stuck up in the rice-field and dungheap. If this is omitted, it is supposed that the rice will not come to maturity. It appears more like a charm than a sacrifice. This corresponds with the karam in the Kol villages of Chutiá Nágpur, where the hoja is danced. The women in this dance follow the men, and change their positions and attitudes in obedience to signals from them. When the movement called hoja is asked for, the women all kneel and pat the ground with their hands in time to the music, as if coaxing the earth to be fruitful. On the day appointed a branch of the karam tree is cut and planted in the dhbré or dancing place. This festival is kept by Hindus in Chutiá Nágpur as well as by Kolos. The sixth festival is the offering of the first fruits of the harvest to Sing Bonga; it is solemnized in August, when the gŏra rice ripens, and till the sacrifice is complete the new rice must not be eaten. The offering, in addition to the rice, is a white cock. This is a thanks-offering to the Creator and Preserver. It is called Jum-nama, and considered of great importance. To eat new rice without thus thanking God is regarded as impious. The seventh festival is the Kalam Bonga, when an offering of a fowl is made to Desauli on the removal of the rice straw from the threshing-floor, kalam, to be stacked. The pâhs or priests of the Kol villages in Chutiá Nágpur have another festival, for the performance of which they are in possession of some rent-free land, called dâlkatári. The sacrifices are, every second year a fowl, every third year a ram, every fourth year a buffalo to Marang Bűru; and the main object is to induce him to send seasonable rain. The above are all general festivals; but the Hoes, on their individual account, make many sacrifices to the gods. In cases of sickness and calamity they commence by sacrificing what is small and of little value; but if the desired change is retarded, they go on until the patient dies or their live-stock is entirely exhausted.

All disease in men or animals is attributed to one of two causes,—the wrath of some evil spirit, who has to be appeased, or to the spell of some witch or sorcerer, who should be destroyed or driven out of the land. In the latter case a nokha, or witch-finder, is employed to divine who has cast the spell, and various modes of divination are resorted to. One of the most common is the test by the stone and pâitá. The latter is a large wooden cup, shaped like a half cocoanut, used as a measure for grain. It is placed under a flat stone as a pivot for the stone to turn on. A boy is then seated on the stone, supporting himself by his hands; and the names of all the people in the neighbourhood are slowly pronounced, and as each name is uttered a few grains of rice are thrown at the boy. When they come to the name of the witch or wizard, the stone turns and the boy rolls off. This, no doubt, is the effect of the boy's falling into a state of coma and losing the power of supporting himself with his hands. In former times the person denounced and all his family were put to death, in the belief that witches breed witches and sorcerers. The taint is in the blood. When, during the Mutiny, Singbhum district was left for a short time without officers, a terrible raid was made against all who for years had been suspected of dealings with the evil one, and the most atrocious murders were committed. Young men were told off for the duty by the elders; neither sex nor age were spared. When order was restored, these crimes were brought to light, and the actual perpetrators condignly punished; and since then we have not only had no recurrence of witch murders, but the superstition itself is dying out in the Kolhán. In other districts accusations of witchcraft are still frequently made, and the persons denounced are subjected to much ill-usage if they escape with their lives. Some of the sokhas, instead of divining the name of the person who has cast the evil eye on the suffering patient, profess to summon their own familiar spirits, who impart to them the needed information. The sokha throws some rice on a winnowing sieve, and places a light in front of it. He then mutters incantations and rubs the rice, watching the flame, and when this flickers it is owing to the presence of the familiar; and the sokha, to whom alone the spirit is visible, pretends to receive from it the revelation, which he communicates to the inquirer, to the effect that the sufferer is afflicted by the familiar of some rival sokha, or sorcerer, or witch, whom he names. The villagers then cause the attendance of the person denounced, who is brought into the presence of the sufferer and ordered to haul out his evil spirit. It is useless for him to plead that he has no such spirit: this only leads to his being unmercifully beaten. His best line of defence is to admit what is laid to his charge, and to act as if he really were master of the situation. Some change for the better in the patient may take place, which is ascribed to his delivery from the familiar, and the sorcerer is allowed to depart. But if there is no amelioration in the condition of the sick person, the chastisement of the sorcerer is continued till he can bear no more, and not unfrequently he dies under the ill-treatment he is subjected to, or from its effects. A milder method is when the person denounced is required to offer sacrifices of animals to appease or drive away the possessing devil; this he dare not refuse to do. And if the sickness thereupon ceases, it is of course concluded that the devil has departed; but if it continue, the sorcerer is turned out of his home and driven from the village, if nothing worse is done to him. It must not be supposed that these superstitions are confined to the Kols; they are common to all classes of the population of this province. I have elsewhere noticed their prevalence in the Southern Tributary Mahals, and the alleged existence of secret witch-schools, where damsels of true Aryan blood are instructed in the black art and perfected in it by practice on forest trees. Even Brahmans are sometimes accused. I find in a report by Major Roughsedge, written in 1818, an account of a Brahman lady who was denounced as a witch and tried; and having escaped in the ordeal by water, she was found to be a witch and deprived of her nose. The sokka does not always denounce a fellow-being; he sometimes gives out that the family bhút is displeased and has caused the sickness. And in such cases a most extensive propitiatory offering is demanded, which the master of the house provides, and of which the sokha gets the lion's share. I find an instance of the oracle giving out that Desauli, the village bhút, had caused the trouble; but on further inquiry it was averred that a spiteful old woman had on this occasion demoralised the honourable and respectable guardian of the village. And though he was propitiated, the hag was made to suffer very severely for her malignancy. It will be seen that it is not only women that are accused of having dealings with the imps of darkness. Persons of the opposite sex are as frequently denounced; nor are the female victims invariably of the orthodox old hag type. In a recent case eight women were denounced by a sokka as witches who had introduced epidemic cholera into the village and caused a terrible mortality, and among these were some very young girls. They were ill-treated until they admitted all that was imputed to them and agreed to point out and remove the spell they had prepared. They pretended to search for dead birds, which, it was said, they had deposited as charms, but nothing was produced; and one of the poor creatures, fearing further ill-usage, destroyed herself by jumping into a well. In Singbhum the wild Kharrias are looked upon as the most expert sorcerers; and the people, though they not unfrequently seek their aid, hold them in great awe.

"The funeral ceremonies of the Hos are deserving of special notice, as they show great reverence for the dead; and the variety and singularity of the rites performed may materially aid us in tracing the connection of the people we are describing. In my account of the Khásias I have already drawn attention to the similarity between their funeral ceremonies and those of the Hos. The funeral rites of the Hos and Géros have also many points of resemblance. On the death of a respectable Ho a very substantial coffin is constructed and placed on faggots of firewood. The body, carefully washed and anointed with oil and turmeric, is reverently laid in the coffin; all the clothes, ornaments, and agricultural implements that the deceased was in the habit of using are placed with it and also any money that he had about him when he died. Then the lid of the coffin is put on, and faggots placed around and above it, and the whole is burned. The cremation takes place in front of the house of the deceased. Next morning water is thrown on the ashes, search made for bones, and a few of the larger fragments are carefully preserved, whilst the remainder, with the ashes, are buried. The selected bones are placed in a vessel of earthenware,—we may call it an urn,—and hung up in the apartment of the chief mourner, generally the mother or widow, that she may have them.
continually in view, and occasionally weep over them. Thus they remain till the very extensive arrangements necessary for their final disposal are effected. A large tombstone has to be procured, and it is sometimes so ponderous that the men of several villages are employed to move it. Some wealthy men, knowing that their successors may not have the same influence that they possess, select during their lifetime a suitable monument to commemorate their worth, and have it moved to a handy position to be used when they die. When required for use it is brought to the family burial place, which with the Hos is close to the houses, and near it a deep round hole is dug for the reception of the cinerary urn. When all is ready a funeral party collect in front of the deceased's house—three or four men with very deep-toned drums, and a group of about eight young girls. The chief mourner comes forth, carrying the bones exposed on a decorated tray, and a procession is formed. The chief mourner, with the tray, leads; the girls form in two rows, those in front carrying empty and partly broken pitchers and battered brass vessels; and the men, with drums, bring up the rear. The procession advances with a very ghostly dancing movement, slow and solemn as a minuet, in time to the beat of the deep-toned drums, not straightforward, but mysteriously gliding,—now right, now left, now marking time, all in the same mournful cadence—a sad dead march. The chief mourner carries the tray, generally on her head; but at regular intervals she slowly lowers it, and as she does so the girls also gently lower and mournfully reverse the pitchers and brass vessels, and, looking up for the moment with eyes full of tears, seem to say, 'Ah! see! they are empty.' In this manner the remains are taken to the house of every friend and relative of the deceased within a circle of a few miles, and to every house in the village. As the procession approaches each habitation, in the weird-like manner described, the inmates all come out, and the tray having been placed on the ground at their door, they kneel over it and mourn, shedding tears on the remains as their last tribute of affection to their deceased friend. The bones are also thus conveyed to all his favourite haunts,—to the fields he cultivated, to the grove he planted, to the tank he excavated, to the threshing-floor where he worked with his people, to the dhrá or dancing arena where he made merry with them,—and each spot which is hallowed with reminiscences of the deceased draws forth fresh tears from the mourners. In truth, there is a reality in their sadness that would put to shame the efforts of our undertakers and the purchased gravity of the best mutes; and it is far less noisy and more sincere than the Irish 'keening.' When this part of the ceremony is completed the procession returns to the village, and, slowly gyrating round the great slab, gradually approaches its goal. At last it stops; a quantity of rice, cooked and uncooked, and other food is now cast into the grave, and the charred fragments of bone transferred from the tray to a new earthen vessel placed over it. The hole is then filled up and covered with the large slab, which effectually closes it against desecration. The slab, however, does not rest on the ground, but on smaller stones, which raise it a little. With the Mundas, as among the Khásias, these slabs may cover the graves of several members of a family; but the ghost of a Ho likes to have his grave all to himself. A collection of these massive gravestones indelibly marks the site of every Ho or Mundéri village; and they may now be found so marking sites in parts of the country where there have been no Kols for ages. But in addition to the slab on the tomb, a megalithic monument is set up to the memory of the deceased in some conspicuous spot outside the village. The pillars vary in height from five or six to fifteen feet, and apparently fragments of rock of the most fantastic shape are most favoured. Close to the station of Cháibáśa, on the road to Keunjhar, may be seen a group of cenotaphs of unusual size,—one eleven feet two inches, another thirteen feet, and a third fourteen feet above the earth; and many others of smaller dimensions. The groups of such stones that have come under my observation in the Munda and Ho country are always in line. The circular arrangement, so common elsewhere, I have not seen.

"I do not find that the present generation of Kols have any conception of a heaven or a hell that may not be traced to Brahmanical or Christian teaching. They have some vague idea that the ghosts of the dead hover about, and they make offerings to them; and some have, like the Chinese, an altar in the house, on which a portion of the 'daily bread' is offered to them. But unless under a system of prompting, often inadvertently adopted, they will not tell you that this after-existence is one of reward or punishment. When a Ho swears, the oath has no reference whatever to a future state. He prays that if he speak not the truth, he may be afflicted with as many calamities as befell Job,—that he may suffer the loss of all his worldly wealth, his health, his wife, his children; that he may sow without reaping, or reap without gathering; and finally, that he may be devoured by a tiger. It is a tremendous oath, and it is a shame to impose the obligation of making it on so generally truthful a people; but they swear not by any hope of happiness beyond the grave, and the miserable wandering life they assign to the shades can only be looked forward to with dread. They fear the ghosts and propitiate them as spirits of a somewhat malignant nature, but can have no possible desire to pass into such a state of existence themselves. The funeral ceremonies I have described are what I myself witnessed. Colonel Tickell tells us that on the evening of the burning of the corpse certain preparations are made in the house in anticipation of a visit from the ghost. A portion of the boiled rice is set apart for it,—the commencement, we may presume, of the daily act of family devotion above noticed,—and ashes are sprinkled on the floor, in order that, should it come, its footprints may be detected. The inmates then leave the house, and, circumambulating the pyre, invoke the spirit. Returning, they carefully scrutinise the ashes and rice, and if there is the faintest indication of these having been disturbed, it is at once attributed to the return of the spirit; and they sit down apart, shivering with horror, and crying bitterly, as if they were by no means pleased with the visit, though made at their earnest solicitation. I have often asked the Kols if their custom of casting money, food, and raiment on the funeral pyre is at all connected with the idea of the resurrection of the body, or if they thought the dead would benefit by the gifts bestowed. They have always answered in the negative, and gave me the same explanation of the origin and object of the custom that I received from the Chulikata Mishmis of Upper Assam, namely, that they are unwilling to derive any immediate benefit from the death of a member of their family; they wish for no such consolation in their grief. So they commit to the flames all his personal effects, the clothes and vessels he had used, the weapons he carried, and the money he had about him. But new things that have not been used are not treated as things that he appropriated, and they are not destroyed; and it often happens that respectable old Hos abstain from wearing new garments that they become possessed of to save them from being wasted at the funeral. When the interment of the bones is accomplished, the event is made known far and wide by explosions that sound like discharges from heavy guns. This is sometimes done through the agency of gunpowder, but more frequently by the application of heat and cold to fragments of schistose rock, causing them to split with loud noises.

"In summing up the character of the people I have been describing it is necessary to separate the Hos from their cognates. The circumstances under which the character of the former has been developed are different, and they are in my opinion physically and morally superior to the Mundas, Bhumij, and Santals. They appear to me to possess a susceptibility of improvement not found in the other tribes. They have been directly under our government for about thirty-seven years; and, coming to us as unsophisticated savages, we have endeavoured to civilise them without allowing them to be contaminated. Whilst they still retain those traits which favourably distinguish the aborigines of India from Asiatics of higher civilisation,—a manner free from servility, but never rude; a love, or at least the practice, of truth; a feeling of self-respect, rendering them keenly sensitive under rebuke,—they have become less suspicious, less revengeful, less bloodthirsty, less contumacious, and in all respects more amenable to the laws and the advice of their officers. They are still very impulsive, easily excited to rash, headstrong action, and apt to resent imposition or oppression without reflection; but the retaliation, which often extends to a death-blow, is done on the spur of the moment and openly, secret assassination being a crime almost unhought of by them. As a fair illustration of their mode of action when violently incensed, I give the following:—A Bengali trader, accustomed to carry matters with a very high hand among his compatriots in the Jungle Mahals, demanded payment of a sum of money due to him by a Ho, and not receiving it, proceeded to sequestrate and drive off a pair of bullocks, the property of his debtor. The Ho on this took to his arms, let fly an arrow which brought down the money-lender, whose head he then cut off, went with it in his hand straight to the Deputy Commissioner, and explaining to that officer exactly what had occurred, requested that he might be condemned for the crime without more ado! Murders are not now more frequent in the Kolhán than in other districts, latterly less so; but when one does take place, the perpetrator is seldom at any trouble to conceal himself or his crime. The pluck of the Hos, displayed in their first encounter with our troops in former wars, I have often seen exemplified on minor occasions. In competitive games they go to work with a will and a strenuous exertion of their full force, unusual in natives of India. Once at the Ránchí Fair there was a race of carriages, often used by travellers in Chutiá Nágpur, drawn and propelled by men. One of these came from Singbhum and had a team of Hos; a collision took place early in the race, and the arm of one of the Ho team was badly fractured. It fell broken by his side, but he still held on to the shaft of the carriage, and, cheering and yelling like the rest, went round the course. The extreme sensitiveness of both men and women is sometimes very painfully exhibited in the analysis of the numerous cases of suicide that every year occur. A harsh word to a woman never provokes a retort, but it causes in the person offensively addressed a sudden depression of spirits or vehement outburst of grief, which few persons would a second time care to provoke. If a girl appears mortified by anything that has been said, it is not safe to let her go away till she is soothed. A reflection on a man's honesty or veracity may be sufficient to send him to self-destruction. In a recent case a young woman attempted to poison herself because her uncle would not partake of the food she had cooked for him. The police returns of Singbhum show that in nine years, from 1860 to 1869, both inclusive, 186 men and women committed suicide in that district. I have already spoken of them as good husbands and wives, but in all the relations of life their manner to each other is gentle and kind. I never saw girls quarrelling, and never heard them abuse or say unkind things of each other; and they never coarsely abuse, and seldom speak harshly to women. The only exception I know is when they believe a woman to be a witch. For such a one they have no consideration. They have no terms in their own language to express the higher emotions, but they feel them all the same.”

Hoduar, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Holongwár, a sub-caste of Sunris in Manbhum.

Hom, a title of Bangaja Káyastha.

Homjah, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Homodimchhá, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Homwár, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Homyagain, a thar of the Dhanjaya gotra of Nepáli Brahman.

Hondagiá, a section of the Dhusía sub-caste of Chamás in Behar.

Hone-hogá, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Hong, a bird with long tail, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Honti, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.
Hopthen, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Hor, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Kýastha.

Horia, a bush, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Horo, red tree-ant, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Horónpáchhá, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Hosainpuríá, a section of the Banodhiá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar.

Hotá, a section of Utkal or Orissa Brahmans.

Hrisi or Ríshi, a synonym for Muchi in Bengal.

Hroïmájusa, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Huddá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Hudínwáí, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Hui, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Kýastha.

Hukpáh, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Hularbaha, a flower, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hundar, wolf, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Huni, mouse, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Hunjar, a section of Tántis and Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Hunri, a synonym for Suuri.

Hupachongbang, he who was blessed and prospered, a sept of the Phedab sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Huru, paddy-bird, a totemistic sept of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Huruj, a sept of Korwas in Chota Nagpur.

Husoí, a sept of Tipperahs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Hutar, a flower, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.
ICHÁ, a sept of the Tungjainya sub-tribe of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Ichapocha, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Ichbariá, a section of the Sátmuliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kédus in Behar.

Ichommah, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Idri, a jungle fruit, a sept of Bairágis in Chota Nagpur.

Ikahan, a section of the Karan Káyasths in Behar.

Ikteh, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Ilámháng, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Imlí, tamarind, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Imsong, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Indi, a title of Khatris and Mayarás in Bengal.

Indra, a title of Dakshin-Ráhí and Bangaja Káyasths.

Indrábárá, a diák or local section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Telis in Behar. The system of exogamy among this sub-caste of Telis seems, however, either to be dying out or to be of recent introduction, for some of the Maghayás say they have no diák, but merely prohibit marriage within nine pirhis or degrees of relationship.

Indrapati, a sub-caste of Rás-togís in Behar.

Indrawár, a section of Báb-hans in Behar.

Indri, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Induar, a kind of eel, a totemistic sept of Nágeswars; a section of Goráníta, Mahilla, Turís, and a sept of Chiká, Lohárás, and Oraóns in Chota Nagpur.

Indur-kateá, house rat, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Inglamphe, the liar, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Ingmaba, he who kept fowls, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Ingyaromba, a sept of the Yangorup sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Isar, a pangat or section of Bánsphor Doms and Dosádhs in Behar.

Isáre, a sept of the Agniá sub-tribe of Meohés in the Darjiling Terai.

Isbo, name of a village, a sept of the Phedáb sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Iswájitauni, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Nepal.

Itawá, a mul or section of the Kanaújia sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Ithbár or Ithbál, a title and a section of Tiyars in Behar.

Ithinku, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Itwár, a section of Kewats in Behar.
Jabagrami, a gud or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmins in Bengal.

Jabali, a section of Brahmins.

Jabaliala, a section of Bhojpuria Halwais in Behar.

Jachandar, appraiser, a title of Jugis and Tantis in Bengal, dating back to the time when the East India Company traded in Indian woven goods.

Jadab-Madhab, a section of the Mahumudabaz sub-caste of Naptas in Bengal.

Jadab-Raiy, a hypergamous group of Kaibarttas in Bakarganj.

Jadan, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Jadu, a section of the Magahiyas sub-caste of Dom in Behar; of Goalas in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Jadu, Jaduah (jada, 'magic'), a sub-caste of Kraunchdwipi Brahmins in Behar who practise fortune-telling.

Jadubansi, a sub-tribe of Rajputs (Sher. i. p. 123). The Ahir Paiks of Chota Nagpur also call themselves Jadubansi Rajputs. A sub-caste of Goalas in Behar and the North-Western Provinces.

Jadwali, a section of Goalas in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Jadwar, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Jagaha, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Jagai, a gud or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmins in Bengal.

Jagannathi or Uriya-Kumhar, a sub-caste of Kumhars in Orissa.

Jagat, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Jagatpur, a mul or section of the Naomuli or Majraut sub-caste of Goalas in Behar.

Jagda, Jagdar, a sept of Mundas.

Jagmanra, a section of the Biyahun and Kharidah Kalwars in Behar.

Jago, tamarind, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Jagsari, a sept of Birhors in Chota Nagpur.

Jahari, a title of Loharas, derived from their sharpening weapons, the gloss of which is called jahar.

Jahnavi, a section of the Gangotia caste in Behar.

Jahur, a sub-sept of the Hemrom sept of Santals.

Jai, Pübi, a sub-caste of Utkal Brahmins in Orissa.

Jaibele, a sub-caste of Sunris in Western Bengal.

Jailak, a mul or section of the Naomuli or Majraut sub-caste of Goalas in Behar.

Jaimini, a section of Brahmans.

Jainagari, a section of Awadhia Hajjamis in Behar.
Jaintimasi, a section of the Bárui caste in Bengal.

Jaintpur, a section of the Biyáhuñ and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Jaipur, a mul or section of the Ayodhiá sub-caste of Hajjáms in Behar.

Jaipuriá, a section of Amahta Káyasths and a mul or section of the Banodhiá sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar; a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Jaisi, (i) in Behar a synonym for Jyotisi, q.v.; (ii) in Darjiling and Nepal a sub-caste of Brahmans, some of whom are probably Jaisi Brahmans who have immigrated from the plains, while others are the illegitimate children of Upádhyya Brahmans by women of their own caste, or of Upádhyya or Jaisi Brahmans by slave women.

Jaisi, Jotkhi, or Jotsi, a sub-caste of the Kraunchdwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Jai Singh, a section of Tiyars in Behar.

Jáiswár, Jáisvédra, Jessoudra, Jashar, Jansvára, Jessvar, a name of a sub-caste or sept of Rajputs; of Telis, Baniyas, Barais, Kurmis, Tántis, Dhánuks, Kalwárs, Chámárs, etc. Sir H. Elliot thinks the name may imply that the people bearing it “came originally from Jais, a large manufacturing town in Oudh.” The name is very widely diffused, and it is impossible to say for certain to what main caste we should refer persons who described themselves in the Census schedule as Jaiswárs by caste. Chámárs are particularly fond of assuming this designation, which appears to associate or identify them with the more respectable Kurmi.

Jaitar, a sept of the Suryabansí sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Jaithariá, a section of Bábhnás in Behar.

Jaiwár, a hypergamous group of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jákáki, a class of up-country Brahmans who come to Bengal in search of employment as priests.

Jáji, a section of Bábhnás in Behar.

Jajír, a section of Bábhnás in Behar.

Jájnakályá, a section of Brahman.

Jajpuriá, a sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans in Orissa.

Jajuwáre-Bhárám, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jajuwáre-Udánpur, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jajuwáre-Jamuní, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jajuwáre-Pachahí, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jakhalpuriá, a section of Lohárs and Sonárs in Behar.

Jalaiwár-Jálé, a mul of the Bátsya section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jalaiwár-Maránchí, a mul of the Bátsya section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jalaiwár-Ganraul, a mul of the Bátsya section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.
Jalaiwár-Málí, a mui of the Básra section of Maithil Brahman in Behar.

Jalálpur, a díkh or local section of the Magháyá sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Jálbaruár, net, a totemistic section of the Kurmi caste in Chota Nagpur and Orissa, the members of which will not make or touch a net.

Jál Chhatri, a title of Sura-hiyás.

Jalewár (holder of fishing nets), a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Jaliásinghi, a section of Goria Gowár or Dahiár Goálás in Behar.

Jálík, a sub-caste of Kaibarttas in Máládh.

Jálíyá, a title of Málos in Eastern Bengal.

Jáliyá, Jálíyá, Jele, Jálo, Jodá, Jéliyá, a general name in use throughout Bengal Proper as the popular designation of all classes of people who are engaged in boating or fishing. The etymology of the word is uncertain: some derive it from jál, 'a net,' others from Jál, 'water.' Strictly speaking it is not a caste name, but is applied indifferently to Málós, Tiyars, Kaibarttas, Bauris, Bágdis, Raýbansis, and Mahomedans. In Noákáhi, however, the term seems to have developed into the designation of a caste divided into four endogamous groups—Chátgáon Jálíyá, Bhuluá Jálíyá, Jhálo Jálíyá, and Kaibartta Jálíyá. The last-named group consists doubtless of fishing Kaibarttas as distinguished from the cultivating members of that caste; while Jhálo may perhaps be a synonym for Málo. The other groups seem to be peculiar to Noákáhi.

Dr. Wise, who had special opportunities of observing the fishing castes, describes them as "remarkable for strength, nerve, and independent bearing. The finest examples of Bengali manhood are found among them, and their muscular figures astonish those accustomed to the feeble and effeminate inhabitants of towns. The physique of the Dacca fisherman is more robust than that of the same class on the Hughlí, a fact noticed by Bishop Heber fifty years ago."

No one belonging to a fisher caste will fish with a rod and line, or use a harpoon, as the Shikárís do. Bengal fishermen use the seine, drift, trawl, bag, and cast nets. The Kaibarttas, however, will not employ an Uthár or Ber net, which are favourites with the Tiyar and Máló.

Nets are made of hemp, never of cotton, and they are steeped in gáh (Diospyrus glutinosus) pounded and allowed to ferment, by which means the net is dyed of a dark brown colour, becoming after immersion in water almost black. Floats are either made of sholá or pieces of bamboo, but dried gourds are occasionally preferred. Sinkers are made of baked clay or iron.

The following are the common nets in use among Bengali fishermen:—

1. Jhákí or kahepla is the circular cast net met with in all Eastern countries. It is usually six or seven cubits in diameter, and is either thrown from the bank of a stream or from a boat. The circumference is drawn up into loops, or rather puckered, and weighted with iron. It is folded on the left forearm, while the edge and the central string are held by the right hand. By a sudden and forcible swing of the body the net is cast, and if properly thrown slights on the surface of the water, forming a complete circle. On its touching the bottom the fisher slowly draws it towards him by the string just mentioned, and as he does so the heavily-weighted edge comes together, and no fish can escape. The outcast Bagdi in Central Bengal swings the net round his head before casting it, but no respectable fisherman would dishonour his calling by so doing.

2. The uthår and gultı are magnified cast nets, differing only in size and in the dimensions of the meshes. They are shot from a boat placed broadside to a stream, with the net folded on the edge. One man holds the centre rope, while two others gradually unfold and drop it overboard. As the boat drifts the net falls in a circle, and is then slowly drawn up. One of these nets is often forty feet in diameter, and a long boat like the jalká is required to shoot it from.

3. The sāngla is a small trawl net, used for catching hilsă. The lower edge of the bag is weighted, and after being shot the boat drifts with the stream. When a fish passing over the lower lip of the net, to which a rope held by the fisherman is attached, is felt to strike the back of the net, it is suddenly raised and the fish secured.

4. The baoți is a fixed bag net, worked on the same principle.

5. Chándi is a large drift net, supported by gourds or bamboo floats, and in the water it hangs as a curtain, like the herring net, the fish being caught by the gills.

6. Ber is a large seine or sweep net, often thirty feet in depth and seven hundred and fifty in length. Several nets are usually joined together to form this "train fleet" or "drift of nets." The upper edge, or back, is buoyed by bamboo, while the lower, or foot, is weighted with iron. This is the favourite net with the Málós on the Meghna, but owing to its great length it has to be shot from two boats fastened together, and when drawn the two "wings," or ends, are slowly brought ashore.

7. Besál or khařa is a fixed net, used either from the side of a boat, balanced by an outrigger, or fixed to posts on the banks of rivers. The net is attached to two bamboos, which meet at an acute angle in the boat, but branching off until separate about fifteen to twenty feet. One man stands at the angle and lowers the net into the water, while another sits at the stern working a paddle with his leg until a certain distance has been passed over, when the net, which is somewhat bagged, is leisurely raised. This net is fancied by Tyars and Málós, who at the first dawn of day may be seen fishing with it off bathing ghāts and around steamers and vessels anchored in mid stream. Small fry are usually caught with it, but when fixed on the margin of a river, where there is a backwater or an eddy, large and weighty fish are often netted.
8. Kona is a large bag net used at the outlets of rivers and streams. The sides are fixed, and the mouth faces the current. The lower lip rests on the bottom, while the upper remains open, and at intervals the former is raised and the fish taken out.

Bengali fishermen are familiar with the habits of fish, and much might be learned from them on a branch of natural history strangely neglected in India. Night is the favourite time for fishing, quiet being necessary for success; and a full moon, or sunset and sunrise, are favourable times for shooting nets. The first of a spring tide is also a period when fish move.

It is a curious coincidence that the English fisherman, when looking for a place to shoot his large drift, or herring net, taps with a piece of wood the planks of his boat, close to the water line. The Malo is equally aware of the fact that brisk undulation of water frightens fish, causing them to move; and as the net is being drawn, a man beats the side of the boat with an oar, by which means the draught is increased.

During the month of mourning for a parent, no fisherman can ply his trade, or have any dealings in fish, unless he gets a special dispensation from the purohit.

All fishermen object to sell the skate (ságus), and will not retail in any way but whole the pangas (Pimelodus pinguis), garuš (Silurus garus), and gagar (Pimelodus gagora). Neither will they catch or sell crabs, nor touch the "putká" or bladder fish. Many of the fishers of the casies of India have the Muhammadan aversion to fish without scales, and few will eat, or even handle, the "singi" (Silurus singo). Eels, however, they sometimes cook, but owing to the rich and heating properties of the flesh it is not a favourite article of food. Muhammadans of the Hanifi school never eat amphibious animals as the crab, consequently the only Bengali-Muhammadans who use them as food are the indigent residents of Chittagong.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Jāliyás in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>10,633</td>
<td>5,374</td>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>1,561</td>
<td>5,210</td>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>1,870</td>
<td>3,670</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>765</td>
<td>4,099</td>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,870</td>
<td>3,670</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadapur</td>
<td>20,510</td>
<td>20,583</td>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>23,202</td>
<td>40,738</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>15,829</td>
<td>15,389</td>
<td>Bareipore</td>
<td>20,400</td>
<td>23,607</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>25,979</td>
<td>13,494</td>
<td>Barakand</td>
<td>15,025</td>
<td>15,185</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naba (Nabi)</td>
<td>20,593</td>
<td>14,936</td>
<td>Malsantik</td>
<td>30,200</td>
<td>34,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anmol</td>
<td>20,593</td>
<td>14,936</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>9,328</td>
<td>8,628</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jeeora</td>
<td>45,044</td>
<td>36,836</td>
<td>Osbati</td>
<td>10,365</td>
<td>11,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munsmedabad</td>
<td>5,014</td>
<td>7,246</td>
<td>Bill Tracts</td>
<td>1,339</td>
<td>1,295</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>10,236</td>
<td>13,206</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>......</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahi</td>
<td>10,593</td>
<td>13,774</td>
<td>Nazirabad</td>
<td>34</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BasNgur</td>
<td>10,301</td>
<td>8,107</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>99</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barga</td>
<td>6,183</td>
<td>5,815</td>
<td>Manikham</td>
<td>2,648</td>
<td>3,806</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paidasa</td>
<td>20,646</td>
<td>20,260</td>
<td></td>
<td>......</td>
<td>......</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1. The Tetradon patoca. It emits a sound when lifted out of the water and fills itself with air. Like the T. Fakhos of the Nile, it serves as a plaything for fisher children.
Jallad, an executioner, a hangman, a term which appears as a caste designation in the schedules of the Census of 1881. The persons who so described themselves were probably Doms.

Jálo, a title of Málö in Eastern Bengal.

Jálúá, a group of the Báljani sub-caste of Kóchh in Northern Bengal.

Jálwá, a title of Málö in Eastern Bengal.

Jalwar, net, a sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Jámadagni pátá, a section of Utkal or Orissa Brahmans.

Jámadagnya, a section of Brahmans and Káyasthas in Bengal.

Jámádar, a section of the Chaubhán sub-caste of Nuniás in Behar.

Jámádar, sergeant in a native regiment, a police officer, a cashier, and sometimes a sweeper, who is so called by his fellow-servants in derision, he being the lowest servant in the household.

Jámálpuri, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Jamar Katyál, a thar of the Bharadwaúja gotra of Nepáli Brahmans.

Jámátya, a sept of the Tipperah tribe in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Jambar, a section of the Oswál Baniyáís.

Jámgot, a totemistic section of Nuniás in Behar.

Jámrakáñ, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Jámrukhi, a gén of the Bétsya gotra of Bérondra Brahmans in Bengal.

Jarnutti, a kind of grain or vegetable, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Jamuáon, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Jamuár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans and of the Amásha sub-caste of Káyasthas in Behar.

Jámulú, a sept of Hos in Singhbhum.

Jáná, Jéndá, a sub-caste of Águris in Bengal; a title of Chásás and Khandaíts in Orissa, and of Goálás and Káibarttas in Bengal.

Janágachiá, a section of Awadhiá Hajáms in Behar.

Janakpuri, a sub-caste of Telis and Chamárs in Behar; a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Jánumiar, a sept of Chiká in Chota Nagpur.

Janaráshti, a section of Tántis in Bengal.

Jándá, a title of Kéntis in Bengal.

Jáneri (Jáneo-ri), wearer of the jáneo or sacred thread; a title of Brahmans and Rajputs.

Jangatras, cowbone, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Jángli, Jángla, a native of the jungles. The word is used in a special sense in connexion with inland emigration to denote non-Aryan coolies from Chota Nagpur, whose immunity from fever renders them the most valuable class of labourers for Assam.

Jánjdiá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Janku Samrai, a sept of Ho in Singbhum.

Janwár, a section of Bábhans and Maherais in Behar.

Jarangait, a section of Lohárs in Behar.

Járdár, a title of Hajáma.

Jarhuáiit, a territorial section of Binds in Behar.

Jariár, a totemistic section of Turis in Chota Nagpur signifying a lizard.

Jariagámbha, jari tree, a totemistic sept of Juánga in Orissa.

Jár-Kámni, a section of Kámis in Darjiling.

Jaru, a section of Awadhiá Hajjáma in Behar.

Járu, a totemistic sept of the Bhumí tribé in Manbhum.

Jaruhár, a sub-caste of Koíris in Behar who do permit widows to remarry.

Jas, a title of Dakshin-Bárrhi and Bangaja Káysthas.

Jasatbár, a sept of Surajbansí Rajputs in Behar.

Jasiám, a section of Lohárs in Behar.

Jasgráml, a gáin of the Sábarna gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Jaswár, a sub-caste of Dhánus, Kándus, Kábárs, Kurmis, and Telis in Behar, see Jáis-wár.

Ját, a sub-caste of Goálás in Behar whose sections are Gadhuwal, Chitosia, etc. They hold the title of Chaudhri, Singh, and Marár.

Játh, a class of Mahomedan herdsmen in Behar; a religious group of Jugis in Bengal.

Játham, a sub-caste of Dhobis in Behar.

Jathot, a division of the Párball-Kurí sub-caste of Gonrhis in Behar who are distinguished from the rest of the sub-castes by treating as exogamous groups the divisions which the others regard merely as titles having no bearing on marriage.

Játhot, a sub-caste of Kewats in Behar.

Játi-Karmakár, a sub-caste of Kámárs in Noakháli.

Játi-Madak, a sub-caste of Madhunápits in Bengal.

Játi-Mech, a sub-tribe of Meches in the Darjiling Terai.

Játi-Pátní, a sub-caste of Pátní in Bengal.

Jatrámá, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Jatrí, a sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Jattia, Jetti, a class of wandering mendicants from the North-Western Provinces.

Játukárna, a section of the Dákshinátya Bairik Brahmans in Bengal, and of Utkal Brahmans in Orissa.

Jaum, a section of Awadhiá Hajjáma in Behar.
Jaunpuri, a sub-caste of Telis in Behar who sell oil, but do not manufacture it; also of Chamárs.

Jaunpuri Kamlapati, a sub-caste of Baniás in Behar.

Jawáliá, a mul or section of the Tinmuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Jai, a sub-section of the Bharadvája section of Utkal Brahmans in Orissa.

Jebel, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Jedhríá, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Jeruhet, a section of Maghayá Kumhár in Behar.

Jeseriet, a mul or section of the Sátmuliá or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Jeshkuchá, a thar or sept of Sunuwars in Darjiling.

Jesiwár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Jespuchá, a thar or sept of Sunuwars in Darjiling.

Jeswár, a sub-caste of Baniyas; of Chamárs in Behar who are said to have come from the North-West Provinces and work as servants, syces, and labourers. See Jáiswár.

Jethhaut, a sub-caste of Kaimarttas and Nágars in Behar.

Jethautijá, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Goriá sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Jethkar, a sub-caste of Gan-gotás in Behar.

Jethman, a title of the Sangtarásh sub-caste of Gonrhis in Behar.

Jethulliar, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Jethuríá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Jewal, a section of Madhesiá Halwáis in Behar.

Jewni, a section of Chandáls who catch and sell fish.

Jhá, Ujha, or Ojha, a title of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Jhádadiá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Jhagdoliá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Jhagreb, a thar or sept of the Bárah-Gurung sub-tribe of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Jhaj, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Jhámál, Jhampati, a gás of the Bharadvája gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Jhandáhá, a mul or section of the Banodhiá sub-caste of Kalwars in Behar.

Jhángar, a variant for Dhángar, q.v.

Jhángdi, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.
JHANKAL JHOBL 346

Jhankai or Jandi, a title of Kandhs in Orissa.

Jhankri, a quack doctor in Nepal.

Jhápabasriar, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Jhári, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Jhárudá, a synonym for Mehtar or sweeper.

Jháruá, a sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans in Orissa.

Jháruka, a broom-maker; a title applied roughly to several of the low castes.

Jhátiá or Jhetiá, a sub-caste of Bauris, Korés and Lohars in Western Bengal.

Jhátideká, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Jhauáit, a territorial section of Binds in Behar.

Jhiniá, a section of Pátnias.

Jháruá, Khaki, a small caste of Chota Nagpur, believed by Colonel Dalton to be a sub-tribe of Gonds. Babu Rakhal Das Haldar thought they were Kaibarttas, who had made their way up the valley of the Brahmani and settled in Chota Nagpur. He mentions in support of this hypothesis the fact that the Jhora Malik of parganas Biru and Kesalpur in Lohardagá bears the title Behara, which is used by the Kaibarttas in Bengal. But the title Behara is common among the Dravidian tribes of Orissa, and there is no need to go so far as the Kaibarttas to explain it. The Malik in question calls himself a Gangabans Rajput, and all landholding Jhoras claim similar rank. The Beharas of Biru were bound to supply diamonds to the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur, and several villages are said to have been granted to them on these terms. In the south of Lohardagá and in the Tributary States Jhoras earn a miserable and uncertain livelihood by washing gold in the beds of the streams. Their appliances are primitive to a degree—a scraper in the form of a flattened iron hook set in a wooden handle, and a shallow wooden dish about two feet long and eighteen inches wide. The scraper is used to collect what an Australian would call 'pay-dirt' from the chinks and corners of the rocks in the bed of the stream, and this dirt is then manipulated with water by dexterously rocking the dish this way and that, until the smallest particles of foreign matter have been separated and there remains only a fine deposit of black sand in which tiny specks of gold are seen to sparkle. The use of mercury being unknown, the very small and invisible gold is of course lost. As regards the earnings of the Jhoras, the evidence is necessarily somewhat uncertain. Colonel Haughton was told in 1854 that a vigorous man often earned as much as twelve annas in a day, a sum enormously exceeding the daily wages of unskilled labour, which cannot then have been more than an anna. Mr. Robinson found that men whom he paid at the latter rate got for him from three to four annas' worth of gold; and it may be taken for granted that men working for themselves would earn more than this. Colonel Dalton, on the other hand, speaks of gold washing as a very poor business, at which a man could not expect to earn more than a bellyful (pet-bhar) as the Jhorás simply put it. Doubtless the amount varies considerably in different localities, and the Jhorás themselves would be disposed to underrate it for fear the local Bajá might begin to take an interest in the subject. They are, moreover, a depressed and indolent class of people, and are believed to be not entirely free from a superstitious prejudice against trusting too much to their own exertions.

The Jhorás of Lohardaga have three sections—Kásyapa, Krishnátreyá and Nag, and they observe the rule that a man may not marry a woman of his own section. In the matter of prohibited degrees supplementing the rule of exogamy, their practice is unusually lax, for they allow a man to marry the daughter of his maternal uncle or his paternal aunt, a departure from the ordinary rules which strikes one as curious. By religion they are Hindus, employing Brahmans as priests and burning their dead in the usual way except in the case of lepers, women who die in childbed, persons who die of small-pox or leprosy, and infants who die before the ceremony of Karnabédh or boring the ear has been performed. The landholding Jhorás profess to marry their daughters as infants in accordance with orthodox Hindu usage; the gold-washing class adhere to the adult marriage characteristic of the Dravidian tribes while untouched by Hindu influence.

Jhorá, a title of Kewats or fishermen in Behar.

Jhumurwála, a class of Mahomedan musicians.

Jhuri, dried bushes, a sept
of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Jié, a river fish, a sept of Mudas and Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Jiárwár, a section of the Sátmuliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kandus in Behar.

Jihu, a bird, a sub-sept of the Hansda sept of Santás.

Jijicha, a thar or sept of Sunuwárs in Darjiling.
JITIAPIPAR.

Jitiapipar, a fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Jug, a section of Rautías; a sub-sept of the Saren sept of Santás; a synonym for Bairági.

Jogidási, a sub-caste of Sunris in Maldah.

JNÁNBAR, a name of a family of Grihaist Jugis in Bengal.

Jog, a hypergamous group of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Joléha, Joláhá, Juláhá, Momin, the Mahomedan weaver caste of Bengal and Behar. Dr. Wise thinks that they “belonged to a despised Hindu caste who in a body became converts to Muhammadanism.” It would seem, however, that the formation of a weaving caste within the ranks of the Mahomedans may be accounted for without supposing that any compact group was converted en masse. The structure of the large and heterogeneous aggregate known as the Tánti caste (see article Tánti) suggests, not that all Tántis derive their origin from a distinct tribe devoted to the weaving trade, but that separate weaving castes were formed in different parts of the country out of the materials which were at hand in each case. The same thing may well have happened among the Mahomedans; while the low esteem in which the profession of weaving is held would suffice to cut off those adopting it from intermarriage with their co-religionists.

The customs of the Joláhás, says Dr. Wise, are essentially Shiah, and are observed with the punctiliousness which often characterises converts of dubious social position. During the month of Muharram they do not comb their hair, chew betel, or eat from vessels in which fish has been dressed. Besides, on the fifth, sixth, and seventh days of that month they wear the baddhi and kafnī badges of the martyred Imams. In former days the Joláhás were peculiar among Mahomedans in never having the Kābis, or marriage settlement, drawn up in presence of the Qāzi; but of late years the practice has been introduced, and in addition a Mahr-Namah, or deed of settlement, is executed. The titles of Joláhás are Kāriger, Mālik, Mandal, and Shikdār. Their headman is called Muṭābar.

In Behar during the Muharram Joláhá women abstain from chewing betel, combing their hair, using oil or vermilion, and putting spangles (tikī) on the forehead. They assume, in short, the garb of widowhood and mourn for Hassan and Hossein as the Greeks mourned for Adonis, sleeping on the bare ground and avoiding intercourse with their husbands. They wear baddhi and kafnī on the 8th of the month, and on the night of the 9th they break their bangles, attire themselves in green sāris, and go forth with dishevelled hair, chanting dirges for the murdered Imams.
The following extract from Behar Peasant Life shows how low a place the Jolhá occupies in popular estimation. The sayings quoted by Mr. Grierson have very wide currency, and are by no means confined to Behar:

"The Mussalman weaver or Jolhá is the proverbial fool of Hindu stories and proverbs. He swims in the moonlight across fields of flowering linseed, thinking the blue colour to be caused by water. He hears his family priest reading the Qurán, and bursts into tears to the gratification of the reader. When pressed to tell what part affected him most, he says it was not that, but the wagging beard of the old gentleman so much reminded him of a pet goat which had died. When forming one of a company of twelve he tries to count them, and finding himself missing wants to perform his own funeral obsequies. He finds the rear peg of a plough, and wants to set up farming on the strength of it. He gets into a boat at night, and forgets to pull up the anchor. After rowing till dawn he finds himself where he started, and concludes that the only explanation is that his native village could not bear to lose him, and had followed him. If there are eight weavers and nine hukkas, they fight for the odd one. Once on a time a crow carried off to the roof of the house some bread which a weaver had given his child. Before giving the child any more he took the precaution of removing the ladder. Like the English fool, he always gets unmerited blows. For instance, he once went to see a ram fight and got butted himself, as the saying runs:

Karigâh chhâr tantasâ jây, Nâhak chot Jolhâ khây.

"Another story (told by Fallon) is, that being told by a soothsayer that it was written in his fate that his nose would be cut off with an axe, the weaver was incredulous, and taking up an axe kept flourishing it, saying, yon karba ta gor kâthôn, yon karba ta háth kâthôn, aur yon karba tah ná—if I do so I cut my leg; and if I do so I cut my hand; but unless I do so my no—, and his nose was off. A proverb—Jolhá jâmâthi jau kátsi?—does a weaver know how to cut barley?—refers to a story (in Fallon) that a weaver, unable to pay his debt, was sent to cut barley by his creditor, who thought to repay himself in this way. But instead of reaping, the stupid fellow kept trying to untwist the tangled barley stems. Other proverbs at his expense are—kûâ chalâi bâs ken, Jolhá chalâi ghâs ken—the weaver went out to cut grass (at sunset), when even the crows were going home; *Jolhá bhuliasâh tîsi khet,—*the weaver lost his way in the linseed field, an allusion to the swimming exploit already recorded. His wife bears an equally bad character, as in the proverb—*bâsât Jolhini bôpák dûnhrî noche,—*a wilful weaver's wife will pull her own father's beard."

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Jolhás in 1872 and 1881. It appears that some Jolhás are considered to be Hindus who are insignificant in number, and as such returned in the Census of the latter year as well as in certain districts of the former year.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barakura</td>
<td>192</td>
<td>192</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burdwan</td>
<td>365</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>899</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>432</td>
<td>493</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>1,267</td>
<td>493</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>3,432</td>
<td>287</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>705</td>
<td>199</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>76</td>
<td>1,168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>6,023</td>
<td>183</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmahal</td>
<td>230</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>523</td>
<td>265</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhojpur</td>
<td>1,672</td>
<td>700</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dist.</td>
<td>10,464</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Puridpur</td>
<td>6,250</td>
<td>819</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sakaram</td>
<td>3,748</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansing</td>
<td>1,185</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>144</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>201</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>77</td>
<td>2,104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>3,303</td>
<td>21,716</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>25,047</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardaha</td>
<td>646</td>
<td>199</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sinhbum</td>
<td>291</td>
<td>84</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>4,600</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>250</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Jonáli, a pathi or hypergamous sub-group of Barendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Jonári, an endogamous division of Paśchátya Baidik Brahmans in Bengal.

Jongan, a section of Murtmis in Darjiling.

Juáng, Patud, a non-Aryan tribe of Keunjhar and Dhenkanal in Orissa, classed by Colonel Dalton on linguistic grounds as Kolarian. Their language is said to approach more closely to the Khariá than to the other Kol dialects; but it has borrowed largely from Uriya, and also contains a number of words of uncertain origin.

They are, says Colonel Dalton, a small race like the Oraons, the males averaging less than five feet in height, and the women not more than four feet eight inches. Their predominating physical characteristics appear to be great lateral projection of the zygomatic arches and general flatness of feature; upright, but narrow and low, foreheads projecting over a very depressed nasal bone; pug-noses with spreading nostrils; large mouths, thick lips, receding lower jaw and chin. The hair is coarse and frizzly, the prevailing colour being a reddish brown.

The opinion that the Juángs are closely related to the Mundas and the Khariá derivés some support from the fact that the women tattoo their faces with the same marks as are used by these tribes—three strokes on the forehead just above the nose, and three on each temple. They swear on earth taken from an ant-hill and on a tiger skin. The Khariás hold the ant-hill sacred, and the oath on the tiger's skin is in common use among Hos and Santás.

The Keunjhar Juángs claim to be the autochthones of the country, and trace their descent on the male side to a race of celestial beings who danced in the Guptaganga hills with the leaf-clad daughters of men and took some of them to wife. The village of Gonasika, which is considered the head-quarters of the tribe, was visited by Colonel Dalton about twenty years ago. He found there twenty-five families of Juángs living in tiny huts measuring about six feet by eight, very low, and with very small doors. These were divided into two compartments—one used for stores, and the other being the living-room of the head of the house and his wife and daughters. The boys of each family slept in a large dormitory near the entrance of the village, which also served as a lodging for guests. All the habits of the tribe were then of the most primitive character. Ironsmiths and smelters of iron were unknown, and there was no word for iron in their language. The arts of spinning and weaving were equally strange to them, and, like the Australian aborigines, they had never attained to the simplest knowledge of pottery.

"The females," says Colonel Dalton, "had not amongst them a particle of clothing. Their sole covering for purposes of decency consisted in a girdle composed of several strings of beads, from which depended before and behind small curtains of leaves. Adam and Eve sewed fig leaves together and made themselves aprons. The Juángs are not so far advanced; they take young shoots of the Ásan (Terminalia tomentosa) or any tree with long soft leaves, and arranging them so as to form a flat and scale-like surface of the required size, the sprigs are simply stuck in the girdle fore and aft and the toilet is complete. The girls were well-developed and finely-formed specimens of the race, and as the light leafy costume left the outlines of the figure entirely nude, they would have made good studies for a sculptor.

The beads that form the girdle are small tubes of burnt earthenware made by the wearers. They also wore a profusion of necklaces of glass beads, and brass ornaments in their ears and on their wrists, and it was not till they saw that I had a considerable stock of such articles to dispose of that they got over their shyness and ventured to approach us."

The men of the Juáng tribe, though still preserving a tradition that they used to wear kopius or loin-cloths made from the bark of the tumba tree, use instead of leaves a small strip of cotton cloth. Up to a few years ago the women were deterred from following their example by the tradition that the goddess of the Baitaraní river "emerging for the first time from the Gonasika rock came suddenly on a rollicking party of Juángs dancing naked, and ordering them to adopt leaves on the moment as a covering, laid on them the curse that they must adhere to that costume for ever or die." In 1870 the curse was removed by Captain F. J. Johnstone, Superintendent of the Keunjhar State, who had acquired great influence with the people, and induced the women to dress themselves in cotton clothes.

The internal structure of the Juáng tribe is shown in Appendix I.

Internal structure. There are no sub-tribes, and the entire community forms a single endogamous group. The septs are totemistic, the totems comprising the names of animals, trees, and plants. A man may not marry a woman of his own section, and must also observe certain rules regarding prohibited degrees which do not seem to be very precisely defined. I gather, however, that marriage with the descendants of the paternal uncle is prohibited for a certain number of generations, but that the rule is less strict concerning the descendants of a maternal uncle.

As a general rule Juángs give their daughters in marriage only after they are grown up; and sexual license before marriage, though not expressly recognised, is nevertheless tolerated as a necessary incident of a system of free courtship. Of late years instances of infant-marriage have occurred in the tribe; but these were exceptional cases, due to the desire of particular families to imitate Hindu usage. The marriage ceremony is simple. The bridegroom sends a party of his friends to propose for the girl, and if his offer is accepted the wedding day is fixed and a cart-load of unhusked rice delivered by way of bride-price. The bride is then brought to the bridegroom's house by his friends and hers, is dressed in new clothes, and has a set of brass ornaments put on. Consummation follows at once, and the night is spent in feasting. In the morning the bridegroom dismisses the bride’s friends with a present of three measures of husked and three of unhusked rice. The presence of a priest is not ordinarily deemed essential, but in some cases the village dehhari is called in to add a religious sanction by sprinkling rice and turmeric on the heads of the wedded pair.

Polygamy is permitted, and there appears to be no rule limiting the number of wives a man may have. No Juáng, however, says Colonel Dalton, has ventured on more than two at a time; and even this indulgence is only resorted to when the first wife proves barren or faithless. A widow may marry again, and is expected, though not compelled, to marry her deceased husband's younger brother. In the event of her choice falling upon an outsider, she is not allowed to marry until a year after her husband's death. No special ritual appears to be ordained for the marriage of a widow: the bridegroom merely gives her a new cloth and some bracelets, and provides a feast for the elders of the caste. Divorce is permitted, with the sanction of the pancháyat, for adultery, disobedience, scolding, and barrenness. The woman is simply taken back to her father's house and left there. In cases of special hardship, where the wife is held not to have been in fault, the husband is required to give a heifer or three or four rupees to the wife's family. as compensation for his action in divorcing her. Divorced wives may marry again by the same form as widows.

"The Juangs appear to be free from the belief in witchcraft, which is the bane of the Kols, and perniciously influences nearly all other classes in the Jungle and Tributary Mahals. They have not, like the Khariá, the reputation of being deeply skilled in sorcery. They have in their own language no terms for 'god,' for 'heaven' or 'hell,' and, so far as I can learn, no idea of a future state. They offer fowls to the sun when in distress, and to the earth to give them its fruits in due season. On these occasions an old man officiates as priest: he is called Nágam. The even tenor of their lives is unbroken by any obligatory religious ceremonies."

My own enquiries lead me to doubt the accuracy of this account. The Juangs of Keunjhar worship a forest deity called Barám, who stands at the head of their system and is regarded with great veneration. Next to him come Thánpati, the patron of the village, also known to the Savars, Másimuli, Kálápát, Báswali, and Basurnati or mother earth. Buffaloes, goats, fowls, milk, and sugar are offered to all of these, and are afterwards partaken of by the worshippers. No regular days seem to be set apart for sacrifice, but offerings are made at seed time and harvest, and the forest gods are carefully propitiated when a plot of land is cleared from jungle and prepared for the plough. In addition to these elemental or animistic deities, the Hindu gods Siva, Durgá, and Balabhadra are beginning to be recognised, in a scanty and infrequent fashion, by the tribe. Brahmans as yet have not been introduced, and all religious functions are discharged by the dehari or village priest.

Juangs burn their dead, laying the corpse on the pyre with the head to the south. The ashes are left at the place of cremation or are cast into a running stream. A few days after death a meagre propitiatory ceremony is performed, at which the maternal uncle of the deceased officiates as priest. Offerings to departed ancestors are also made in October, when the autumn rice crop is harvested.

Agriculture is believed to be the original occupation of the tribe. "They cultivate," says Colonel Dalton, "in the rudest way, destroying the forest trees by the deadly process of girdling them, burning all they can of the timber when it dries and sowing in the ashes. They thus raise a little early rice, Indian corn, pulses, pumpkins, sweet potatoes, ginger, and red pepper,—seed all thrown into the ground at once to come up as it can. They declare they subsist every year more on wild roots and fruits than on what they rear, but I doubt if they are so badly off as they pretend to be. The area of their cultivation appeared proportionate to their numbers. They pay no rent, being under obligation to serve the Rájá, repair his house, and carry his burdens when required to do so in lieu of money payment, and they spend no money in clothes; it is difficult to understand, therefore, their not having a sufficiency of wholesome food, unless it be that they spend all their substance in drink.
They are no doubt addicted to ardent spirits, and they are obliged to buy what they consume, as they have not acquired the art of distilling or even of brewing rice-beer, which every Kol understands."

In regard to food they are not in the least particular, eating all kinds of flesh, including mice, rats, monkeys, tigers, bears, snakes, frogs, and even offal, and for them the jungles abound in spontaneously-produced vegetables. In the quest of such food they possess all the instinct of the animal, discerning at a glance what is nutritive, and never mistaking a noxious for an edible fungus or root.

The Juangs do not look a warlike people, but when urged to it by the Bhuiyas, whose lead they invariably follow, they are sometimes troublesome. They use the bow and arrow, but their favourite weapon is the primitive sling, made entirely of cord. They take "pebbles from the brook," or stones as they find them. They have no idea of fashioning them to produce more efficient projectiles."

The tribal dances of the Juangs, which seem to be totemistic in character, are thus described by Colonel Dalton:

"In one figure the girls moved round in single file, keeping the right hand on the right shoulder of the girl in front; in another, with bodies inclined they wreathed their arms and advanced and retreated in line. In this movement the performance bore a strong resemblance to one of the Kol dances. Then we had the bear dance. The girls, acting independently, advance with bodies so much inclined that their hands touch the ground; thus they move not unlike bears, and by a motion from the knees the bodies wriggle violently, and the broad tails of green leaves flap up and down in a most ludicrous manner.

"The pigeon dance followed: the action of a love-making pigeon when he struts, pouts, sticks out his breast, and scrapes the ground with his wings was well imitated, the hands of the girls doing duty as wings. Then came a pig and tortoise dance, in which the motions of those animals were less felicitously rendered, and the quail dance, in which they squatted and pecked at the ground after the fashion of those birds. They concluded with the vulture dance, a highly dramatic finale. One of the men was made to lie on the ground and represent a dead body. The girls in approaching it imitated the hopping, sidling advance of the bird of prey, and, using their hands as beaks, nipped and pinched the pseudo-corpses in a manner that made him occasionally forget his character and yell with pain. This caused great amusement to his tormentors."

"I had heard of a 'ballet' called 'the Cocks and Hens,' but this they could not be induced to exhibit. It was admitted that it was impossible to keep the leaves in proper position whilst they danced it. It was too much of a romp, especially for a day performance."

The social status of the tribe cannot be precisely defined. They are beyond the pale of Hinduism, and no member of any recognised caste will eat or drink with them. Juangs themselves will take cooked food, water and sweetmeats from the Bhuiyás, but a Bhuiyá will not take even water from a Jüáng. In course of time no doubt they will attain a higher social position, and the first step in this direction has already been taken by their partial adoption of some of the Hindu gods.

In 1872 the Jüángs numbered 9,398 in the Tributary States, while in 1881 only 3 were returned in Cuttack and 606 in the Tributary States.

Jubhinge, a thar or sept of Jugi, a sub-caste of Tántis in Khabus in Darjiling.

Jugi, Jogi, a weaving caste of Eastern Bengal, many of whose members have of recent years been driven by the competition of English piece-goods to betake themselves to agriculture, lime-burning, goldsmith's work, and the subordinate grades of Government service. The origin of the caste is extremely obscure. Buchanan thought it probable that they were either the priesthood of the country during the reign of the dynasty to which Gopi Chandra belonged, or Śúdras dedicated to a religious life, but degraded by the great Śaiva reformer Śankara Káhárya, and that they came with the Pál Rájas from Western India. In Rangpur he found the Jogis living by singing an interminable cyclic song in honour of Gopi Chandra. This is all the information collected by that shrewd and trustworthy observer, and since the beginning of the century no fresh facts have been added. The Máya sub-caste of Jogis give the following account of their origin. In the Vrihad Yogini Tantra, their chief religious work, it is written that to Mahádeo were born eight passionless beings (Siddhas), who practised asceticism and passed their lives in religious meditation. Their arrogance and pride, however, offended Mahádeo, who, exercising his power of Maya or illusion, created eight female energies, or Yoginis, and sent them to tempt the Siddhas. It was soon apparent that the virtue of the perfect ones was not so impregnable as they boasted, and the issue of their amours were the ancestors of the modern Máya Jugi. Another account is that a Sannyásí Avadhúta, or scholar, of Benares, who was an incarnation of Śiva, had two sons: the elder, by a Bráhma woman, becoming the progenitor of the Ekadási Jugi—the younger, by a Vaisya woman, of the Máya; but it is probable that this legend has been invented to account for the fact that these two sub-castes perform the obeisual rites at different periods.

The Ekadási Jugi, when questioned about their descent, refer to a Sanskrit work called Vriddha Sáttásapata, in which the Muni Sáttásapata relates how the divine Rishi Nárada was informed by Bráhma that near Benares resided many Bráhma and Vaisya widows, living by the manufacture of thread, who had given birth to sons and daughters the offspring of Avadhútas, or pupils of Náthas, or ascetics. The Rishi was further directed to proceed to Káśí, and in consultation with the Avadhútas, to decide what the caste of these children should be. After much deliberation it was determined that the offspring of the Avadhútas and Bráhma widows should belong to the Śiva gotra, while the issue of the Vaisya widows should form a class called Nath; the former, like the Brahmans, being impure for eleven days, the latter like the Vaisya for thirty days. Both classes were required to read four Vedas, to worship their Mātris or female ancestors at weddings, to perform each household for itself the Nándī Śrāddha in the name of their forefathers, and to wear the sacred cord. It was further enacted that the dead should be buried, the lips of the corpse being touched with fire by the son or grandson. It is from these Brahman widows that the modern Ekādaśi Jugis claim to be descended, and being of that lineage, mourn for only eleven days, although they have never assumed the Brahmanical cord.

Turning from these mythical events to the history of the caste in more modern times, we find that most Jugis in Eastern Bengal regard the family of Dalāl Bazar, in the Noakhali district, as the head of their race, and recall with some pride the fact that in the middle of last century Braja Ballabh Rāj, a Jugi, of this family was Dalāl, or broker, his brother Radhá Ballabh Rāj being Jachandār, or appraiser, of the English factory of Char Pāta, on the Meghna. The son of the former developed the trade in Bātālah cloth to so great an extent that the Company in 1765 bestowed on him the title and rank of a Rājā, presenting him at the same time with a lākhiraj or rent-free estate, which is still held by one of his descendants.

In the Presidency districts the Jugis are assuming the sacred thread en masse, and this pretension has given rise to numerous quarrels with the Brahmans, some of which have ended in protracted and vexatious litigation in the Criminal Courts.

On the evidence now available it is difficult to arrive at any definite conclusion regarding the manner in which the caste arose. There is nothing beyond the fact that they are generally looked down upon by Hindus, and follow a despised occupation to indicate a difference of race. Independent evidence of non-Aryan descent is wholly wanting. There remain the alternatives of degradation or mixed descent, both of which play a prominent part in the standard Indian theory of the formation of castes. But here, again, we have no data to form a basis for serious discussion. For the present, therefore, the problem must be abandoned as insoluble.

The internal structure of the caste is stated in Appendix I, and may be briefly described here. In Eastern Bengal we find two main sub-castes—the Máśya, who perform the srāddha thirty days (māsa) after death, and the Ekādaśi, who celebrate it after eleven (ekādaśa) days. The former abound in the southern parts of Bikrampur, Tipperah, and Noakhali; the latter in the north of Bikrampur and throughout the Dacca district generally. No intermarriages take place between them, and each refuses to taste food cooked by the other, although they drink from each other's water-vessels. Besides these divisions arising from the observance of different funeral ceremonies, there are others based upon differences of habitat and occupation. The cultivating members of the caste form a distinct group called Hálwa Jugi, and it is alleged that they were outcasted for abandoning the traditional pursuit of weaving. The lime-burning Jugis of Tipperah are said to have incurred a similar condemnation. In Murshedabad, on the other hand, the Jugis who lived by weaving cotton cloth are said to have taken to agriculture without qualifying their original designation or forfeiting their position as the recognised main body of the caste; while sub-castes have been formed corresponding to the special pursuits which particular groups have adopted. Among these are the Rangrej-Jugi, who dye cotton thread, the Kambule-Jugi, who make blankets, and the Manihari-Jugi, who work in lac and weave ribands. Others again prefer a division into the three groups Rârhi, Baidik, and Barendra, which seem to have been borrowed from the higher castes in the struggle for social precedence. In Bardwan a fourth division—Khelfinda—is added to these. In Noakhali this larger territorial grouping appears to be unknown, and the endogamous divisions are given as Sundip-Nâth, comprising Jugis who live on the island of Sundip, and Bhulûa-Nâth, or residents on the mainland. Even smaller local divisions occur in some districts. I am informed that in Murshedabad the Jugis of thanâ Kandi will not intermarry with the Jugis of thanâ Barawa, while in Tipperah the Jugis of pargana Sarail marry only among themselves.

The Dharmaghare uugis, who are found in Western Bengal, are looked down upon by the Jugis of other parts of the country. They worship Dharma, Sitalâ, Manasâ, and other aboriginal deities, and their only sanaskâr is the wearing copper in some form, such as that of a ring or bracelet. They beg from door to door, carrying the effigies of those deities in their hands, and singing songs in their honour.

They say that their original progenitor, an ascetic, after obtaining siddhi, success in yog, married the daughter of Kasyap Rishi and had a son by her. When he died his son went to his grand-father Siva (who is reckoned the father of all those that become ascetics) and asked his advice as regards the disposal of his father's dead body. Siva thought it should be buried after the manner of ascetics, but the widow wished it to be burned, because the deceased had been a grhastra or householder. So the son, wishing to please both, compromised matters by putting fire on the mouth of the corpse and then burying it. The more advanced among them affect to follow the Hindu system of the 10 sanaskârs or dasakarmas and to use the same books as the Brahmans, such as the work of Bhabadeb Bhatta, used by all Sâmvedi Brahmans. Some of them even attend toks or indigenous Sanskrit Colleges, but they have to sit in the courtyard, and are regarded more or less as intruders.

They say that they have only one gotra, the Siva, and four pracaras—Siva, Sambhu, Sankara, and Apnasbat; but as marriage in the same gotra is prohibited, they have devised a fiction by which the bride at the time of marriage becomes a member of the Kasyapa gotra. The sections of the caste are of a mixed character. Some have clearly been borrowed from the standard Brahmanical series, while others, such as Matsyendra, Goraksha, and Birbhairab, seem to lend support to the conjecture hazarded above that the caste is an offshoot from some sect of ascetics. In some districts the three hypergamous groups of Kulin, Madhyalá, and Bângal appear to be recognised; while elsewhere there are only two Brahman-Jugi and Dandi-Jugi. In both cases the rule is said to be observed that a man of a higher group may marry a woman of a lower group, but a certain loss of social position is entailed by doing so.

Jugis marry their daughters as infants and follow the standard Hindu ritual, a member of their own caste officiating as priest. Their practice as to exogamy and the reckoning of prohibited degrees is the same as that in vogue among the higher castes. A second wife may be taken if the first is barren or suffers from an incurable disease. Divorce is not formally recognized: a woman found guilty of unchastity is cast off by her husband and turned out of the community. Widows are not allowed to marry again.

The great majority of the caste worship Mahadeo or Siva, but a few Vaishnavas are also found among them.

Religion.

The Másya Jugis have no Brahmans who minister to them, but a spiritual leader, Adhikári, elected by the Purohitas referred to below, is invested with a cord and styled Brahman. In Tipperah and Noakhali the cord is still worn, but in Dacca of late years it has been discarded. The Adhikári of the Másya Jugis in Dacca is Mathurá Ramana, of Bídgaon, in Bikrampur, a very illiterate man, who can with difficulty read and write Bengali. The post has been hereditary in his family for eight generations, and now-a-days it is only in default of heirs that an election is held. It is a curious circumstance that the Adhikári bestows the mantra on the Bráhmans of the Ekádasí, and occasionally on Sannyasi Jugis, although neither acknowledge any subjection to him. The Adhikári has no religious duties to perform, as each household employs a Purohit to minister at its religious ceremonies. The Purohit is always a Jugi, inducted by the Adhikári and subordinate to him. He is often a relative, or marries a daughter of his master. The Adhikári, again, has his Purohit, without whose ministration neither he nor any member of his family can marry or be buried. The great festival of the Másya Jugis is the Sivaratri, held on the fourteenth of the waning moon in Mág (January–February); but they observe many of the other Hindu festivals, such as the Yamáshtami, and offer sacrifices beneath the bat tree to the village goddess Siddhesvari. In all religious services they use a twig of the Udumbara, or Jagyá dúmúr (Ficus glomerata), and regard with especial reverence the tulasi, bat, pipal, and tamála (Diospyrus cordifolia). They have stháns, or residences, at Brindabán, Mathurá, and Gokula, but their chief places of pilgrimage are Benares, Gayá, and Sítakund in Chittagong. The Ekádasí have Bráhmans of their own, called "Varna-Sarman," and addressed as Mahátmá, who trace their origin from the issue of a Srotiyá Brahman and a Jugi woman. In Bikrampur alone it is estimated there are at least a hundred of these Jugí Bráhmans. The majority of this division of Jugis are worshippers of Krishna, but a few who follow the Sákta ritual are to be met with. The Gosáins, who are followers of Nityánanda, admit Jugis into their communion, but those of Adwaita decline to have anything to do with them.
The Jugi Brâhmans are, with few exceptions, illiterate, but a few gain a livelihood as Pâthaks, or readers of the epic poems. Jugi are the Mahants of the Kapila Muni shrine in the Sunderbuns, and officiate at the Varumi festival in Phâlgun.

In the burial of their dead all Jugs observe the same ceremonials. The grave (samadhsi or ahasan) is circular, about eight feet deep, and at the bottom a niche is cut for the reception of the corpse. The body, after being washed with water from seven earthen jars, is wrapped in new cloth, the lips being touched with fire to distinguish the funeral from that of a sannydsi or ascetic and a Mahomedan. A necklace made of the Tulasi plant is placed around the neck, and in the right hand a rosary (japa madd). The right forearm, with the thumb inverted, is placed across the chest, while the left, with the thumb in a similar position, rests on the lap, the legs being crossed as in statues of Budha. Over the left shoulder is hung a cloth bag with four strings, in which four cowries are put. The body being lowered into the grave, and placed in the niche with the face towards the north-east, the grave is filled in, and the relatives deposit on the top an earthen platter with balls of rice (pinda), plantains, sugar, ghi, and areca-nuts, as well as a huggs with its chitlam (bowl), a small quantity of tobacco, and a charcoal ball. Finally, from three to seven cowries are scattered on the ground as compensation to Vasumati or mother earth for the piece of earth occupied by the corpse. Women are interred in the same way as men.

The bag with its four cowries, and the position of the body, are noteworthy. With the cowries the spirit pays the Châran, who ferries it across the Vaitaran river, the Hindu Styx; while the body is made to face the north-east, because in that corner of the world lies Kailás, the Paradise of Siva.

The mourning dress of the Jugs is a cotton garment, called "Jala Kacha," literally netted end, manufactured by them, and identical with that worn by other Hindus between the death of a relative and the sradda. In a corner of this raiment the Jugi ties a piece of iron, suspending it over his shoulder. On the eleventh day, when the funeral obsequies are about to be performed, the barber cutting off the iron, gives it to the wearer, who throws it into the water, then bathes, offers the pinda to the manes of the deceased and returns home.

All Jugs believe that the spirits of good men are at death absorbed into the Deity, while the bad reappear on earth in the form of some unclean animal; but women, however exemplary their conduct may have been in this world, are not cheered by any assurance of a future state, and in their case death involves annihilation.

The social status of the caste is very low, and they are everywhere reviled by the Hindus without any intelligible reason being given for the treatment to which they are subjected. If questioned on the subject of the low position accorded to the Jugs, some Hindus will reply that it is because they bury their dead, while all orthodox people practise cremation. Others, again, will explain that the starch of size they use in weaving is made of boiled rice (mář), while the Tántis use parched rice (khai) for this purpose. Whatever may be the reason, there can be no doubt as to the existence of a very strong prejudice against the caste, although the Jugis themselves, whom Dr. Wise describes as “a contented people,” affect to laugh at it. The belief in their impurity is carried to such a length that the Jugi has peculiar difficulties in having his children educated, as no other boy will live with his son, who is consequently obliged to hire lodgings for himself and engage servants of his own. If men of this caste enter the house of any of the clean castes, all cooked food, and any drinking-water in the room, are regarded as polluted and are thrown away. In spite of this the barber and washerman who serve the Súdras work also for them. Jugis themselves, moreover, are not free from intolerance, but they can hardly be blamed for this in a society where a nice sense of ceremonial impurity in other people is a faculty essential to social advancement. They will, for example, eat food cooked by a Srot iyá Bráhman, but not that prepared by any Bárna Bráhman, or by a Súdra, however pure. The Sannyáśi Jugi eats with the weaving Jugi, but a Báiág will only touch food given by the Adhikári. Furthermore, the Ékádáśi Jugi will eat with the Sannyáśi if he is a Bráhman observing the sráddha on the eleventh day.

Until the last few years the Bengali Jugis were all weavers, but now the cloth (dhotí and gamcha) manufactured by them is gradually being displaced by English piece-goods, and the Jugi finds it difficult to earn a livelihood by weaving. The Jugi uses a much more cumbrous loom than either the Tánti or Juláha, but employs the same comb, or shádná, while his shuttle is peculiar to himself. The women are as expert weavers as the men, the preparation of the warp being exclusively done by them.

The following table shows the number and distribution of Jugis in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>Occupation</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwán</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>7,105</td>
<td>5,964</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>Nonkali</td>
<td>3,203</td>
<td>2,275</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhíwbíma</td>
<td>Hill Tracts</td>
<td>6,016</td>
<td>4,498</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>2,360</td>
<td>2,905</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>6,990</td>
<td>5,132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>3,966</td>
<td>2,914</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nálsya</td>
<td>Tirhat</td>
<td>7,988</td>
<td>6,954</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khína</td>
<td>Sáran</td>
<td>1,017</td>
<td>1,047</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>Champaígarn</td>
<td>5,441</td>
<td>4,946</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidábád</td>
<td>Monehyr</td>
<td>8,295</td>
<td>7,658</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinájpur</td>
<td>Bhagálpur</td>
<td>7,141</td>
<td>5,584</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bajásháye</td>
<td>Purníhá</td>
<td>2,381</td>
<td>2,027</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranápúr</td>
<td>Máladhá</td>
<td>6,819</td>
<td>5,707</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bógra</td>
<td>Sántal Pargana</td>
<td>6,569</td>
<td>6,603</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pábna</td>
<td>Guttáck</td>
<td>4,536</td>
<td>4,389</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dárdilíng</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>1,156</td>
<td>1,117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalípóri</td>
<td>Háláshách</td>
<td>3,548</td>
<td>3,493</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,463</td>
<td>2,463</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dúcch</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,557</td>
<td>2,557</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Farídpur</td>
<td>Lohárdánc</td>
<td>2,557</td>
<td>2,557</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zákaraínj</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>4,501</td>
<td>4,501</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Námarísh</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>4,501</td>
<td>4,501</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tippérí</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>1,058</td>
<td>1,058</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Digitized by Google
JUGIDIA.

Jugidiá, a sub-caste of Dhobés in Noakháli.

Jugi Muchi or Köró, a sub-caste of Muchis in Bengal.

Juláhá, a synonym for Jolha.

Jungi, a synonym for Jugi.

Jurhá, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Juruár, a section of Kúrmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Jurvaunt, a section of Awađhiá Hajjáms in Behar.

Jutaut-Bind, a sub-caste of Binds in Eastern Bengal.

Juthasankhwrér, a section of Kúrmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

JYOTISHI.

Juthibariár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Jutiwálá, a dealer in boots and shoes. These articles are made by the Chamár and Rishi, and sold by all Sudras, and even by degraded Brahmans. The bulk of the trade, however, is in the hands of Mahomedans. The business is reckoned highly respectable, and in Eastern Bengal the Mahomedan jutíwalas are strict Farázís, never opening their shops or selling a pair of shoes on a Friday.

Jyotishi, Jos, an astronomer or astrologer. In Bengal the term usually denotes the Acharji Brahman who prepares horoscopes.
Kabai, a section of Majraut Goálas in Behar.

Kabar, a section of Rautías in Chota Nagpur.

Kabari, a synonym for Kunjra in Behar.

Kabar Tantwa, a sub-caste of Tantwas or weavers in Behar.

Kabi-ballabh, a title or popular designation of Baidyas practising medicine, used by themselves.

Kabiráj, a medical practitioner according to the Hindu system. The most respected among them, says Dr. Wise, are generally Baidyas. Kabirájs usually assume bombastic titles, such as Kabi-ratna, Kabi-ranjan, Kabi-chandra, Kabi-Indra, Kabi-bhúshana, Kabi-ballabha, and Baidya-nidhi; but the popular nickname for all doctors is Nári-tepa, or pulse-feeler. Uneducated practitioners and quacks are known as Háthuria, or meddlesome fellows, from háth, the hand; while a still more objectionable and dangerous character is the Ta’liqa Kabiráj, who goes about with a list (ta’liq) of prescriptions, selling them at random, and vaunting their virtues in curing all diseases. He is often a plucked student of the Calcutta College, or a young man too poor to prosecute his studies until qualified for graduation.

Formerly medicine was taught in pátshálas, or schools, the most famous being those of Bikrampur and Kánchrapará, on the Hughli; but at the present day each practitioner of any reputation has a tol, or class, of pupils to whom he translates and expounds the Sástrás, if the youths understand Sanskrit, but if they do not he merely lectures on the principles and practice of Hindu medicine. A class generally consists of from ten to twelve young men of various Súdra castes, and it is computed that about 12 per cent. of the Dacca Kabirájs are sufficiently versed in Sanskrit to interpret it.

The two principal text-books of the Bengal physicians are the Mádhava Nidána, or commentary on the Ayur-veda, and the Chakra-váni. The former, written by a celebrated doctor, Mádhava-Kara, chiefly treats of the diagnosis of diseases, while the latter, named after the writer, who was physician and steward of the court of Gaur, is a later and less valued work. Each Kabiráj has a particular master and system, but the greatest teacher, Dhanvantari, the physician of the gods, is obeyed by all. In the Brahma-

1 Buchanan, iii, 162, derives this sobriquet from ádét, a market.
Vaivartta Purāṇa the names of fifteen great physicians are preserved, but only the following are invoked by the modern doctor, namely:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Dhanvantari</th>
<th>Kāsi Rāja</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Divodasa</td>
<td>Nakula</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sahadeva</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The first three are often identified with one person; the fourth and fifth are the twin sons of Sūrya, the physicians of Svarga, or heaven. On all occasions of anxiety Mahādeva, or Vaidyanātha, "lord of physicians," is also addressed in prayer.

The chief causes of the stagnation of Hindu medicine, which has lasted from prehistoric times, appear to be the discontinuance of the study of anatomy; the belief that the medical Sāstras, being of divine origin, are infallible; and the selfishness of successive generations of physicians in concealing the results of their experience and observation. Kabirajās of the present day often blindly follow the teaching of the Ayur-veda, notwithstanding the opinion that the habits and constitution of the human race and the prevailing type of diseases, have altered since the archaic days of their teachers.

The candid physician confesses that his brethren have not the magnanimity to divulge the merits of a drug which chance or experience has taught them to value; and although it is revealed to a son or favourite pupil, the secret is kept from the profession at large, and consequently is often lost at the death of the discoverer.

The real Baidya always dispenses his own prescriptions; but as this consumes much time and necessitates his limiting the number of his patients, apprentices are employed in pounding and triturating drugs, while the minute subdivision into powders is done by himself in a private recess of the house. Before beginning his work, the Baidya observes a custom, peculiar to physicians of his caste, namely, the worship of Vaidya-nātha, after which the medicine is divided into four parts, one being offered to the Elements, a second to a Brāhman, a third being retained by the physician, and a fourth sent to the patient. As a rule drugs are procured from the shop of the Gandha-banik, or Pansāri, but in olden days the physician had to go himself to the forest and collect whatever herb he wanted.

Consultations are usually held in difficult cases, but the physician who can quote the Sāstras most fluently and interminably is too often deemed the most learned and skilful doctor. Although the Sāstras declare that physic given by the hands of a Baidya has an intrinsic virtue not possessed when it is administered by any other caste, the populace have no such conviction, and as soon as the treatment of a Baidya fails the patient has no hesitation in placing himself under any other doctor, whatever his caste or colour, who has acquired the reputation of curing his particular ailment.

The present state of Hindu medicine in Bengal is sketched in the following particulars, obtained from the Kabirajās themselves.

Kabirajās believe that the human race has degenerated, and that the constitutions of the present generation have changed, and they cite as an instance the type of fever now prevalent, which is more acute and less tractable than the fevers described in the Sástrás. In these works it is enjoined that for seven days no medicines are to be given to a patient, and that he is to fast, or only take liquid food; but now, as soon as a diagnosis is formed, and a propitious hour found, the first dose is given. The examination of the pulse is regarded of primary importance, and many doctors are credited with being able to distinguish a disease by its character. The inspection of the urine is not considered, as it is by the Hakim, of much value, for should a drop touch the physician he becomes unclean, and must at once bathe. When it is inspected the sample is always mixed with mustard oil, and the density of the water estimated by the buoyancy of the oil.

Venesection is never performed at the present day, as the type of the ordinary diseases contra-indicates its use; but cupping or leeches are occasionally ordered. In apoplexy and some forms of hysteria the actual cautery is still employed, and the potential cautery (kshára) is used for destroying piles, and, in a fine state of division, is made into an embrocation and applied over the enlarged spleen and liver.

In the Sástrás enemata are recommended, but, whether owing to the clumsy syringes employed, or to the strange aversion of all Eastern nations to their use, Hindu physicians ceased to order them. Kabirés, however, are beginning to follow the example of English doctors, but much latent opposition is encountered.

Hindu physicians have arrived at the following conclusions regarding the most valued European drugs. Quinine, in extensive use throughout Bengal, is popularly regarded as a heating remedy, and as causing, when injudiciously used, the fever to take a permanent hold, or to return after a short interval. The masses further believe that it drives the fever into the bones, and that if once taken it prevents all other febrifuges from being of the slightest benefit. As a tonic, however, during convalescence from fever, it is admitted by all to be invaluable and unequalled. In extreme cases of fever, after violent delirium has set in, a pill containing a small quantity of cobra poison (bish bari), mixed with other ingredients, is administered by the Kabiréj. When a man is at the point of death and all other medicines have been tried, bits of all the other pills are pounded together and mixed with honey or juice of the betel leaf and given as the last resource.

With educated practitioners the use of mercury has quite gone out of fashion, and iodide of potassium taken its place; but the victims of its abuse are still lamentably common, and scarcely a hospital in Bengal is ever without several poor creatures permanently maimed or disfigured by it.

English or American sarsaparilla is not much esteemed, as a patent or pachan of from nine to sixty ingredients is considered a better alternative. The patient being given twenty-one powders, made of a jumble of herbs, takes one daily and boils it in a seer of water until only a quarter remains; then straining and putting aside the sediment, he drinks the decoction. After the twenty-one days have expired, all the sediments are taken, reboiled, and the decoction drunk for eleven days longer. Finally, the sediment is put into boiling water, and with it the patient takes a vapour bath (bháprá).

Cod-liver oil is considered inferior as a nutrient tonic to divers pills and powders prepared by Kabiráj, and in consumption an oil, called sárchandanadi, made of til oil and numerous herbs, is pronounced more beneficial.

Chicken broth, prohibited in health, is often prescribed in lingering diseases, while the good effects of port wine and brandy in the treatment of low types of fever are acknowledged.

Pills prepared at English druggists are objected to, as the magnesia sprinkled over them interferes, it is thought, with the action of the medicine: consequently the Hindu pills, rolled with the fingers and mixed with honey or the juice of the bela, or pán leaf, are preferred.

Such are the condition and opinions of the better class of native physicians, but the description would be incomplete if it omitted all allusion to the uneducated practitioner met with in every village of Bengal, who secures an extensive, and by no means unprofitable, practice among classes unable to pay for better medical advice. He is often a superannuated barber, or fisherman, who has obtained from some strolling “bairáj” or “faqir” a recipe to cure all diseases. There is perhaps no single complaint which so often awakens the inventive faculty of such men as enlargement of the spleen, and he who acquires notoriety as the possessor of a remedy is courted by all classes. A very nutritious diet of milk, fish, and vegetables is always ordered by these shrewd observers, and is generally assigned by sceptics as the explanation of cures which they undoubtedly sometimes effect.

An amateur doctor, residing in the outskirts of Dacca, earned a lasting reputation by using a vesicatory made with the root of the “Kálá-chítára,” and applied over the spleen. He, however, assigned much of its efficacy to a secret invocation, addressed, in the act of applying the paste, to Lakší Nárayana. The Hindu, moreover, relies as much on the virtues of a cup of water over which a mantra has been mumbled as any Muhammadan peasant, and the water of the Ganges, water taken from a tidal river at the turn of the tide, or water in which the Gosái has bathed, have each their crowd of admirers.

In Bengal, as in ancient Egypt and Greece, certain shrines are still celebrated for the cure of intractable diseases. The most famous are those of Tára keesvara, in Hughli, sacred to Mahádeva; of Vaidyánátha, in the Santál Parganas; and of Gondálpara, in Hughli, famous in cases of hydrophobia. The device followed at the last place is for the bitten person, after fasting, to defray the expense of a special service, and to receive a piece of red broadcloth (Sultány banát), impregnated with the snuff of a lamp wick and secreted in the heart of a plantain called katháli kalá. As long as this charm is preserved, and the patient abstains from eating this variety of plantain, the effects of the bite are warded off. Another plan is for the patient to take a secret medicine, probably cantharides, pounded with 21 pepper-corns, before the 21st day. The effect of this is to make the patient pass urine and mucus—the latter, believed to be kukur ka bachā, ‘the dog’s whelp,’ leading to cure.

Kabiraj, a title of the head-men of the Dom caste in Behar, who have under them servants called Chharidārs to execute or communicate their orders.

Kabirjan, a title or popular designation of Baidyās practising medicine, used by themselves.

Kabi-ratna, a title or popular designation of Baidyās practising medicine, used by themselves.

Kabirdās, Kabirpanthi, Kabri, a follower of the religious reformer Kabir (1488–1512), who taught a monotheistic and tolerant form of Vaishnavism.

Kabirār, a section of Kāyasthas in Behar.

Kábra, a section of Mahārra in Behar.

Kach, tortoise, a totemistic sept of Bhuiyās in Chota Nagpur.

Kách, crab, a totemistic section of the Paripāl sub-caste of Sunris in Manbhum.

Kachāisā, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar.

Rācharu, a small caste of Eastern Bengal, who claim to be an offshoot of the Kāyasths, and tell the following story to explain the separation:—A rich and aspiring Kāyasth determined on celebrating the worship of Kālī in his own house, contrary to the wishes of his brethren, and performed the ceremony, but was punished by being excommunicated. This is a most improbable story, as the Kācharu caste is dispersed throughout Eastern Bengal, being very numerous at Madāripūr in Faridpur, and it has a Purohit of its own. The Sūdra barber and washerman work for them, although their water-vessels are unclean. It is far more probable that, if they were Kāyasths, which is unlikely, they were expelled, like the Chhotābhāgiya Tantis, for adopting a new trade.

The caste has three gotras—Aliman, Kasyapa, and Parāsara. Their patronymics are Datta, Dāsa, and Dē. The principal festival kept is in honour of Viswa-Karmā in Bhādra (August–September).

In Dacca the Kācharu are gradually relinquishing their caste trade, the manufacture of lac bracelets (kācha), in which Muhammadans also engage, and are acting as traders, grocers, and shop-keepers.

Kachá Simar, a mul or section of the Satmuliā or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goāls in Behar.

Kachchhap (the tortoise), a totemistic section of Bāgdīs, Bhars and Māls in Western Bengal.

Kachchhuá, a section of Cheros in Chota Nagpur.

Kachera, a mul or section of the Kanaujia sub-caste of Sonars in Behar.

Kachgawai, a section of the Amashta sub-caste of Kāyasths in Behar.

Kach Gotra, a section of the Banwār sub-caste of Baniyās in Behar.

Káchhati, a gām of the Bha-radvāja gotra of Bārendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kächhgōt, a totemistic section of Nunās in Behar.
KACHHRA. KADAR.

Kachhrá, a section of the Karan sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.

Kachhriyá, a sept of the Rautár sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Káchiári, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Káchim, tortoise, a totemistic section of Kumbhárs in the Santál Parganas; a section of Telis in Bengal.

Káchimári, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Kachnariá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kachoér, a mul or section of the Tinmulié Madhesia sub-caste of Halwéis in Behar.

Kachrá-Mech, a sub-tribe of Meches in the Darjiling Terai.

Kachu, a title of Bangaja Káyasths in Bengal.

Kachuá, Kachhuá, or Kachchh, tortoise, a section of Kanaujíá Halwéis in Behar. The use of the word to distinguish an exogamous group may perhaps be regarded as a survival of totemism; a gotra or section of Hindu Jolahas and Goálás in Behar. A sept or section of Chiks, Loháras, Goráits, Gonds, Ghásís, Orsoms, Mundás, Turia, Tántis, Telis, and of Doms in Chota Nagpur; a sub-sept of the Kisku sept of Santálás, Asuras, Binjhiás, Goálás, Bedias, Bhuiyas, Chamárs, and Kharwars in Chota Nagpur; also of Khandaits in Orissa, and of Kámárs in Singhbhum and the Santál Parganas.

Kachui, a sept of the Tungjainya sub-tribe of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kachwá, a tortoise; the totem of a section of Oraon-Dhángars settled for several generations in Behar; a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kachwáha, a sept of the Suryabansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Kádá, a gotra of the Sándilya gotra of Ráhbi Brahmans in Bengal.

Kádám, nucúlea grandis, a totemistic section of Khánndaita in Orissa.

Kádár, a sub-caste of Kádárs.

Kádár, Bhuiyá, a non-Aryan caste of cultivators, fishermen, and day-labourers in Bhagalpur and the Santál Parganas, probably a degraded offshoot from the Bhuiyá tribe. They are divided into two sub-castes—Kádár and Naíyá—the latter of which may possibly have been developed from among the priests of the forest gods, who are usually called Láyá or Náyá in Western Bengal. There is also a separate caste bearing the name Naíyá, the members of which disown all connexion with the Kádár. The sections of the Kádár are shown in Appendix I. Among them we find Rikhíasan, the characteristic eponym of the Musahars and the Northern Bhuiyás. Most of the others have names familiar as titles. of the lower castes in Behar. These have become exogamous groups among the Kadars, while at the same time the system has been greatly complicated by the fact that owing to supposed differences of descent and social standing some of the groups only intermarry with certain other groups. In all cases the rule of exogamy is one-sided, and alliances with near relatives not excluded by that rule are barred by the standard formula mamará, chacherá, etc., calculated in the descending line to seven generations on the father's side and three on that of the mother. The conclusion suggested by a careful examination of the list is that the Kadars were originally a branch of the Bhuiyas, but has since been recruited from other sources. The vagueness of the word Bhuiyá would obviously rather lend itself to this process. Whatever may be the origin of the Kadars, they are certainly a group of considerable antiquity, for they are referred to in the account of the origin of the human race communicated to Lieutenant Shaw by the Mál Pahariá in 1798.

Kadars marry their daughters as infants or as adults, according to their means, the former practice being deemed the more respectable. Their marriage ceremony is of the type common among low-caste Hindus, sindurádás being the binding portion. The village barber officiates as priest. Polygamy is allowed in the sense that a man may take a second wife if he has no children by his first wife. Widows may marry again by the sagai form, and are subject to no restrictions in their choice of a second husband except those arising from the prohibited degrees. The ceremony consists simply of the application of vermilion to the woman's forehead in the presence of her relatives. It deserves notice that the Kadá custom requires a sagai marriage to be performed in the open air, and will not permit it to take place within the house, thus reversing the ordinary practice under which the marriage of a virgin is celebrated in the courtyard, while the less reputable sagai ritual is relegated to the women's apartments at the back of the house. Divorce is freely permitted, and divorced women may marry again.

Special interest attaches to the religion of the Kadars as representing a comparatively early stage in the process of conversion to Brahmanism, which the aboriginal races of Bengal are now undergoing. The real working religion of the caste is in fact pure animism of the type which still survives, comparatively untouched by Hindu influences, among the Santáls, Mundás, and Oraons of Chota Nagpur. Like these, the Kadars believe themselves to be compassed about by a host of invisible powers, some of whom are thought to be the spirits of departed ancestors, while others seem to embody nothing more definite than the vague sense of the mysterious and uncanny with which hills, streams, and lonely forests inspire the savage imagination. Of these shadowy forms no images are made, nor are they conceived of as wearing any bodily shape. A roughly-moulded lump of clay set up in an open shed, a queer-shaped stone bedaubed with vermilion,—this is all the visible presentment that does duty for a god. Their names are legion, and their attributes barely known. No one can say precisely what functions are allotted to Káru Dáno, Hardiyá Dáno, Simrá Dáno, Pabá Dáno, Mohandú, Lílu, Pardona, and the rest. But so much is certain that to neglect their worship brings disasters upon the offender, death or disease in his household, murrain among his cattle, and blight on his crops. In order to avert these ills, but, so far as I can gather, without the hope of gaining any positive benefit from gods who are active only to do evil, the Kádar sacrifices pigs, fowls, goats, pigeons, and offers ghí, molasses, and heads of Indian corn in the sarna or sacred grove where his deities are believed to dwell. The priest is a man of the caste who combines these sacred functions with those of barber to the Kádars of the village and neighbourhood. The offerings are eaten by the worshippers. For all this the Kádars, if questioned about their religion, will reply that they are Hindus, and will talk vaguely about Parameswar, Mahádeo, and Vishnu, as if they lived in the very odour of orthodoxy instead of being, as in fact they are, wholly outside of the Brahmanical system. To talk about the Hindu gods is usually the first step towards that insensible adoption of the externals of Hinduism which takes the place of the formal and open conversion which sterner and less adaptive creeds demand. The next thing is to set up Brahmans whose influence, furthered by a variety of social forces, gradually deposes the tribal gods, transforms them into orthodox shapes, and gives them places in the regular Pantheon as local manifestations of this or that well-known principle, or relegates them to a decent and inoffensive obscurity as household or village deities. Last of all, if the tribe is an influential one, and its leading men hold land, they give themselves brevet rank as Rajputs.

Kádars burn their dead and bury the ashes at the place of cremation on the second day after death. On the thirteenth day a sort of propitiatory sacrifice is performed, which is repeated after an interval of six months. No periodical offerings are made for the benefit of ancestors in general.

The social rank of the caste is very low if judged by the current standard of food. Doms and Hárís are the only people who will take either food or water from the hands of a Kádar, and though he himself will eat with Káhárs and Bhuiyáás, neither of these will return the compliment. Kádars eat beef, pork, fowls, and field-rats, and indulge freely in strong drink. Concerning beef the Kádars, on whose statements this article is mainly based, were careful to explain that they only ate the flesh of cattle that had died a natural death. This they said with reference to the popular belief that Kádars kill and eat cattle while grazing in the jungle. Most of the caste are agricultural day-labourers, and comparatively few have got land of their own or acquired occupancy rights.

Occupation. Fishing and wood-cutting are their other occupations. On certain occasions they worship the axe and sickle as symbols of their craft.

In 1872 there were 7,120 Kádars in Bhagalpur, while in 1881 they numbered in Gya 13, Darbhanga 4, Saran 6, Bhagalpur 11,470, and Santál Parganas 6,952.
Kádarai, Kádares, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Kadayán, Kadián, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kést, a synonym for Káyasth.

Káhár, a large cultivating and palanquin-bearing caste of Behar, many of whose members are employed as domestic servants by Natives and Europeans. The Brahmanical genealogists represent the Kahar as a mixed caste descended from a Brahman father and a Nisháda or Chandál mother; but it seems more likely that they are a remnant of one of the primitive races who occupied the valley of the Ganges before the incursion of the Aryans. In one sense, indeed, the Kahars may perhaps be regarded as a mixed caste, since their ranks have probably been recruited by members of other castes who adopted the same profession, while their employment as domestic servants in high-caste families may well have led to some infusion of Aryan blood. Like the Bauris and Bégdis of Bengal, they admit into their community Brahmans, Rajputs, Káyasths, and Kurmis and children of Kahar women by men of those castes on condition of performing certain religious ceremonies and giving a feast to the heads of the caste. Instances of men born in a higher caste applying for enrolment as Kahars are probably rare, and occur only when the applicant has been turned out of his own caste for an intrigue with a Kahar woman. Still the mere existence of the rules seems to show that such things do happen sometimes; and in any case the admission of the children of Kahár women by men of the higher castes must have had some effect on the type. The physical appearance of the caste rather bears out the view that they are of mixed descent. Their features often approach the Aryan type, but they generally have darker complexions than are met with among the higher castes.

Mr. Nesfield renders the name Kahár as ‘water-carrier,’ and considers the caste to be sprung from fishing tribes, such as the Gondh, the Turaha or Dhuria, and the Dhimar. He adds that Kahár is ambiguous as a caste designation, and is given specifically “to that caste which has entirely, and for many generations continuously, withdrawn from the occupation of fishing, boating, etc., and which now exclusively devotes itself to domestic service.” Another, and I think more plausible, explanation is given by Sir Graves Haughton (Bengali-Sanskrit Dictionary, s.v. Kahár), who suggests that the word may be a corruption of kándh + bhar, meaning a man who bears burdens on the shoulder.

Kahárs themselves claim descent from Jarásandha, king of Magadha, and tell an absurd story to account for their name.

---

1 Lassen says (see his remarks quoted in article Kewat) that Ka is seldom used in this sense.
Bhagawan, it is said, had a beautiful garden on the Giriyak hill near Rajgir, in Gya, which in a year of unusual drought was nearly destroyed. He therefore promised the hand of his daughter and half his kingdom to any one who should water the garden plentifully with Ganges water in a single night. Chandrawat, the chief of the Kahars, undertook the task. He built the long embankment called the Asurabandh to bring the waters of the Bawan Gangé to the foot of the hill, and from the reservoir thus formed his tribesmen watered the garden with a series of swing lifts (chānur). When Bhagawan saw the work was done, he repented of his promise to give his daughter to a man of low degree, and caused the cock to crow before dawn, at the same time taunting the Kahars with having failed in their undertaking. Deceived by this ruse, and fearing that Bhagawan would slay them for attempting to win his daughter for their chief, the Kahars fled in haste, and when morning broke not a man was there to claim fulfilment of the promise. Their flight was so hurried that they carried with them the implements used for watering the garden. Those who took the bamboos were called Kahars, those who took the ropes were called Magahiya Brahmins, while two other classes got the names of Dhánuk and Rajwár, for some reason which the story does not disclose. It is added that Bhagawan afterwards took pity on the Kahars to the extent of paying them three and a half seers of food-grain (anū) per man, and this or its money value is the proper wage of a Kahar to this day.

The following sub-castes of Kahars are found in Behar:—

Rawáni or Ramání, Dhuría, Dhímar, Kharwára, Turhá, Jaswar, Garhuk or Garauwá, Bisariá, and Magahiya. The origin of these groups is obscure, and the distinctions between them seem to be very imperfectly understood. Some say that in former days there were no sub-castes at all, and that the entire caste had its headquarters at Ramanpur, near Gya. The chief, however, married two wives, who quarrelled so violently that he was compelled to remove one of them to Jaspur. Her descendants formed the Jaswar sub-caste, while the members of the family who remained at Ramanpur were known as Ramánis or Rawánis. The Dhuría are boatmen and fishermen, and also collect the singhára or water chestnut (Trapa Bispinosa, Roxb.) The Dhímar carry palanquins, catch fish, make nets, and are employed as field-labourers and coolies. The Kharwára say they came from Khairagarh, and may possibly be Kharwars who have taken to carrying palanquins. The Turhá believe dealing in fish and vegetables to be their original occupation, but they cultivate and carry palanquins like the other sub-castes.

Among the Rawáni Kahars of the Santal Parganas we find the totemistic sections Nág and Kásyapa, while the same sub-caste in Behar have a local section, called Rawanpur. For the most part, however, the caste appears to have lost its sections, and marriage is regulated by the standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees calculated to seven generations in the descending line. Some, however, say that the prohibition extends as far as any relationship can be traced. Girls are usually married in infancy, but this is not absolutely indispensable, and no disgrace attaches to a family which is unable on account of poverty to get its daughters married before the age of puberty. The marriage ceremony is of the standard type, and appears not to differ materially from that described by Mr. Grierson in Behar Peasant Life. Polygamy is allowed, but the number of wives a man may have is limited to three. A widow may marry again by the sagra form, and is not compelled to marry her deceased husband's younger brother, though it is considered very proper for her to do so. When a widow marries an outsider, he is expected to pay a bride-price of Rs. 2 to her relatives and a fee of Rs. 1 to the headman of the caste. Divorce is permitted on the ground of adultery with the sanction of the panchayat, and divorced wives may marry again. If a woman is convicted of an intrigue with a man of a lower caste, who would not be eligible for admission into the Kahar community, she is at once excommunicated. But if her paramour is a Brahman, Rajput, Kayasth, or Kurmi, the offence may be condoned by giving a feast to the panchayat. This is a strong and well organised body, on which every head of a family is bound to serve when summoned. It is presided over by a sardar, whose office is hereditary. Under him again is a chharidar or staff-bearer, charged with the duty of calling the panchayat together and seeing its orders carried out.

Note: The text is a transcription of the paragraphs as they appear in the original document.

So far as the worship of the greater gods is concerned, the religion of the Kahars is much the same as that of other castes of similar social standing. Most of them are worshippers of Siva or the Saktis, and the proportion of Vaishnavas among them is very small. Members of the Rawani sub-caste observe a peculiar worship in honour of Ganesh on the seventh day of the waxing moon of Kartik (October-November), when, accompanied by Brahmans, they proceed to a wood and make offerings of vegetables, fruits, and sweetmeats under an amalá tree (Phyllanthus emblica), but never sacrifice any animal. A feast is then given to the Brahmans, after which the Kahars dine and drink spirits to excess. The entertainment of Brahmans on this day is accounted as meritorious as the gift of five cows on any other occasion. In addition to Dak, Kartá, Bandi, Gauria, Dharam Ráj, Sókhá, Sambhunáth, and Rám Thákur, whose worship is common throughout Behar, the caste pay special reverence to a deified Kahar called Dámubir, before whose effigy, rudely daubed in red and black paint, goats are sacrificed and betel leaves, sweetmeats, and various kinds of cakes offered at marriages, during harvest time and when illness or disaster threatens the household. As a rule these rites are performed only by the members of the family, who share the offerings among themselves. In Bhagalpur, however, the Maithil or Kanaují Brahman, who serve the caste as priests of the greater gods, are called in to sacrifice to Dámubir, and receive half of the offerings as their perquisite. Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays are the days set apart for the worship of Dámubir. Throughout Behar the status of the Brahmans who work for Kahars as priests appears to be a comparatively degraded one, and they are not received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. The guru of the caste is often a Bairagi or Nanak-shahi ascetic. Kahars burn their dead and perform the ceremony of śraddha on the thirty-first day after death. The ashes are buried near the burning place under a small platform of mud, on the top of which a tulsī tree is planted.

Agriculture, palanquin-bearing, and service in the houses of the higher castes, are the chief occupations of Kahars at the present day. Mr. Nesfield, who regards the Kahár as an offshoot from one of the fishing castes, lays stress on the fact that “his primary function is that of drawing and bringing water for the bath or the table, and this has led to his being employed for various other uses, such as taking care of clothes, dusting the rooms, kneading the chapati preparatory to cooking it, carrying the palanquin, etc.” It is, however, equally probable that the functions of the caste were developed in an order the reverse of that laid down by Mr. Nesfield. People who were qualified to perform the respectable duty of bringing drinking-water to men of the higher castes would hardly take to the comparatively menial occupation of carrying palanquins. Moreover, the fishing castes have always been regarded as specially unclean, and on the face of things would be the last people chosen for a duty so closely bound up with the caste system as that of giving water to their betters. On the other hand, when the members of a particular caste had once been established as palanquin-bearers, their employers would always be tempted on the ground of mere convenience to promote them to the higher duties of personal service. The fact of a man being on a journey has always been recognised as a ground for relaxing the strict letter of the rules regarding food and drink, and it would often happen that while travelling a man would have no one but his Kahárs to look after his personal wants. I have even heard it alleged against some of the landholders in Chota Nagpur, where proper Kahars are scarce, that they had manufactured (būnāyā) Kahars out of Bhuiyas, Rajwars, and the like in consequence of the trouble they were put to by having to travel with men from whose hands they could not take water without losing caste.

Kahárs engaged in personal service consider themselves superior to those who merely carry palanquins or till the soil, and demand a higher bride-price when they give their daughters to them in marriage. Cultivating Kahárs are rarely found occupying any higher position than that of occupancy raiyats, while many of them are landless day-labourers paid in cash or kind.

Socially the caste ranks with Kurmis and Goalas, and Brahmans will take water and certain kinds of sweetmeats from their hands. Traces of their lowly origin may perhaps be discerned in the fact that many of them will eat fowls and even field-rats, and all except the Bhakat or ascetic members of the caste indulge freely in strong drink. Mr. Sherring says that some of them eat pork, but this does not appear to be the case in Behar or Chota Nagpur. In spite of this comparative laxity of diet, they observe some curious prohibitions of their own. Thus a Kawar engaged in personal service with a Brahman, Rajput, Babhan, Kayasth, or Agarwâl, will only eat his master's leavings so long as he is himself unmarried. They are also particular to explain that their women may not wear nose-rings or have their foreheads tattooed.

It was stated in the first paragraph of this article that the Kawars are properly a Behar caste. A certain number of them, however, regularly seek employment outside beyond that province, and some of them become regularly domiciled. The following particulars regarding these outlying branches of the caste are taken from Dr. Wise's notes:—

The Kawar, being the most docile and industrious of workmen, is in much request throughout Bengal, and of late years he has been in great demand as a coolie for the tea gardens of Assam, Kachar, and Chittagong. A few also come yearly from Chaprah, being employed in the city of Dacca as coolies, porters, and domestic servants; but they always return home as soon as a little money has been saved.

Kawars domiciled in Bengal, and known as Doliya, are proscribed by their Hindustani brethren, because, having ceased to observe the peculiar customs of the caste, they have adopted those of the despised Bengali Sudras. The Doliyas are met with along the old post road between Dacca and Calcutta, and at Mansurâbâd, on the Padma river, twenty-five houses are occupied by them, while in Faridpur still larger settlements occur. Palanquin travelling being no longer the custom in the country, the Doliyas have become cultivators, domestic servants, and palanquin-bearers in cities. The Rawâni Kawar is an eager and indefatigable sportsman, but the Doliya is content to catch fish in traps, and has given up hunting and snaring game. In one respect the Doliya is unchanged. Spirit-drinking is to him, as to the Rawâni Kawar, the sumnum bonum of life, but he rejects pork, which is still a favourite article of food with his Hindustanî kinsmen. The Doliyas, rejected by the Kawars and by the Bengali Sudras, have a Brahman of their own, and all belong to a gotra called Aliman. The majority are Saiva worshippers, but a few are Vaishnavas.

In Bengal the Hindi name, Maharâ, is applied to any palanquin-bearers not Kawârs, and in Dacca bearers either belong to the Mitra Seni subdivision of the Bhûnmâlî caste or to the Kândho branch of the Chandâl. A few Muhammadan palanquin-bearers, called Doliwâlas or Sawâriwâlas, may occasionally be picked up, but their numbers are yearly diminishing.

Last century the title Kawar was at Patna the distinctive appellation of a Hindu slave, as Maulazâdah was of a Muhammadan; and the tradition in 1774 was that the Kawar slavery took its rise when the Muhammadans first invaded Northern India. So Buchanan observes that the Rawânis have been entirely reduced to slavery; nor does any one of them pretend to a free birth, but many procure their liberty by the inability of their masters to maintain them, and many more are allowed to do as they please for a subsistence.

1 Slavery in India, by James Peggs, p. 6.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Kahärs in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>1,156</td>
<td>1,744</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>9,063</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>114</td>
<td>271</td>
<td>Nosakhali</td>
<td>1,140</td>
<td>1,778</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>938</td>
<td>2,073</td>
<td>Hill Tractia</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>1,193</td>
<td>1,316</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>7,731</td>
<td>3,283</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>947</td>
<td>2,086</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>106,788</td>
<td>118,644</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>2,931</td>
<td>Shaababad</td>
<td>56,964</td>
<td>71,946</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20-Paraganas</td>
<td>2,663</td>
<td>2,282</td>
<td>Tirhuta (Darbhanga)</td>
<td>33,226</td>
<td>19,010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>1,323</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>1,323</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>1,686</td>
<td>4,707</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munsabadabad</td>
<td>3,416</td>
<td>7,493</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>40,703</td>
<td>40,908</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>758</td>
<td>3,261</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>23,171</td>
<td>31,548</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajabhatye</td>
<td>680</td>
<td>1,269</td>
<td>Furnishah</td>
<td>7,758</td>
<td>12,117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bangpur</td>
<td>707</td>
<td>3,996</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>5,741</td>
<td>3,147</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Borna</td>
<td>311</td>
<td>954</td>
<td>Santal Paraganas</td>
<td>12,918</td>
<td>16,355</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purna</td>
<td>372</td>
<td>3,264</td>
<td>Cutrack</td>
<td></td>
<td>478</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>964</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td></td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>178</td>
<td>1,277</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td></td>
<td>198</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ruch Behar</td>
<td>157</td>
<td>157</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Davra</td>
<td>1,466</td>
<td>1,966</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>24,874</td>
<td>35,840</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,947</td>
<td>3,948</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>20,730</td>
<td>35,148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>557</td>
<td>361</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>170</td>
<td>323</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansingh</td>
<td>199</td>
<td>4,373</td>
<td>Manbhup</td>
<td>5,539</td>
<td>6,889</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Topserah</td>
<td>217</td>
<td>128</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>889</td>
<td>1,348</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kahhál, an oculist, a profession followed by both Hindus and Mahomedans. In Darbhanga there are schools of ophthalmic surgery, and Hindu oculists from that district travel about Behar in the cold season when operations can be most safely undertaken. Many oculists belong to the Khatri caste. In Eastern Bengal similar schools exist, but they are in the hands of Mahomedans.

Kähinoar, a mul or section of the Timmullia Madhesia sub-caste of Halwais in Behar.

Kahrúr, a sept of the Chandrabansi division of Rajputs in Behar.

Kah-tsho-bo, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhoris in Darjiling, the members of which are of a low mixed origin.

Kahu, crow, a sub-sept of the Beérá sept of Santálas.

Káiáre, a mul of the Básyá section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kaibartta, a sub-caste of Kéwats in Bengal.

Kaibartta, Kaibartta-Dás, Cháski-Dás, Húlik-Dás, Purásar-Dás, Dhíevar, Khíyás, a large fishing and cultivating caste of Bengal Proper, taking rank below the Nava-sakha, or group of nine castes, from whose hands a Brahman may take water.

No serious attempt can be made to trace the origin of the Kaibartta. The physical characters of the caste are not marked enough to throw any certain light on their descent, while their exogamous divisions, having been obviously borrowed from the Brahmans, contribute in no way to the solution of the question. All that can be said is that they are one of the characteristic castes of the deltaic districts of Bengal, that the nucleus of the group was probably Dravidian, but that their original cast of feature may have been to some extent refined by a slight infusion of Aryan blood. The type as it stands at present is distinctly an intermediate one, equally removed from the extreme types of Aryan and Dravidian races found in Bengal.

There seem to be good grounds for the belief that the Kaibarttas were among the earliest inhabitants of Bengal and occupied a commanding position. Many centuries ago five separate princedoms—Tamralipta or Tamluk, Bálisita, Turka, Sujamuta, and Kutabpur—are said to have been founded by them in the Midnapur district, and it is perhaps not unreasonable to infer from this tradition that that part of the country must have been one of the earliest seats of the tribe. The fact that none of them are now found occupying the position of large landholders is readily accounted for by the extinction of some families and the transformation of others into pseudo-Rajputs.

Concerning the etymology of the name Kaibartta there has been considerable difference of opinion. Some derive it from ka, water, and cārta, livelihood; but Lassen says* that the use of ka in this sense is extremely unusual in early Sanskrit, and that the true derivation is Kīrarta, a corruption of Kimrarta, meaning a person following a low or degrading occupation. This, he adds, would be in keeping with the pedigree assigned to the caste in Manu, where the Kaibarta, also known as Márgava or Dása, is said to have been begotten by a Nisháda father and an Ayogaví mother, and to subsist by his labour in boats. On the other hand, the Brahma-Vaivartta Purána gives the Kaibartta a Kshatriya father and a Vaisya mother, a far more distinguished parentage; for the Ayogaví, being born from a Sudra father and a Vaisya mother, is classed as pratiloma, begotten against the hair, or in the inverse order of the precedence of the castes.

In another place† Lassen mentions a story told by an obscure Greek writer, Orthagoras, in his book On Things Indian, how the people of the village Koythos fed their goats upon fish, and goes on to say “seeing that in popular speech the name of the mixed caste Kaibartta, to whom the business of boating and fishing has been allotted, must become Kewatt, and the v would drop out in Greek, this village, doubtless situated on the sea or on a river, must have derived its name from the fact that it was inhabited by Kaibartas.” Whatever may be thought of this as a specimen of a kind of conjecture of which Indian antiquarian research furnishes too many examples, the passage seems to deserve quotation partly for the curious and characteristic story which it contains, and partly for the opinion which it expresses that Kewat and Kaibartta are merely two names for the same tribe, or at any rate for the same occupation. Kaibartta, the Sanskrit or Prakrit form, has been preserved in Bengali, and is still in general use as the name of the caste in question, while the shorter form Kewat has become current in Behar.

---

* Ind. Alt. i, 770. † Ind. Alt. iii, 342.
The simplest explanation of the relation between the Kaibartta and the Kewat appears to be that both belonged to one and the same tribe, but that the branch which settled in Behar gradually became endogamous and adopted a Hindi name, so that the two groups are now virtually distinct castes and have been so treated in this book. Numerous instances could be cited in which endogamous groups originally formed within the body of an existing caste have in course of time severed their connexion with the parent group and come to be accepted as distinct castes. As is usual in such cases, the two groups stand, or affect to stand, on a different social level, and the group bearing a Sanskritised name arrogates to itself some sort of undefined superiority. In Orissa, on the other hand, the two names are current side by side; but Kaibartta is used by members of the caste, while only outsiders have the bad taste to talk of Kewat.

In the case of the Kewat and Kaibartta several legends have arisen to account for the separation of the two branches, which deserve notice for the light they throw upon the growth of this sort of folklore. One of these tells how in Bengal there was a powerful tribe called Kewat, whom Ballal Sen raised to the grade of pure Sudras, conferring on them the title of Kaibartta in return for their undertaking to abandon their original profession of fishing. The Kansaujia Brahmans, however, refused to officiate for them on their promotion, and the Vyásokta Brahmans were appointed to be their priests. Now these Brahmans are either the descendants of, or, as another story has it, were appointed by Vyása, himself the son of a fisher girl, Matsyagandhá, by Parésara Muni. The Kaibarttas of Bengal claim the same parentage, and allege that at the great assemblage of the castes before Ballá Sen they urged their right, as the descendants of the Muni Vyása, to be included among the Naba-sákha. But Ballá Sen refused to listen to their plea, and allotted them one of the most degraded priests. At the present day the Brahmans who serve the Kaibartta are so generally despised that no clean Sudra will touch anything cooked by them, and in reality they rank beneath the Sudra.

A variety of legends are current in the Midnapur district concerning the origin of the Vyásokta Brahmans, who serve the Kaibarttas as priests. They are said to be descended from Barhu, a sage who composed heterodox Puránas and was cursed by Brahmá with the curse that he and his descendants should be priests to men of the Sudra caste. In consequence of this curse the Vyásoktas were told off to serve the Kaibarttas, the children of Bidur, on the banks of the Sarjyu river.

Another story tells how the Kaibarttas rendered a great service to Ballá Sen and were told to name their reward. They asked the King to compel the local Brahmans to serve them as priests; but the Brahmans refused to obey, and the King, in order to keep his promise, vowed that the first man he saw in the morning should be made the Kaibarttas' priest. Next morning early when the King looked out the first man he saw was his own sweeper sweeping out the courtyard. This was not quite what the Kaibarttas meant, but the King's vow had to be kept, so the sweeper was invested with the sacred thread and sent to minister to the Kaibarttas.

A third legend says that after the Kaibarttas had settled in Midnapur a certain Kaibartta merchant dug a big tank in Parganá Kásijora. To consecrate this tank a Brahman had to be got who could kindle the sacred fire by the breath of his mouth. The Vyásokta were unequal to this feat, but a Drávida Brahman performed it. His caste brethren expelled him for having served a low caste, and he therefore settled in Midnapur.

Like the Kaibarttas themselves, the Kaibartta Brahmans of Midnapur are divided into two sub-castes, Uttar Rárhí and Dákhin Rárhí, the names of which enable them to pose before the ignorant as Rárhí Brahmans. Members of the higher castes, however, who will take water from the hands of the Kaibarttas will not take it from Kaibartta Brahmans, and the Kaibarttas themselves will not eat food cooked by their own Brahmans.

The internal divisions of the caste differ in different districts. They are shown in tabular form in Appendix I. The exogamous divisions have been borrowed from the Brahmans and, as has been observed above, give no clue to the origin of the caste. The endogamous divisions are based either upon occupation or upon habitat, but these distinctions are not everywhere recognised to the same extent: thus in Central Bengal and Maldah we find the cultivating and fishing groups, variously called Hálíik and Jálik or Chásá and Jálwah or Jáliyá, clearly differentiated, while in Dacs there is no Chásá or Halwaha division, and the Dás Kaibarttas have not yet separated into a distinct caste. In the latter district the Jálwah or fisher Kaibarttas are all members of one gotra, the Aliman, and have the common title of Dás, but a few individuals who practise medicine have assumed the title of Baidya. In Hughli there are four sub-castes, two territorial—Uttar-rárhí and Dákhin-rárhí—and two occupational, Jéliyá or Málá, who live by fishing, and Tutiyá, who rear silkworms. The name of the last group is derived from tut, the mulberry tree, on the leaves of which silkworms are fed.

The divisions of the caste in Bakarganj are curious and interesting, and deserve somewhat fuller examination by reason of the light they throw upon the process by which endogamous classes are formed, and even upon the growth of the caste system itself. There the Kaibarttas are divided into two groups—a cultivating group, known as Hálíá Dás, Parásara Das or Chási Kaibartta, and a fishing group, known simply as Kaibartta. Clearly the latter group represents the main body of the caste, while the former comprises those Kaibarttas who have abandoned their original occupation and betaken themselves to the more respectable profession of agriculture. But the separation has not been long enough in force, or has not gained sufficient acceptance to render the two groups completely endogamous. Intermarriage is permitted between them, but is restricted by certain conditions. Girls of the Hálíá-Dás class can be given in marriage to Kaibarttas, but if a man of the former class marries a Kaibartta girl, his family is deemed to have been guilty of a mésalliance, and descends a step in social estimation. Such marriages frequently take place, but a substantial price is paid by the Kaibartta family for the privilege of getting a bridegroom from the higher class. Similar relations exist in Jessore between the Harlo, ploughing, and Mecho or fishing Kaibarttas. Among the Háliá Dás themselves the following families have the titular rank of Kulin:—Kálá Ray, Háliá Báláí, Jédab Ray, Bhuban Kuri, Mánji, Samaddár, Charmanái Ray, and Majumdár. All the rest are classed as Bángáls. Kulins and Bángáls may intermarry, but the latter must pay to the former a bride or bridegroom-price for the honour which an alliance with them confers. The Kaibartta in their turn are divided into Chandradwipi and Bára hazári, the former being the superior group and demanding a premium in case of intermarriage. The following titles denote Kulin families:—Káwár, Mandal, Mánji, Páthar and Síkdár, the rest are Bángáls.

The subdivisions of the Dakhin-Rárhi group—Lalchátái, Éksidé, Dósidé, and Mákunda—found in Midnapur are of an uncommon type, and seem to have been originally hypergamous as regards the Lalchátái, the highest of the series. It is explained that they used to have a ‘red mat’ to sit on, as a mark of social distinction, at the meetings of the Kaibartta caste. The next two names are based on a marriage custom. The Éksidé, when they go with a wedding procession to fetch the bride, will not eat in her father’s house on the wedding night. He therefore sends them a present (side) of food, which they cook and eat in a neighbour’s house. The Dósidé extend this to the night after the wedding, and therefore are described as two-present men. Mákunda is said to be an eponymous group. They carry their own wedding presents to the bride’s house, and they eat cooked food with any Kaibartta, whether he belongs to their class or not.

The Háliá Dás have the following sections:—Alamyán, Káyap, Bharávdáj, Parásár, and Ghrita-Kausik, of which only the first two are recognised by Kaibarttas. But in both groups the rule prohibiting marriage within the section, though admitted to have been binding in former times, has fallen into disuse of late years. In Orissa, on the other hand, traces of totemism still survive among the caste, and the rule of exogamy is invariably enforced. I may remark here that in regard to the observance of this rule Eastern Bengal presents a remarkable contrast to Western Bengal and Behar. Not only is the number of sections recognised in any particular caste peculiarly small, but the law of sectional exogamy is often disregarded altogether. It may be conjectured that this is due in some measure to the example of the Mahomedans of the eastern districts. Islam knows nothing of exogamy, and enjoins the marriage of first cousins as a peculiarly suitable alliance. The large Mahomedan population of Eastern Bengal, coming of the same race as the Hindus and maintaining close social relations with them, could hardly fail to exercise considerable influence on their matrimonial arrangements.
Like most orthodox Hindus, the Kaibarttas of Bengal perform the ceremonial marriage of their daughters before they attain puberty, and sometimes when they are only three years old. The girls, however, do not go to live with their husbands until they are fully grown up. Complaints, indeed, are not uncommon of a girl being kept at home by her people to assist in household work long after the time when she was physically capable of entering upon married life. In the case of males marriage is often delayed by inability to pay the pan or bride-price for a suitable maiden, which runs rather high among respectable Kaibarttas, and may amount to as much as Rs. 200 or Rs. 300. Polygamy is permitted in this sense and to the extent in which it is permitted to orthodox Hindus; but in practice it is very rarely resorted to. Widows may not marry a second husband. Divorce is permitted on the ground of adultery, but divorced wives are not allowed to marry again.

The Kaibarttas of Orissa depart in certain material points from the orthodox standard in matters concerning marriage. Infant-marriage is allowed to be the more excellent way, and most parents endeavour to follow it; but no disgrace attaches to the marriage of a girl after puberty. The widow is allowed to marry again, and is expected to marry her late husband's younger brother. The ceremony is a simple one. A feast is given to the members of the caste, and a bracelet is put on the right wrist of the bride. Divorce may be effected by a chhadepatra or letter of divorce, written in the presence of the headman and a few of the leading members of the caste. Divorced wives are allowed to marry again.

In connection with the recognition of widow-marriage in Orissa, I may mention the tradition current in the Contai subdivision of Midnapur that in the Amli year 1223 a famine occurred in those parts and some widows took to themselves second husbands. The chief Kaibartta Rájá is said to have put a stop to the practice. Can we argue from this that widow-marriage, still current among the Kaibarttas of Orissa, survived among the Kaibarttas of Bengal down to 1223?

In religion the Kaibarttas conform to the ceremonial observances of Hindus in general. With very few exceptions, the entire caste belongs to the Vaishnava sect, their guru being a Gossain and their purohits patit or barna Brahmans. The period of mourning in Bengal Proper is thirty days, as is appointed for Sudras; but in Midnapur this is reduced to fifteen, and in Orissa to ten.

The characteristic festival of the caste is the Játádpání, or laying by of the net, which begins on the 1st of Mágh (January–February). From this date commences a close period, lasting from two and a half to seven days, during which no fishing operations are carried on. On the last day the river Ganges is worshipped, the net being spread on the bank and smeared with red lead. Offerings are made to the river goddesses, prayers recited by the caste Brahman, and a live kid thrown into the water, which in Eastern Bengal becomes the perquisite of the Bhuinmáli or Pátni.
So far as I can ascertain, there are no minor gods peculiar to the caste. It is said, however, that Sitala, the departmental goddess of small-pox, and Chandi, a form of Káli, are worshipped with especial devotion in Kaibartta villages. The offerings made to these two goddesses on ordinary occasions consist of rice, sweetmeats, fruits, and small coins. Goats are sacrificed and clothes and ornaments presented in fulfilment of vows made by persons suffering from illness or in recognition of some special stroke of good luck. Neither Sitala nor Chandi have as yet attained to the dignity of having regular temples and images or special priests set apart for their service. In Bengal the caste Brahman of the worshipper, in Behar a Chatiyá or Bhakat, performs the simple ritual which custom prescribes. A rough block or slab of stone set up under a pipal, banyan, or seorhá tree, smeared with red lead and bathed in clarified butter or milk, represents to the mind of the villagers an ill-defined, but formidable power, which must be propitiated at regular intervals on pain of sickness or death.

Another grámd devatá or village deity of the same type commonly worshipped by Kaibarttas is Bura-Buri, literally old man and old woman, a well-known androgynous divinity of Eastern Bengal, which is believed to have been adopted by Hinduism from some more primitive system of belief. The annual festival of Bura-Buri falls on the Paush-Sankrénti, or last day of the month of Paush, corresponding to December and January.

In the occupation of the cultivating Kaibarttas there is as a rule nothing to distinguish them from other Hindu castes who are engaged in agricultural pursuits. It is said, however, that in former days all Kaibarttas used to allow their bull calves to be castrated. In course of time it came home to them that this practice was abhorrent to all good Hindus, and a few families bound themselves to give it up. Their descendants now call themselves Lakhi-narayán, to denote their zeal in the cause of religion, and Tera-gharia, to keep in remembrance the fact that thirteen families took part in the original resolution. All cultivating Kaibarttas now abstain from the practice in question. Regarding the fishing Kaibarttas of Eastern Bengal, Dr. Wise has collected some interesting information. When a man of this class has saved some money his first idea is to give up fishing and become a fishmonger (nikári), using in his leisure hours a cast net, but no other. Kaibarttas generally cultivate a field of hemp for their own use, or, if they hold no land, give an advance to a neighbour and get a patch planted out. They themselves prepare the fibre; their wives spin it; and in this way nets, ropes, and twine are manufactured.

Kaibarttas are the chief curers of fish in Eastern Bengal. They work during November and December, when fish are most abundant and the weather is cool. Early in November a piece of land is leased by the water side, and the fishermen of the neighbourhood are 1 Trophis aspera. The Sanskrit name is sákhota. It is also known as Pisácha-dru, Pisácha-briksha or Bhuta-briksha, the tree of ghosts or goblins.

---

engaged to bring in large quantities of the small poti or pompi fish. The fish is placed between mats and trodden under foot and then slowly dried in the sun. No salt is used. The product is exported to districts where fish cannot be got in the cold weather. In Maimansinh larger fish are gutted, dried in the sun, and buried in pits. When dug up at the beginning of the rains, it is known as sukhti, and is exported to Sylhet and Kachar, where it is esteemed a great delicacy.

The social status of the Kaibartta is not altogether easy to determine, as the fisher sub-castes would necessarily occupy a lower position than purely agricultural groups. The Halié Kaibarttas are usually allowed to smoke in the same hooka with members of the Nava-sákhā, and this fairly marks their position as standing first below that group. The same privilege is not accorded to Jáliyá Kaibarttas. At present Brahmans will not take water from the hands even of the Halié sub-caste, but it seems likely, as time goes on, that this sub-caste will rise in social estimation, and will altogether sink the Kaibartta, so that eventually it is possible that they may succeed in securing a place with the Nava-sákhā, an elastic group, which has already been expanded beyond its original limits.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kaibarttas in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>56,709</td>
<td>51,352</td>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>13,049</td>
<td>24,010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>12,646</td>
<td>53,352</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>921,341</td>
<td>13,900</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>11,081</td>
<td>9,129</td>
<td>Maimansinh</td>
<td>77,709</td>
<td>49,217</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mithnapur</td>
<td>69,146</td>
<td>78,543</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>5,053</td>
<td>4,458</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>485,589</td>
<td>15,653</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>20,903</td>
<td>16,181</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>138,466</td>
<td>179,708</td>
<td>Chittagong Hill Tract</td>
<td>53,586</td>
<td>60,396</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>114,587</td>
<td>159,092</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>454</td>
<td>372</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>44,001</td>
<td>32,505</td>
<td>Baran</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>5,526</td>
<td>5,897</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>471</td>
<td>471</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murlahabad</td>
<td>102,317</td>
<td>100,355</td>
<td>Monglyr</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>35,501</td>
<td>37,758</td>
<td>Bhagipsuru</td>
<td>511</td>
<td>507</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hajnagar</td>
<td>80,440</td>
<td>63,134</td>
<td>Purnish</td>
<td>58,341</td>
<td>44,221</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Narpanpur</td>
<td>30,996</td>
<td>30,613</td>
<td>Maidah</td>
<td>27,569</td>
<td>23,556</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>15,583</td>
<td>15,566</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>2,994</td>
<td>10,745</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palsma</td>
<td>30,588</td>
<td>23,304</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>5,132</td>
<td>5,132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>54</td>
<td>219</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>381</td>
<td>381</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalipur</td>
<td>2,970</td>
<td>3,859</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>319</td>
<td>319</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>45,278</td>
<td>2,678</td>
<td>Singdhonum</td>
<td>800</td>
<td>800</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>32,317</td>
<td>40,425</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>5,140</td>
<td>5,140</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kaibartta-Dás, a synonym for Kaibartta.

Káibtár, a section of the Dharkár sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Kaikyal, a thar or section of Nepál Brahmans.

Kaília, a section of Bháts.

Káiwár, a sept of the Chandra-bansí division of Rajputs in Behar; a section of Májraut Goálás.

Káián, Káinya, Kaiyá, a synonym for Sonár. In Darjiling and the Nepal Terai the word Káinya denotes a native of the plains who carries on business as a trader and money-lender, and is more especially used as a title of Marwaris, and generally of traders and money-lenders from Upper India.

Kainrála, a thār of the Maut-kaha gotra of Nepālī Brahmans.

Kaiobanuár, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Kairála, a section of Kámis;
a thār or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Kairawár, illegitimate issue, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Kaisab, corruption of Kánya, a section of the Ayodhiá sub-caste of Hajjáms and of the Bhojpuriá sub-caste of Nuniás
in Behar.

Kaisale, a sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Kaisár, a section of Ghásis in Chota Nagpur.

Káit, a synonym for Káysth.

Kaita, Kaith, curry vegetable,
a totemistic sept of Chika, Oraons, and Ahirs or Goáls in Chota Nagpur.

Kaithar, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Kaitháwar, Kaithá, a sept of Asuras in Chota Nagpur.

Káiwár, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goáls in Behar.

Kájí, a sept of Thárus in Behar.

Kajol, a sub-caste of Goáls in Bengal.

Kákan, a sept of the Surajbansi division of Rajputs in Behar.

Kákás, a section of Goáls in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kákin, aunt, a totemistic sept
of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kakir, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kakkar, a section of the Bára-játi sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Ká ká Rakmal, a section of Kalwárs in Behar.

Kakra, hyena, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Kakrollá, a section of Goáls in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kaksa, a section of Majraut Goáls in Behar.

Kákulú, a sept of Tipperahs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kákusthi, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Báhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Kál, a section of Bágdís in Bengal.

Kalá, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kaláen, a section of Awadhiá Hajjáms in Behar.

Kalágáchi, a section of Pátmis in Bengal.

Káláí, a gáin of the Bátsya gotra of the Uttar-Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kalaiğar, a tinman, a profession followed mostly by Mahomedans. Ooc.

Kalait, a section of Lohárs in Behar.

Kalá Kháti, a thār or sept of Dámis in Darjiling, the members of which are drummers by profession.

Kalál, Kalwár, (i) in Bengal
Mahomedan distillers and liquor-sellers, who are regarded as outcastes by reason of their profession, so that other Mahomedans will not eat, drink, or intermarry with them. Synonyms: kārīgar, mīstrī, used by themselves; shahr-ābādrā, looked upon as derogatory: (ii) in Behar the term kalāl denotes a Mahomedan and kalādr a Hindu liquor-seller. A distiller is called bhatthidār or ākkār, and in Sāran rānki.

Kalāliā, a section of Goālās in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kalalohār, a thār or sept of Māngars in Darjiling.

Kalālsunri, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Kālānuā, a section of the Bīyāhut and Kharidāhā Kalwārs in Behar.

Kālā Rāy, a hypergamous group of Kaibarttas in Bakarganj.

Kālāsan, a mul or section of the Naomuliā or Goriā sub-caste of Goālās in Behar.

Kalasdih, a mul or section of the Chhamuliā Madhesiā sub-caste of Halwāis in Behar.

Kālāwat, a sub-caste of Brahmons in Behar.

Kalemniā, a section of Bābhans in Behar.

Kalganiā, a section of Goālās in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kālhans, a sept of Rajputas in Behar.

Kalhia, a section of Ghāsis in Chota Nagpur.

Kali, a sept of Tipperahs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kaliā, a title of Chāsī Kaibarttas and Sadgops in Bengal.

Kāligrāmī, a gāin of the Bātsya gotra of Bārendra Brahmons in Bengal.

Kālīhāi, a gāin of the Bātsya gotra of Bārendra Brahmons in Bengal.

Kālimba, tobacco flower, a totemistic sept of Juānge in Orissa.

Kālindī, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal who are cultivators and basket-makers. Their chief occupation is basket-making, but they are employed to kill dogs, remove dead bodies, and sometimes as executioners. The name is said to refer to their being worshippers of the goddess Kāli.

A gāin of the Bātsya gotra of Bārendra Brahmons in Bengal; a title of Jāliyas.

Kalinwāl, a section of Goālās in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kalipa, a religious group of Jugis.

Kalīt, a mul or section of the Kamarkalla sub-caste of Sonars in Behar.

Kāllani, a section of Maheśris.

Kālmi, a section of Telis in Bengal.

Kālmūt, a section of Brahmons in Behar.

Kalot, a section of Goālās in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kālsare, a man who works at a kalsar, the place where the juice of sugarcane is expressed.

Kalu, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal and Orissa; also a synonym for Telī, and a title of Mahomedan oil-pressers and sellers in Northern Bengal.

Kāluī, a gāin or sub-section of Saptasatī Brahmons in Bengal.

Kālundiā, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Kalupitā, a term used in Western Bengal to denote a hardworking man of the aboriginal castes, such as Bauris, Bágdis, and the like.

Kalvísha, a section of Brahmans and Káyashtas in Bengal.

Kalwár, a liquor-selling, distilling, and trading caste of Behar, probably a degraded offshoot of one of the numerous branches of the Baniyas. Mr. Nesfield regards the name as “a variant of Khairwár or catechu-maker, a process which is very similar to that of drawing juice from the palm-tree and fermenting it into a spirit;” and adds that this etymology “implies that the caste has sprung out of such tribes as Chán, Khairwár, Musahar, etc., all of whom are skilled in making the intoxicating juice called catechu.” It seems, however, more likely that Kalwár is a corruption of Káledá, a man who works a kal or machine; while there is no evidence whatever to connect the Kalwár with the jungle races who collect catechu, an astringent extract from the wood of several species of acacia, which, so far as I am aware, has no intoxicating properties.

The caste is divided into six sub-castes—Banodhíá, Biyáhut or Bhojpuri, Deswár, Jaiswar or Ajodhíábási, Khálá, and Kharidáhá. Mahomedan liquor-sellers are called Ránki or Kalál. Of these the Banodhíá say they came from the north-west of the Roy Bareilly district about a hundred years ago. The Biyáhut pretend that in former years they did not permit widows to marry again, though they admitted to do so now. Another story is that they are descended from the biyáhi wife of the common ancestor of the caste, while the other sub-castes were the offspring of a sagái wife. They will not drink or sell alcoholic liquor, and will not milk cows with their own hands or allow bullocks to be castrated. The Kharidáhá, who are said to derive their name from a village in Gházípur, observe the two latter restrictions, but do not object to selling drink. The Jaiswar sub-caste are alleged to be the illegitimate descendants of a Kalwár by a mistress called Jaisiá. They themselves derive their name from a village called Jaispur, the precise locality of which they are unable to state. Most of the sub-castes appear to have sections of the territorial type, and to observe the standard formula stating prohibited degrees. The Biyáhut and Kharidáhá forbid a man to marry a woman of his own section, or of the sections to which his mother, his paternal and maternal great-grandmother belonged. One of the sections of the Jaiswar group is denoted by the curious formula Báwan gáli, tirpan bázár, chhalis lahr, batís parkár; for a further notice of which see article Báwan. Jaiswárs follow the same rule regarding excluded sections as the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá sub-castes, except that they substitute the maternal grandmother for the paternal great-grandmother.

Members of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá sub-castes marry their daughters between the ages of five and twelve years; Jaiswárs from five to ten; while Banodhíás regard from seven to fourteen as the marriageable age for a girl. Boys are married between eight and fourteen, but all sub-castes agree in holding it proper for the bridegroom to be a few years older than the bride. The marriage ceremony is of the standard type, sindurdán being the binding portion. Banodhiá Kalwárs omit the preliminary forms known as gharde/chi, bardekhí, and panbái. The tilak paid to the parents of the bridegroom never exceeds a maximum amount of Rs. 21. Polygamy is permitted up to a limit of three or, as some say, four wives. It is not very clear, however, whether the permission to take more than one wife is not in any case conditional on the first being barren, and the practice of the caste on this point seems to vary in different districts. Widows are allowed to marry again by all sub-castes, and no restrictions are placed on their freedom of choice. Biyáhut Kalwárs, as has been stated above, say that they derived their name Biyáhut, 'the married,' from their prohibiting widow-marriage. But there is no independent evidence in support of their statement, and it is primá facie unlikely that they should have retracted their steps after having travelled so far in the path of orthodoxy. Divorce is not generally recognised, a woman taken in adultery being simply turned out of the caste. In Champaran, however, the rule seems to be more lax, and divorced wives are allowed to marry again by the sagái form.

Vaishnavism is the favourite religion of the caste, but in addition to the regular Hindu gods the Biyáhut and Kharidáhí offer rice and milk to Sokhá on Mondays during the light half of Sawan; goats and sweetmeats to Káli and Bandi on Wednesdays and Thursdays; and sucking pigs and wine to Goraiyá on Tuesdays. On Saturdays within the same period the Jaiswar sub-caste present cakes and sweetmeats to the Páñch Pir, while the Banodhíás make similar offerings to Barham Deo on the eleventh or thirteenth day of the dark half of Bhádra and the light half of Mág. All these offerings are eaten by the members of the household except the sucking pigs, which are buried. In some families the articles of food presented to the Páñch Pir are made over to the Mahomedans of the village.

Kalwárs employ Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, but they are deemed to be of inferior rank. Only the Kanaújí Brahmans, who serve the Banodhíás sub-caste, are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. The dead are burned, and the ceremony of sráddh performed in accordance with orthodox usage on the thirteenth day after death. Banodhíás Kalwárs bury the bodies of children under seven years.

The social rank of Kalwárs is low. Brahmans and members of the higher castes will on no account take water from their hands, and they are ordinarily classed with Telís, Tatwás, and Cháins. On this point Mr. Nesfield remarks:—"The Kalwár ranks a little higher than the Teli, because there is more skill and less dirt in the practice of his art. His trade as a private occupation has been destroyed by the British Government, which has taken the distilling and sale of liquors entirely into its own hands. The Kalwär still finds some opportunity, however, of following his old pursuit by working in the Government distilleries and taking out licenses for the sale of spirits. But the majority have taken to other kinds of trade or to agriculture, the common goal to which all the decayed industries of India are tending. The art of the Kalwär, like that of the Teli, has been known to almost all the backward races of the world, and cannot by any means be counted among the higher types of industry. Hence the status of the Kalwär has always been low." Distilling and selling liquor is believed to have been the original occupation of the entire caste; but most of its members, with the exception of the Banodhié, Deswár, and Khálśa sub-castes, make their living by shop-keeping, money-lending, and various forms of trade. A few are engaged in the manufacture of sugar, and some have taken to agriculture in the capacity of tenure-holders and occupancy raiyats. The trading and money-lending Kalwárs have a reputation for squalid penury in the ordering of their household affairs, and for grasping extortion in their dealings with their poorer neighbours. Many of the Bhakats who infest Chota Nagpur and the Santál Parganas belong to this caste. They certainly have a remarkable talent for amassing money, while their standard of living is frequently no higher than that of an ordinary day-labourer. Their meanness in dress is almost proverbial, and I have heard them charged as a class with grudging the dhobi the trifle he gets for washing their clothes.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the caste in 1881, the figures for 1872 having been included with the table on Sunris:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>8,747</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>2,359</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>20,128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>Mozaffern</td>
<td>29,039</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>11,949</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>108</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>23,979</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshedabad</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>30,357</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>28,576</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahiye</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>Bhagulpur</td>
<td>9,822</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ringpur</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>Purniah</td>
<td>229</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>4,577</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>Santál Parganas</td>
<td>4,577</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>104</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>1,116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>Lohardagá</td>
<td>5,660</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansinh</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>Manbhun</td>
<td>1,617</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,406</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Kalwat Malláh, a synonym for Surabiyá.

Karmal, lotus, a sept of Lohárs, Mundas, and Ahírs or Goálás in Chota Nagpur.

Kamalsar, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Kamáni, a synonym for Pási, q.v.

Kámár, Kamár, the metal-working caste of Bengal and Behar distinguished from the Lohar by not confining themselves to the fabrication of iron implements, and by having no scruples about working with any kind of metal. The Kámárs or Karmakárs of Bengal are popularly believed to be descended from an intrigue between a woman of the Sudra caste and the celestial artificer Viswa-karma. In the Midnapur district they have a legend curiously like the myth of the destruction of the Asuras quoted in the article on the Mundá tribe. Once upon a time, they say, there was a demon called Lohásura (Lóhá + asura), who obtained by his austerities the gift of immortality, and warred successfully with the gods. Weary of constant defeat, Indra at last appealed to Siva for help. As the demon was proof against all the weapons of the gods, a man was created to be their champion and armed by Siva with a set of blacksmith's tools. His hammer was formed from Siva's drum (dámará), a skull was converted into an anvil, pincers were made out of the snake girdle worn by the god, while the sacred bull parted with a piece of his skin to furnish the bellows. Thus equipped the first Kámár went forth to meet Lohásur, who laughed and declined to fight any one so small. On this the Kámár asked the Asura to give a proof that he was really immortal by getting into his furnace and letting him blow the bellows. With stupidity worthy of a giant in a fairy tale, the Asura complied; but the Kámár worked the bellows so hard that before the demon could turn he had become red hot and had run out of the furnace as molten iron. From this were forged eight different kinds of iron, corresponding, it is said, to the eight classes of Kámár known in Midnapur, viz. (1) Lohár-Kámárs, who make iron utensils; (2) Pitule-Kámárs, who make brass utensils; (3) Kánsáris, who work in bell-metal; (4) Sarna-Kámárs, or working goldsmiths; (5) Ghátira, Kámárs, who make imitation fruits, iron figures of owls and other birds used in the worship of Lakshmi, and kajlauts or iron snuffer-shaped vessels for collecting lampblack; (6) Chánd-Kámárs, whose specialty is the manufacture of brass mirrors; (7) Dhokrárs, and (8) Támárs, two lower classes of Kámárs found in the Jungle Maháls in the west of the district, who eat fowls, are reckoned unclean, and are served by a degraded class of Brahman. Of these groups the first two intermarry, while all the rest are endogamous. It is impossible at the present day to determine whether all of them are really derived from the Kámár caste; and it seems probable that some of them may be separate castes, which have been classed as Kámárs on account of some real or supposed resemblance in their occupations. It is, however, undoubtedly the case that in other districts besides Midnapur the internal divisions of the Kámár caste are unusually intricate and multifarious. Thus in the 24-Parganas three sub-castes are recognised—Uttar-Rárhi, Dakhin-Rárhi, and Anarpuri, the members of which do not intermarry; while the first two are further subdivided into the hypergamous groups Kulin and Maulik. In Eastern Bengal we find Bhusnápatí, Dhákái, and Paschimá, the first being again broken up into Naldípáti, Chaudí-Samáj, Páncch-Samáj, between which intermarriage is permitted. The Kámárs of Mursabadad again reckon four groups—Rárhi, Bárendra, Dhákáwál, and Khottá. The last two are composed respectively of emigrants from Dacca and Hindustan, who have settled in Central Bengal. The Rárhi and Bárendra sub-castes are found also in Pabna under the names Das-Samáj and Panch-Samáj, while in Noakhali the caste is divided into Játí-Karmakáır and Sikhó-Karmakáır, who do not intermarry. Beláśí, Máhmudpuriá, and Kámlá-Kámár are met with in Bardwan. In Manbhum there are four sub-castes—Magahíyá, Dhókrá, Lóhsá, and Basuná, and the same number in the Santál Parganas—Ashtaíai, Churélai, Bélélai, and Sankhalái. In Singbhum and throughout Behar no sub-castes seem to exist.

An equal degree of diversity prevails among the exogamous divisions of the caste. The Kámárs of Bengal have adopted the standard Brahmanical gotras; in Singbhum and the Santál Parganas totemistic sections are in vogue; while in Behar the corresponding groups are of the local or territorial type. In Bengal the gotra is looked upon as a sort of ornamental appendage testifying the respectability of the caste, but persons of the same gotra are allowed to marry provided that they are not of kin within the fifth degree on the mother's and the seventh on the father's side. In Behar and Chota Nagpur the usual rule that a man may not marry a woman belonging to his own section is still observed. These facts, taken in connexion with the prevalence of several different types of section-names seem to point to the conclusion that many distinct castes of metal-workers have sprung up in different parts of the country to meet local wants; that each caste has been formed out of recruits from the surrounding population; and that the name Kámár, so far from indicating a common origin, is merely the functional designation of an extremely heterogeneous group. In other words, the profession of metal-worker in its various branches has been adopted from time to time by Aryans, non-Aryans, and people of mixed race; but the fact of their following the same occupation, though it has led to their being called by a common name, has not welded them into a uniform group, and the component elements of the caste still remain entirely distinct. The caste, in fact, is a caste only in the loose popular sense of the word, and its multifarious internal divisions afford an excellent illustration of the general rule that while diversity of occupation undoubtedly leads to differentiation, community of occupation does not necessarily or generally bring about integration.

The Kamars of Bengal marry their daughters as infants, between the ages of five and ten years. The usual maximum limit of age in Behar is twelve for a girl and fifteen for a boy; but it is essential that the bridegroom should be taller than the bride, and this point is ascertained by actual measurement. In Bengal, however, the marriage of a son is sometimes delayed till he is twenty-five or so by reason of the necessity of paying a pas or bride-price in order to obtain a wife. Among the Kamars of Chota Nagpur adult-marriage still holds its ground even for girls, though it is considered more proper for them to be married before attaining puberty. The Kamars of Midnapur, though regarding infant-marriage as essential, do not permit consummation to take place immediately after the ceremony, but keep their girls at home until they have reached puberty and may fairly be deemed apta viro. Another custom prevalent in that district is káparparáná, or presenting a piece of cloth and certain spices to the bride elect before the marriage. The acceptance of this cloth is held finally to bind the bride's family to keep faith with the bridegroom, so that if the girl were afterwards given to another man her father would run the risk of being turned out of the caste. In Bengal the marriage ceremony is of the standard type, while in Behar it closely resembles that described in the article on the Kewat caste. One curious practice, known as gháskáti, or cutting grass, is peculiar to Kamars. On the day after the marriage the wedded pair, followed by a number of women singing, are taken outside the house, and the bridegroom is given a sickle, with which he cuts a handful of grass. After this a maid-servant or one of the female members of the bride's household plants a stick in the ground at some distance off, and the bridegroom and his brother-in-law race for the stick, which the winner pulls up. In this contest it is an understood thing that the bridegroom must be allowed to win, and if the bride's brother seems to be getting the best of it he is headed back by the bridegroom's friends, so as to let the latter come in first. Polygamy is permitted in Bengal and Chota Nagpur, but is strongly disapproved of in Behar, where the rule is that a man may only take a second wife in the event of the first being barren or suffering from an incurable disease. Widow-marriage is forbidden in Bengal and Behar, but is still practised in Chota Nagpur by the Magahiyá Kamars, who probably left Behar before the Kamars of that province had taken to orthodox ways. Divorce is recognised only in Singbhum and the Santal Parganas, where a sal leaf is torn in two before the pancháyat as a symbol of separation, and divorced wives are allowed to marry again. In other districts a faithless wife is turned out of the caste, and either becomes a regular prostitute or joins some religious sect of dubious morality. Such measures, however, are only resorted to in extreme cases, and intrigues within the caste are usually condoned by the husband.

The majority of the Kámárs in Bengal are Vaishnavas, but a few follow the Sákta ritual. Their favourite deity is Viswakarmá, who is worshipped on the last day of Bhádra with offerings of sweetmeats, parched rice, fruits, molasses, flowers, sandal-wood paste, Ganges water, cloth, silver ornaments, etc. At the same time they worship the hammer, anvil, and other tools used in their handicraft. In Behar they revere as minor gods Hanumán, Bandi, Goraiyá, Kálí, Jawálá Mukhi, Jalpá, Bhairab, and two Mahomedan saints—Miran or Shaikh Sadu and Saiyad. Cock, kāśir, and puri are offered to the latter, and afterwards given away to poor Mahomedans. In Bengal the women perform the Ananta, Savitri, Sasthi, and Panchami bratas, and Istérini, and Mangal Chandi are worshipped by the women and children with offerings of sweetmeats, milk, fruit, etc. For the service of the greater gods and in the performance of bratas the caste employ Brahmans, who are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. The dead are burned, and a regular śrāddha performed on the thirty-first day after death.

Among the Kámárs of Dacca, says Dr. Wise, there exists a tradition that they were brought from Upper India by the Muhammadan Government. In the ‘Aín-i-Akbari it is stated that there was an iron mine in Sarkár Busáha, which included Dacca, and in later times jágirs called dhangel were granted to the skilled workmen employed in smelting iron from the red laterite soil of the Dacca district. At the present day, however, the Kámárs are unacquainted with the art of smelting iron, and they procure pig-iron from Calcutta when a local supply is not to be had. Iron-smelting, indeed, seems to be practised only by the aboriginal Lohárs and Asuras of Chota Nagpur and Western Bengal. Kámárs work in all metals, including gold and silver, and being themselves members of the Nava-Sákha group affect to despise the professional goldsmith or Sonarbanik, who is considered unclean. Most Sekrás or working goldsmiths are Kámárs, and more than half of the caste are employed as blacksmiths. The regular village blacksmith, whether Kámár or Lohár, is usually paid in kind, receiving four ārhis (about a maund) of paddy per plough. Some Kámárs, again, are employed to slaughter the animals offered in sacrifice to Sakti. In Dacca, where the Kánsári or brazier caste is no longer met with, the manufacture of the brass utensils solely used in Hindu households devolves on the Kámárs, their only competitors being the Ghulám Káyashts, many of whom engage in this trade. They make an alloy (bírma) with three parts of copper and four of zinc, and with it manufacture cups, lotás, and other vessels. The Panni-wála, or tin-foil maker, is always a Kámár. The tin is obtained in bars from Calcutta, and being run into moulds, is, while still soft, beaten out until thin enough to be cut into strips, which are then stained with lac and turmeric so as to counterfeit the colour of gold. The foil so produced is then sold to the Muhammadan Chúrít-wála to ornament his glass bracelets, and to the Málákár to embellish chaplets, tiaras, images of gods and goddesses, and the platforms paraded on gala days. A small number of Kámárs have taken to agriculture and trade, and among these a few hold the position of zemindars or tenure-holders, while the majority are occupancy raiyats. The caste has always been an illiterate one, and very few of its members have made their way into Government service, or the learned professions. It is, in fact, a common allegation that they only learn enough reading and writing to enable them to keep accounts.

The social standing of Kámárs is respectable. In Bengal they rank among the Navasákha, and in Behar they belong to the group of castes from whose hands a Brahman can take water. Except in Singbhum and the Santál Parganas, where fowls are deemed lawful food, they observe the same rules regarding diet as the higher castes, but do not consider themselves bound to abstain from spirituous liquors. Like the Ekádas Teliás, Kámárs pride themselves upon not allowing their women to wear nose-rings. This prohibition is said to have been introduced by a Parámánik or headman of the caste because a Kámár woman dropped her nose-ring on his plate while serving him at a feast. In Midnapur the Parámániks hold a very high position, and marriages with their families are eagerly sought after. All questions bearing on the usages of the caste are laid before them for decision, and disregard of their orders may in the last resort be punished by excommunication. Ordinarily, however, a fine is inflicted, of which the Parámánik himself gets the largest share, while the rest is spent in giving a feast to the Kámárs who live within his jurisdiction.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kámárs in 1872 and 1881. The figures of the former year include those of Lohárás.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>33,551</td>
<td>30,599</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>2,749</td>
<td>2,916</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>22,750</td>
<td>35,329</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>1,340</td>
<td>2,118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>10,365</td>
<td>7,209</td>
<td>Hill Tracts</td>
<td>65</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>35,248</td>
<td>36,474</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>77</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughil</td>
<td>11,846</td>
<td>11,518</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>4,590</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>8,378</td>
<td>4,373</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>2,936</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>11,439</td>
<td>12,909</td>
<td>Munsupur</td>
<td>613</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>16,905</td>
<td>15,515</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>4,601</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>7,513</td>
<td></td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>15</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>14,594</td>
<td>15,728</td>
<td>Champanar</td>
<td>2,790</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munsedeabad</td>
<td>7,650</td>
<td>8,062</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>2,940</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jhinipur</td>
<td>3,609</td>
<td>5,034</td>
<td>Bisapur</td>
<td>5,485</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajashtaha</td>
<td>4,608</td>
<td>5,109</td>
<td>Farnish</td>
<td>5,574</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajpur</td>
<td>4,237</td>
<td>5,714</td>
<td>Santál Parganas</td>
<td>22,305</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>1,471</td>
<td>1,788</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>4,397</td>
<td>5,855</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>6,740</td>
<td>6,109</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>11,971</td>
<td>16,037</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>460</td>
<td>319</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>5,765</td>
<td>6,544</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaigiri</td>
<td>311</td>
<td>1,019</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>12,709</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td></td>
<td>619</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>17,162</td>
<td>6,466</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>12,975</td>
<td>16,747</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>10,905</td>
<td>2,265</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>4,728</td>
<td>2,248</td>
<td>Lohardanga</td>
<td>21,296</td>
<td>624</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>11,418</td>
<td>9,471</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>7,359</td>
<td>7,438</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainaminih</td>
<td>9,019</td>
<td>14,369</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>22,615</td>
<td>25,533</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>5,403</td>
<td>7,462</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>6,243</td>
<td>3,765</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The figures are shown on the next page.
Kamarhet, a mui or section of the Kamarkalla sub-caste of Sonars in Behar.

Kamarkalla, a sub-caste of Barhia, Lohars, and of Sonárs in Behar who do not permit the marriage of widows.

Kámát, a title of Kewats in Behar.

Kámati, Kamtá, Kamti, a title of cultivating Dhánuks in Behar.

Kámi, Kámiá, the blacksmith caste of Nepal, some of whom also work in the precious metals. They claim descent from the mythical artificer Viswámitra, and profess to have entered Nepal from the plains of India. This indeed is probable enough, for their section-names, a list of which is given in the Appendix, are not of the type common among the Indo-Tibetan races, and seem to be of Indian origin. Their physical characteristics also appear to suggest the conclusion that they are immigrants from India, who have intermarried freely with some of the indigenous races of Nepal.

A man may not marry a woman of his own thar or section, nor of the section to which his mother belonged before her marriage. Girls marry after they are grown up, and courtship is more or less recognised. Sexual intercourse before marriage is said not to be tolerated; but in fact the morals of the Kámi girls are not stricter than those of the young women of other castes in the hills. The marriage ceremony appears to have been borrowed from the Hindu system. It takes place at night. The bride and bridegroom stand facing each other on either side of an earthen vessel containing what is supposed to be a sacred fire. Round this they walk seven times, keeping the fire always on the right hand. The bride then takes her stand by the bridegroom and places her hands on his, while her parents, who conduct the ceremony, lay on the joined hands of the couple some kusá grass, some leaves of the bel and tulei, and a piece of copper, muttering at the same time some gibberish which purports to be Sanskrit sacred texts. The rite is completed by the bridegroom smearing some red lead on the bride’s forehead and the parting of her hair and putting a necklace (poti) of white beads round her neck.

Polygamy is permitted, and in theory at least a man may have as many wives as he can afford to maintain. Poverty, however, and the great liberty which is accorded to women in the hills, tend in practice to limit the number to two. Polyandry is unknown. A widow may marry again, and is restricted by no rules in her choice of a second husband, except that she may not marry her late husband’s elder brother or elder cousin, and must observe the prohibited degrees which were binding on her before she married. The ceremony is of a simpler character than at the marriage of a virgin. No fire is kindled, nor are texts recited: the bridegroom merely puts vermillion on the bride’s forehead and gives her a necklace, the proceedings being completed by a feast, at which the relations of both parties are present.
KAMI.

The utmost license of divorce prevails. A husband can get rid of his wife whenever he pleases by going through the symbolic form of cutting in two a kind of fruit (pang-ro) with a bit of wood called sinko. In reference to this ceremony, which prevails among several other castes, divorce is commonly spoken of in the hills as sinko-pangro. Wives are supposed to have somewhat less extensive powers of divorce, and the theory is that they can only divorce their husbands on the ground of positive ill-treatment. In fact, however, a woman who is tired of her husband goes off with any man who will take her, and by the custom of the caste the husband has only the right to demand from his rival the bride-price originally paid for the woman. Divorced wives marry again by the same ceremony that is used at the marriage of a widow.

Kâmis admit into their caste members of any caste higher in rank than their own. No ceremony is performed on such occasions, and the consent of the panchâyat of the caste is all that is required to confer the privilege of membership. Instances of such changes of caste taking place do not, however, very frequently occur. The usual cause is that a man of a higher caste has taken a Kâmi girl as a mistress, and has got into trouble with his own people for eating with a woman of lower rank.

The caste know nothing of Hindu law, and profess to be guided in matters of inheritance and succession by a tribal custom of their own. This, however, presents no features of special interest. Sons take equal shares in the property. Failing sons, brothers and brothers’ sons inherit. If no male relatives survive, daughters and daughters’ sons succeed.

Kâmis pose as orthodox Hindus, worshipping Káli and regarding Viswakarmá as their tutelary deity. The bonds of Hinduism, however, lie very lightly upon them, and their real worship is directed to certain animistic powers, known as Kuláin, Anarchá, Khodáí, and Dáramastá, among whom the sections of the caste are parcelled out in a curious and uneven fashion. Of these ill-defined shapes, Kuláin is the most popular. To him all the thirty-eight sections sacrifice goats, sheep, and fowls twice in the year, besides burning incense at every full moon. The Gadáíli, Sásankhar, and Darnál sections slay pigs in honour of Khodáí; while Anarchá and Dáramastá are worshipped by the Gajmér and Kharká-Báyu sections, respectively, with the offering of a white cock. The offerings in each case are eaten by the worshippers. Kâmis have no Brahmans, and any member of the caste who chances to have a turn for religion officiates as priest.
The dead are burned, thrown into a river, or buried, as may be found convenient at the time. The two former methods are considered the most respectable. Persons who affect special orthodoxy take the ashes of their dead to the Ganges, but such cases are comparatively rare. The funeral ceremony is a curious one. After the corpse has been disposed of, the mourners have their heads and faces entirely shaved, including the eyebrows. They put off their ordinary clothes and dress themselves in a waistcloth and a blanket, a bit of white linen being tied over the forehead. In this dress they stay at home for ten days, during which time they take only one meal a day, abstain from meat, salt, and oil, do not receive or pay visits, and, as far as may be, avoid conversing with their fellows. On the eleventh day a feast is prepared for the relatives of the deceased; but before they can partake of it a small portion of every dish must be put on a leaf-plate and taken out into the jungle for the spirit of the dead man, and carefully watched until a fly or other insect settles on it. The watcher then covers up the plate with a slab of stone, eats his own food, which he brings with him to the place, and returns to tell the relatives that the dead man’s spirit has received the offering set for him. The feast can then begin. The watcher is a member of the caste, who is paid for his services as if he were a Brahman. No ceremonies are performed for the benefit of ancestors in general, childless ancestors, or men who have died a violent death.

Notwithstanding that they abstain from eating beef and have adopted several Hindu usages, the social standing of Kámis among the hill castes is decidedly low, and Tibetans, Murmis, Mangars, and members of the Kiranti group will not eat, drink, or smoke with them. Their position is clearly marked by the fact that they eat with the Sarki caste. They regard pork and fowls as lawful food, and indulge freely in strong drink.

In 1881 the Kámis numbered 3,723 in Darjiling, 107 in Champaran, 9 in Bhagalpur, and 580 in the Tributary States of Chota Nagpur, while none were separately returned for 1872.

Kámiá, a synonym for Kámi.
Karní, a sub-caste of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.
Kamila, a title of Sonárs in Singbum.
Kámiya, an endogamous division of Nepáli Brahmans.
Kámkáli, a gáin of the Bátaya gotra of Bérendra Brahmans in Bengal.
Karnkar, a title of Kabárs in Chota Nagpur.
Karnláit, a section of the Kamár sub-caste of Dosádhs in Behar.
Kámlá-Kámár, a sub-caste of Kámar in Bardwan.
Kampti, a section of the Kádar caste in Behar which intermarries with the Bérik, Kápári, Marik, Darbe, Mánjhi, and Bár sections, but not with the rest.
Kámrám, a mui or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.
Kamrupi, a sub-caste of Brahmins from Assam who serve as cooks or priests in Northern Bengal.

Kámsarke Máhto, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Kamtariá, a section of Kamaujia Lohárs in Behar.

Kárntá, a section of the Kul-sunri sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Kán, a very low caste of musicians akin to the Doms; Musalman workers in steel, who repair umbrellas, make fish-hooks, etc.

Kanaujia, a designation of numerous and widely-distributed sub-castes and sections of castes of very different social standing. In the case of the higher castes the name doubtless implies a notion of their having come originally from Kanauj or Kanya-Kubja, the famous old capital of Ajodhyá or Oudh, on the Kalindi, a tributary of the Ganges in the North-West Provinces. Its occurrence among the lower castes is accounted for by Mr. Beames in his edition of Sir Henry Elliot's Supplemental Glossary, by the remark that "whenever the lower castes begin to talk about their subdivisions, they always give them the grandest possible names, such as Chauhán, Kanaujíá, and so on." This is true so far as it goes, but it hardly goes far enough. One would like to know why the grand names are selected. The clue is probably to be found in the fact that many of the lower castes are attached in various sorts of servile capacities to the landholding families of the higher castes. In such cases it is in accordance with the passion for imitation which runs through the caste system that the servants should adopt the tribal designations of the masters, just as the Rajputs themselves have borrowed the gotras of the Brahmins. A sub-caste of Barhís in Behar who are said to have come from Gorakhpur. They make boxes, desks, etc., and do joiner's work of all kinds, but consider themselves debared by custom from making panels, doors, windows, and the larger class of woodwork used in houses; a sub-caste of Ahirs or Goáláš in Behar who bear the title Gop and belong to the Kasyap gotra. They make curds and serve the higher castes. A sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar, who are confectioners by occupation. A sub-caste of Hindu Joláhas (Tantwa or Tzinti) in Behar; a sub-caste of Brahman, Dhanuk, Dhobi, Dasádh, Hajjam (barber), Kándú, Kumhar, Koirí, Lohár, Sonár, Támbuli, Tántí, Teli, and Thathera castes in Behar.
Kanauli, a section of the Pachnainyā sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Kānbindhē, pierced ears, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Kānchaba, dog, a totemistic sept of Juangs in Orissa.

Kānchan, a section of Brahmans.

Kānchanbhār, a section of Bābhans in Behar.

Kānchanpur, a section of the Karan Kāyasths in Behar.

Kand, a synonym for Kandh.

Kanda, a kind of sweet potato, a totemistic sept of Mundas.

Kandh, Kondh, Khond, Kui-loka, Kui-enju, a Dravidian tribe, inhabiting that part of the territory of the Rājā of Bāod, one of the tributary states of Orissa, known as the Kandhmals, a hilly tract of country 40 miles in length, and in extreme breadth 24 miles, with an area of about 800 square miles. These Kandhs call themselves Maliah Kandhs as distinguished from the Benialz Kandhs, who inhabit Gumsur in Madras. The general character of the country is wild and mountainous; it consists of a confused succession of ranges covered with dense sāl forests. The Kandhs live in scattered villages surrounded with patches of cultivation. There are 677 villages with a population of 58,959 souls. It is calculated that two-thirds of the country is covered with jungle. The people are shy and timid, hating contact with the inhabitants of the plains. They love the wild mountain gorges, and prefer the stillness of jungle life, and fly to the most inaccessible parts on the least alarm. They live by hunting and rude agriculture. Like many other wild tribes, they are in the habit of clearing patches of land in the forest during the cold weather, and firing it in the hot weather. Seed is sown among the ashes after the commencement of the rains. After the second year the land is abandoned, and a fresh clearing made. The people produce barely sufficient food for half the year, and supply their wants for the remainder by bartering turmeric, of which they raise large quantities. The Kandhs regard themselves as proprietors of the land, and insist upon their rights with that curious pertinacity which distinguishes the cognate tribes of Santāl, Munda and Ho.

The Kandhs call themselves Kui-loka or Kui-enju. The origin of the name Kandh is obscure, nor has the critical study of the Kandh dialects gone far enough to throw any light on the subject. Some seek to identify it with the Uriya word Khanda, denoting a measure. of land reckoned by the quantity of seed sown, and support this view by reference to the Kandh tradition that once upon a time they were a race of quiet cultivators dwelling in the plains of Orissa. But why should the fact of men having 'acres' to till lead them to call themselves by so obviously inappropriate a name, and that too in a language with which ex hypothesi they could have no acquaintance? Another theory refers to the mention in the Ramayana of a tribe of Asuras, called Skandh-Asuras, ruling over the forest of Dandaka, the hilly tract extending from the Vindhyas hills to the river Krishna, and suggests that the Kandhs may be a remnant of these, the initial S having been dropped by phonetic corruption. A third and in some respects more plausible hypothesis derives the name from Kanda, the Uriya for a sword which is said to be the totem or distinguishing mark of the tribe. Where the data are so vague and uncertain, no opinion can be usefully put forward. I may, however, point out, arguing from analogous cases, that tribal names usually belong to one of two types. Either they consist simply of the word for 'man' in the tribal language, or they are epithets bestowed by Hindu neighbours usually casting some aspersion on the usages of the tribe in the matter of food. Horo or Ho is an instance of the former type; Musahar and, according to some authorities, Kol or Koh of the latter. These lines of inquiry, if followed up by persons adequately acquainted with the various dialects concerned, ought, one would think, to lead in course of time to a satisfactory solution of the question.

The Kandhs of the Orissa Kandhmals, with whom alone we are now concerned, are supposed to have entered the Kandhmals from the south about 250 years ago, driving out the feeble and unwarlike Kurums or Kurmis who appear to have been the original occupants of these tracts. They are divided into two classes—(1) Uriya Kandh, (2) Malua or Arria Kandh. The former are Kandhs who from social intercourse with the Uriyas have abandoned many Kandh usages and adopted Hindu customs in their place; while the Malua or hill Kandhs still adhere strictly to the original observances of the tribe. Within the limits of the Kandhmals these two groups have not yet become strictly endogamous, and owing perhaps to the sparseness of the population of these tracts, intermarriages still take place between them. But the Malua Kandhs already refuse to intermarry with the Uriya Kandhs of Bod Proper and Gumur, whom they regard as having lowered themselves by taking to Hindu practices; and it seems probable that in course of time an equally complete separation will be brought about between the Uriya and Malua Kandhs of the Kandhmals.

The fine physique of the Kandhs—a point on which all observers agree—may perhaps be due in some measure to their custom of admitting into the tribe members of other stocks, always excepting the weaver Páns or Domnas and the sweeper Háris. The price paid for the privilege of admission into the Kandh community varies in different parts of the Kandhmals, but is invariably reckoned in buffaloes and strong drink. A great feast is made and the new member is formally inducted into the tribe.
In close contact with the Kandhs and dwelling in the same villages with them, we find three castes bearing names which seem to indicate some sort of connexion with the tribe. These are the Kui-Kumhärenju or Kandh-Kumhára, the Kui-Lohärenju or Kandh-Lohára, and the Kui-Gonrenju or Kandh-Gonds. Although these castes have adopted the religion, customs and dress of the Kandhs, they are still not recognised as members of the Kandh community, and Kandhs will not intermarry or eat with them. It is possible therefore that there may be no tie of blood between them and the Kandhs, and that their imitation of Kandh observances is due merely to their having been long settled in the Kandh country and having forgotten their own rites. On the other hand, if we compare these names with the similar combinations found among the Mundas, Oraons, and other tribes of Chota Nagpur, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the castes in question must have arisen from inter-marriages between women of the Kandh tribe and Hindu artisans who had settled in Kandh villages.

Ethnologists have long been aware that the custom of exogamy is rigorously observed among the Kandhs. In his Essay on Primitive Marriage, first published in 1865, the late Mr. J. F. McLennan refers to Major Macpherson's Account of the Religion of the Khonds in Orissa for "the distinct statement that among the Khonds inter-marriage between persons of the same tribe, however large or scattered, is considered incestuous and punishable by death." Notwithstanding the stringency of the rule, and although owing to the prevalence among them of human sacrifices and infanticide, the Kandhs have been under the close observation of British officers ever since 1837, I have had the greatest difficulty in ascertaining the precise form of exogamy practised by them, and indeed in getting any information at all on the subject. In reply to repeated inquiries addressed to several different correspondents well acquainted with the tribe and engaged in official work among them, I have been assured that the Kandhs have no exogamous subdivisions at all, and that their matrimonial arrangements are regulated, so far as the avoidance of consanguineous marriages is concerned, by the comparatively modern system of calculating prohibited degrees from a common ancestor. The facts now recorded, which I regret to say are still incomplete, reached me only a few days before the completion of these volumes. They were ascertained for me in a special inquiry conducted at my request by Mr. James Taylor, Tahsildar of the Kandhmals, whose intelligence in carrying out my instructions I am glad to have this opportunity of acknowledging. That the facts should have been ascertained with difficulty, and that they should have escaped the notice of so many observers, is quite in keeping with my experience in other parts of Bengal. The rules which govern the custom of exogamy, and the caste or tribal divisions by means of which that custom is worked, concern the inner life of the people, and leave no trace on their relations with the outside world. They are a sort of shibboleth, understood only by members of the tribe itself. Even among them this knowledge is often confined to heads of families or villages, priests, genealogists, match-makers, and such-like persons whose business it is to look after the matrimonial arrangements of the tribe. For this reason they form not only the most archaic, but also the most durable portion of the body of custom which a given tribe or caste observes, and are the least liable to be modified or destroyed by the operation of fiction and of the inveterate tendency to imitate the institutions of groups supposed to be socially superior, which has done and is constantly doing so much to force all tribal observances into conformity with the standard Brahmanical pattern.

The Kandhs of the Orissa Kandhmals are divided into fifty gochis or exogamous septs, each of which bears the name of a muta or village, believes all its members to be descended from a common ancestor, and as a rule dwells as a body of blood relations in the commune muta or group of villages after which it is called. The Kandh gochi appears therefore to represent the nearest approach that has yet been discovered to the "local exogamous tribe," supposed by Mr. McLennan to be the primary unit of human society. A list of the gochis is given in Appendix I. Each gochi is further split up into sub-septs called klambus. Each dwelling in one of the villages making up the muta or commune. Of these I have not yet been able to obtain a complete list.

The sub-sept, like the sept, traces its origin to a single ancestor, but he is a personage of more recent date than the progenitor of the sept. The relations included in the former are comparatively near, while the connexion between members of the gochi is much more remote, and in the modern sense of the word they can hardly be called relations at all. The sub-sept seems in fact to be a sort of joint-family expanded to form a village community, the members of which are invited to marriages, festivals and similar domestic ceremonies to which it would be impossible to bring together the larger group. On occasions of special importance, when, for example, a casus belli is thought to have arisen between a sept and its neighbours, the whole gochi is summoned to meet in council and consider the question laid before it.

A Kandh may not marry a woman of his own gochi, even though she belong to a different klambu from himself. Both gochi and klambu go by the father's side, and I can find no traces of female kinship having ever been recognised by the Kandhs. The use of the division into klambus can best be illustrated by an actual example. Let us suppose that a man of the Besringia gochi and Besera klambu marries a woman of the Kutrengia gochi and Bisunga klambu. Their son would belong to the same gochi and klambu as his father, and would be precluded from marrying a woman of the klambu to which his mother belonged, but might marry into any of the other four klambus of the Kutrengia gochi. This prohibition holds good for three generations in the descending line, and many Kandhs prefer to extend it to the fourth. They take, in fact, as Mr. Taylor pertinently remarks, much the same view of it as many Europeans take of inter-marriage between first cousins. It will be seen from this that the rule forbidding marriage within the mother's klambu serves for the Kandhs much the same purpose as is ordinarily effected by the standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees. This formula is unknown to the Kandhs of the Kandhmals, and their arrangements for guarding against consanguineous marriages consist solely of the simple rules regarding the gochi and the klambu which have been explained above. A similar system exists among the Santals, but the septs and sub-septs are not localised as they are among the Kandhs, and the prohibition of marriage within the mother's sub-sept is not so stringently enforced.

Kandh girls are usually married when of full age in most cases to men of their own choice, and after a regular process of courtship considerable license is allowed to the young men and maidens of the tribe, and sexual intercourse before marriage is tacitly recognised. Infidelity after marriage is said to be rare; the adulterer if found out atones for his fault by paying an indemnity to the husband. Until this has been done, the woman is excluded from social intercourse with her neighbours. Widows and divorced wives may marry again. A bride-price is paid to the father. The widow's choice of a second husband is in theory unfettered; but it is considered the right thing for her to marry her late husband's younger brother. In the event of her marrying an outsider, she retains the charge of her children until the girls attain puberty and the boys are old enough to hold the plough. In any case she has no rights over her late husband's property, which goes to his children, or failing them to his brother.

When a Kandh youth is of an age to marry, his parents find out who he has fallen in love with, and send a go-between, usually a man of the Pân caste, to ascertain the views of the girl's parents, and to approach the delicate question of the price to be paid for the bride. If these preliminary negotiations are successful, a deputation of the boy's relations go soon afterwards to the girl's house, and a general drinking bout is held, at which the amount of the bride-price is definitely fixed. The price is reckoned in pots or lives, a term of somewhat vague connotation, which includes buffaloes, cows, goats, brass plates and cooking vessels, ornaments and things in general. Its amount varies with the wealth of the bride's father, to whom it is paid. It may extend to as many as forty pots, and the payment may be spread over two or three years. Soon after the relations have reported the result of their negotiations, the bridegroom pays a visit to his future father-in-law's house, bringing with him the first instalment of the bride-price. The formal betrothal is then effected by the bridegroom putting a necklace round the girl's neck, while she pours oil over his head.

On the day before the wedding the bridegroom and his male relations go in procession to the bride's house, where they spend that evening and the next morning in feasting. The essential and binding portion of the marriage ceremony, in which the bride's father officiates as priest, is said to consist of his taking the right hands of the couple and spitting on the palm of each. The effect of this in the case of the bride is to remove her from her original sept, and to preclude her from re-entering her father's house. The married couple are carried off on the backs of the bridegroom's friends to his house, where the marriage is consummated. On the next day a feast is made, and the girl sits on a couch surrounded by the women of the village and pretends to weep. After this has gone on for some time she and her husband are seized by his friends and carried about in triumph. A short dance follows, and both are replaced on the couch. Then the bride's male relations take hold of the bride and run away with her, hotly pursued by the girls of the village who pummel the men soundly, recapture the bride, and bring her back to her husband. After this the bride's relations return to their own village. On the day after the marriage the bride and bridegroom, taking with them an old man to officiate as priest, go a little way outside the village and worship Dharma Pennu with offerings of fowls, eggs, rice and strong drink in order to secure a happy life and male offspring. A high standard of conjugal fidelity is observed among the Kandhs, and husbands usually treat their wives kindly. Polygamy as a practice is unknown. If a woman proves barren, the husband may take a second wife; but in such cases the two wives have separate houses and enjoy equal privileges.

About a month before her confinement is expected, the woman and her husband pay a visit to her parent's house and get from them some toys for the child, consisting usually of a small bow and arrow, a winnowing fan, and a small basket. These are hung up in the house till they are wanted. A few days before the confinement both husband and wife leave their house and take up their abode in an outside room set apart for this purpose. There the husband cooks and eats with the wife, and in the case of a first confinement he or his father sacrifices a pig with offering of cooked and uncooked rice and libations of strong drink to the spirits of their ancestors, in order that nothing may go wrong. No one can enter the room while labour is going on on pain of becoming ceremonially unclean, and the husband has to give whatever assistance is necessary. After the placenta has passed, the cooking pots hitherto in use are broken and visitors are admitted; but they may not eat with the parents of the child until a further period of twelve days has elapsed, when a further breaking of pots takes place, and a feast is given to the neighbours. When the child is two or three years old, its head is shaved and a small ceremony is performed calling upon the dead ancestors to protect it from scald, itch, and similar diseases of the skin. From the age of ten or twelve the hair is allowed to grow again. No ceremonies are performed after birth or when a boy or girl attains puberty.

As regards succession to property, the general rule is that the sons get equal shares, but the portion of the eldest is sometimes larger than that of the others. The widow gets a share equal to that of a son. If a man dies without male issue, leaving a widow and a daughter, the widow takes his moveable property in full ownership, but has only a life-interest in his land, which goes to his nearest male relatives on her death. Daughters never share in the inheritance, but are entitled to maintenance out of the estate until they are married. Adoption is unknown. A step-son has no rights in the estate of his step-father.

Much has been written about the religion of the Kandhs, but the subject can hardly be regarded as having yet been fully cleared up. Major Macpherson's account of the matter ascribes to the Kandhs religious conceptions of a very advanced character, quite out of keeping with their primitive social organization, and one is inclined to suspect that the persons from whom he derived his information must have described to him rather their ideal view of what the religion of the tribe ought to be than what it actually was. For this reason instead of entering upon a lengthy discussion of the subject as treated by him, and endeavouring by analysis and comparison with the beliefs of cognate tribes to get at the actual facts underlying his account, I prefer to state very briefly what is known about the Kandhs of the Kandhmals, trusting to future research to work out the problem in fuller detail.

The Kandhs of the Kandhmals recognise three principal gods—Dharma Pennu, Saru Pennu, and Taru Pennu. The functions of Dharma Pennu appear to be of a somewhat more general character than those assigned to the other two. No regular times or seasons are fixed for his worship, and he is appealed to only in cases of illness or at the birth of a first child. His worship is performed by a Guru who may be of any caste, but is usually either a Kandh or a Pán. The Gurus usually have the power of throwing themselves or feigning to throw themselves into a state of hypnotic trance, and are supposed to be able to cure diseases by touching people, tying them up with bits of thread, and similar mumery. The whole Dharma Pennu may best be described as the god of the family and of the tribe itself. Saru Pennu is the god of the hills, a divinity apparently of much the same type as the Marang Buru of the Santals and Mundas. He is a jealous god, and does not like people to trespass on his domain, and the chief object of the worship which is performed in his honour in April and May is to induce him to protect from the attacks of wild animals people whose business takes them among the forest-clad hills of the Kandhmals, and also to secure a full yield of the jungle products which the Kandhs, like most similar tribes, use so largely for food. The priests of Saru Pennu are called dehuri, and the appropriate offerings are a goat and a fowl with rice and strong drink. The offerings are partaken of by the worshippers. Táru Pennu, the earth god, takes the place among these Kandhs of Tári Pennu, the earth goddess, familiar to students of the voluminous official literature which treats of the suppression of human sacrifice among the Kandhs. He is believed to be very vindictive, and to wreak his anger upon those who neglect his worship, afflicting them with various diseases, destroying their crops, and causing them to be devoured by tigers and leopards. In order to avoid these evils the Kandhs offer buffaloes and goats to the god at irregular intervals, apparently whenever they think that he stands in need of being appeased. His priests are called jhankar, and the person who actually sacrifices the animals is known as jani. The functions of the dehuri, the jhankar and the jani are hereditary.
Although human sacrifice has now been abandoned by the Kandhs, and the memory of it is believed to have almost died out in the Kandhmals of Orissa, an account of the tribe would be incomplete without some mention of the terrible practices which formerly prevailed. As I am not in a position to add any fresh facts to those already on record in the reports on the subject, I venture to quote the admirable description of this phase of Kandh superstition which is given by my friend, Mr. J. G. Frazer, of Trinity College, Cambridge, in volume 1, pages 384-90 of The Golden Bough:

"The best known case of human sacrifices systematically offered to ensure good crops is supplied by the Khonds or Kandhs, another Dravidian race in Bengal. Our knowledge of them is derived from the accounts written by British officers, who forty or fifty years ago were engaged in putting them down. The sacrifices were offered to the earth goddess, Tari Pennu or Bera Pennu, and were believed to ensure good crops and immunity from all disease and accidents. In particular, they were considered necessary in the cultivation of turmeric, the Khonds arguing that the turmeric could not have a deep red colour without the shedding of blood. The victim or Meriah was acceptable to the goddess only if he had been purchased, or had been born a victim, that is, the son of a victim father, or had been devoted as a child by his father or guardian. Khonds in distress often sold their children for victims, 'considering the beatification of their souls certain, and their death, for the benefit of mankind, the most honourable possible.' A man of the Pannas (Pan) tribe was once seen to load a Khond with curses, and finally to spit in his face, because the Khond had sold for a victim his own child, whom the Pannas had wished to marry. A party of Khonds, who saw this, immediately pressed forward to comfort the seller of his child, saying—'your child has died that all the world may live, and the earth goddess herself will wipe that spittle from your face.' The victims were often kept for years before they were sacrificed. Being regarded as consecrated beings, they were treated with extreme affection, mingled with deference, and were welcomed wherever they went. A Meriah youth, on attaining maturity, was generally given a wife, who was herself usually a Meriah or victim, and with her he received a portion of land and farm-stock. Their offspring were also victims. Human sacrifices were offered to the earth goddess by tribes, branches of tribes, or villages, both at periodical festivals and on extraordinary occasions. The periodical sacrifices were generally so arranged by tribes and divisions of tribes that each head of a family was enabled, at least once a year, to procure a shred of flesh for his fields, generally about the time when his chief crop was laid down."

"The mode of performing these tribal sacrifices was as follows. Ten or twelve days before the sacrifice, the victim was devoted by

---

2 Major S. C. Macpherson, Memorials of Service in India, p. 113 sq.; Major-General John Campbell, Wild Tribes of Khondistan, pp. 52-68, etc.
3 J. Campbell, op. cit.., p. 56.
5 Ib., p. 118.
cutting off his hair, which until then was kept unshorn. Crowds of men and women assembled to witness the sacrifice, none might be excluded, since the sacrifice was declared to be 'for all mankind.' It was preceded by several days of wild revelry and gross debauchery. On the day before the sacrifice the victim, dressed in a new garment, was led forth from the village in solemn procession, with music and dancing, to the Meriah grove, which was a clump of high forest trees standing a little way from the village and untouched by the axe. In this grove the victim was tied to a post, which was sometimes placed between two plants of the sankissor shrub. He was then anointed with oil, ghee, and turmeric, and adorned with flowers; and 'a species of reverence, which it is not easy to distinguish from adoration,' was paid to him throughout the day. A great struggle now arose to obtain the smallest relic from his person; a particle of the turmeric paste with which he was smeared, or a drop of his spittle, was esteemed of sovereign virtue, especially by the women. The crowd danced round the post to music, and addressing the earth, said, 'O God, we offer this sacrifice to you; give us good crops, seasons, and health.'

"On the last morning the orgies, which had been scarcely interrupted during the night, were resumed, and continued till noon, when they ceased, and the assembly proceeded to consummate the sacrifice. The victim was again anointed with oil, and each person touched the anointed part, and wiped the oil on his own head. In some places the victim was then taken in procession round the village from door to door, where some plucked hair from his head, and others begged for a drop of his spittle, with which they anointed their heads. As the victim might not be bound nor make any show of resistance, the bones of his arms and, if necessary, his legs were broken; but often this precaution was rendered unnecessary by stupefying him with opium. The mode of putting him to death varied in different places. One of the commonest modes seems to have been strangulation, or squeezing to death. The branch of a green tree was cleft several feet down the middle; the victim's neck (in other places, his chest) was inserted in the cleft, which the priest, aided by his assistants, strove with all his force to close. Then he wounded the victim slightly with his axe, whereupon the crowd rushed at the victim and cut the flesh from the bones, leaving the head and bowels untouched. Sometimes he was cut up alive. In Chinna Kimedy he was dragged along the fields, surrounded by the crowd, who, avoiding his head and intestines, hacked the flesh from his body with their knives till he died. Another very common 1 S. C. Macpherson, op. cit., p. 117 sq.; J. Campbell, p. 112.

2 S. C. Macpherson, p. 118.
3 J. Campbell, p. 64.
4 J. Campbell, pp. 55, 112.
5 S. C. Macpherson, p. 119; J. Campbell, p. 113.
6 S. C. Macpherson, p. 127. "Instead of the branch of a green tree, Campbell mentions two strong planks or bamboos (p. 57) or a slit bamboo (p. 183)."
7 J. Campbell, pp. 56, 58, 120.
8 Dalton, Ethnology of Bengal, p. 298, quoting Colonel Campbell's Report.
mode of sacrifice in the same district was to fasten the victim to the proboscis of a wooden elephant, which revolved on a stout post, and, as it whirled round, the crowd cut the flesh from the victim while life remained. In some villages Major Campbell found as many as fourteen of these wooden elephants, which had been used at sacrifices. In one district the victim was put to death slowly by fire. A low stage was formed, sloping on either side like a roof; upon it the victim was placed, his limbs wound round with cords to confine his struggles. Fires were then lighted and hot brands applied, to make him roll up and down the slopes of the stage as long as possible; for the more tears he shed the more abundant would be the supply of rain. Next day the body was cut to pieces.

"The flesh cut from the victim was instantly taken home by the persons who had been deputed by each village to bring it. To secure its rapid arrival, it was sometimes forwarded by relays of men, and conveyed with postal neatness fifty or sixty miles." In each village all who stayed at home fasted rigidly until the flesh arrived. The bearer deposited it in the place of public assembly, where it was received by the priest and the heads of families. The priest divided it into two portions, one of which he offered to the earth goddess by burying it in a whole in the ground with his back turned, and without looking. Then each man added a little earth to bury it, and the priest poured water on the spot from a hill gourd. The other portion of flesh he divided into as many shares as there were heads of houses present. Each head of a house rolled his shred of flesh in leaves, and buried it in his favourite field, placing it in the earth behind his back without looking. In some places each man carried his portion of flesh to the stream which watered his fields, and there hung it on a pole. For three days thereafter no house was swept; and in one district strict silence was observed, no fire might be given out, no wood cut, and no strangers received. The remains of the human victim (namely, the head, bowels, and bones) were watched by strong parties the night after the sacrifice; and next morning they were burned, along with a whole sheep, on a funeral pile. The ashes were scattered over the fields, laid as pastes over the houses and granaries, or mixed with the new corn to preserve it from insects. Sometimes, however, the head and bones were buried, not burnt. After the suppression of the human sacrifices, inferior victims were substituted in some places; for instance,

---

1 J. Campbell, p. 126. The elephant represented the earth goddess herself, who was here conceived in elephant-form; Campbell, pp. 51, 126. In the hill tracts of Goomur she was represented in peacock-form, and the post to which the victim was bound bore the effigy of a peacock, Campbell, p. 54.

2 S. C. Macpherson, p. 120.

3 Dalston, Ethnology of Bengal, p. 288, referring to Colonel Campbell's Report.

5 J. Campbell, p. 182.

6 S. C. Macpherson, p. 128; Dalston, l. c.

7 J. Campbell, pp. 55, 182.
in the capital of Chinna Kimedy, a goat took the place of a human victim.¹

"In these Khond sacrifices the Meriahs are represented by our authorities as victims offered to propitiate the earth goddess. But from the treatment of the victims, both before and after death, it appears that the custom cannot be explained as merely a propitiatory sacrifice. A part of the flesh certainly was offered to the earth goddess, but the rest of the flesh was buried by each householder in his fields, and the ashes of the other parts of the body were scattered over the fields, laid as paste on the granaries, or mixed with the new corn. These latter customs imply that to the body of the Meriah there were ascribed a direct or intrinsic power of making the crops to grow, quite independent of the indirect efficacy which it might have as an offering to secure the goodwill of the deity. In other words, the flesh and ashes of the victim were believed to be endowed with a magical or physical power of fertilising the land. The same intrinsic power was ascribed to the blood and tears of the Meriah, his blood causing the redness of the turmeric and his tears producing rain; for it can hardly be doubted that, originally at least, the tears were supposed to produce rain, not merely to prognosticate it. Similarly, the custom of pouring water on the buried flesh of the Meriah was no doubt a rain-charm. Again, intrinsic supernatural power as an attribute of the Meriah appears in the sovereign virtue believed to reside in anything that came from his person, as his hair or spittle. The ascription of such power to the Meriah indicates that he was much more than a mere man sacrificed to propitiate a deity. Once more, the extreme reverence paid him points to the same conclusion. Major Campbell speaks of the Meriah as 'being regarded as something more than mortal,' and Major Macpherson says—'A species of reverence, which it is not easy to distinguish from adoration, is paid to him.' In short, the Meriah appears to have been regarded as divine. As such, he may originally have represented the earth deity, or perhaps a deity of vegetation; though in later times he came to be regarded rather as a victim offered to a deity than as himself an incarnated deity. This later view of the Meriah as a victim rather than a god may perhaps have received undue emphasis from the European writers who have described the Khond religion. Habituatated to the later idea of sacrifice as an offering made to a god for the purpose of conciliating his favour, European observers are apt to interpret all religious slaughter in this sense, and to suppose that wherever such slaughter take place, there must necessarily be a deity to whom the slaughter is believed by the slayers to be acceptable. Thus their preconceived ideas unconsciously colour and warp their descriptions of savage rites.²

The dead are burned and the ashes left at the burning ground until the next day. The relatives then go to the spot and burn over the ashes a cloth and some rice, at the same time calling upon the dead man to keep quiet and employ his spare time in ploughing or in gathering the leaves used for plates, and not to transform himself into a tiger and become a nuisance to his friends. A fowl is also killed and a portion of the flesh laid close to the ashes. Having thus done their best to provide for the comfort of the deceased in the next world, and to induce him to refrain from giving trouble to the living, the mourners return home and solace themselves with a drinking-bout. Relations who live in other villages are expected to pay visits of condolence to the dead man's house, and to bring with them a sufficient quantity of liquor.

¹ J. Campbell, p. 187.
² J. Campbell, p. 112.
³ S. C. Macpherson, p. 118.

The Kandhs have a strong belief in witchcraft, particularly in that exercise of the art which enables witches to transform themselves into tigers, leopards, wolves, and so forth, and in this shape to attack human beings or their cattle. For the detection of such persons the following ordeals are appointed:—In the ordeal by iron a bar of iron is put into the blacksmith's furnace and the guru works the bellows. If no one in particular is suspected, the names of the villagers are called out one after the other, and the person at whose name the iron melts is held to be the guilty one. If suspicion has fallen on some one, and it is desired simply to test his guilt, a fowl is taken, its legs are plunged into boiling water and rapidly withdrawn. If the skin peels off, the suspected person is held to be guilty, and he is turned out of the village unless he chooses to undergo the ordeal by fire. For this purpose a trench is cut seven cubits long and one cubit broad, and filled with burning embers. The legs of the accused are then smeared with ghi, and he is made to walk twice through the trench lengthwise. If the ghi catches fire and he is burned, it is a proof of his guilt.

The dress of the Kandhs is simple. The only garment of the men is a long cloth, a few inches wide, which is passed round the waist and twice through between the legs, the ends usually bright coloured, hang down behind like a tail. The hair is worn in a tight chignon on the right side of the head, into which metal pins, a fine tooth-comb and flamingo feathers are usually stuck as ornaments. The women's dress consists of a short petticoat reaching from the waist to the knee; on the upper part of the body they wear nothing but strings of beads. The face is tattooed on the cheeks and forehead with fine lines starting from the nose as a centre. Sometimes the legs are also decorated in this fashion. All observers agree in describing the men as a fine-looking, well-formed race of middle height, and great activity and fleetness of foot. The women, on the other hand, are ugly of feature, short and square of build, and exceedingly sturdy and robust. Similar differences of form and feature between the two sexes may be observed among the Rájbangsí, the Tibetans, the Mundas and Oraons of Chota Nagpur, and among many other primitive races. It is, in fact, a general opinion among ethnologists that the tribal type is more sharply defined and more persistent among the women than among the men of a tribe.
Like the Santáls and Hos, the Kandhs are keen sportsmen and show remarkable skill in the use of very primitive weapons. Armed only with axes and bows and arrows, they run down the bison, the nilgao and the wild boar, and their accuracy of aim in the case of smaller animals is described as surprising. Agriculture is their sole pursuit, and none of them have taken to any sort of trade. They claim full rights of property in the soil in virtue of having cleared the jungle and prepared the land for cultivation. In some villages individual ownership is unknown, and the land is cultivated on a system of temporary occupation subject to periodical redistribution under the orders of the headman or málik. Every village has its headman or málik, and the office is hereditary in the male line. These officials have considerable influence, and act as arbitrators in petty disputes between the villagers. A group of villages supposed to be inhabited by the descendants of a single ancestor forms a muta or commune under a chief called the muta-málik, whose authority is invoked chiefly to settle social disputes. In addition to the muta-málik, each muta has a Hindu Superintendent, called bisai or muta-sardár. These men are believed to have been appointed and endowed with grants of land by the Kandhs themselves in order to act as intermediaries between them and the Hindu Rájás of the neighbourhood. Their authority is said to be rapidly declining.

The tables on the following pages show the names of relationships in use among the Kandhs.
A.—Relations through the father, whether of man or woman.

GREAT-GREAT-GRANDFATHER Prenda.

Great-grandfather—Great-grandmother
Bodu. Bodai.

Grandfather’s brother—
Bodu.

Grandfather’s brother’s son
Koku.

Father’s elder brother’s wife—Father’s elder brother
Bodu. Bodai.

Father’s younger brother—His wife Bodu. Awa.

Father’s sister—Her husband
Mibadi. Mihodu.

Father—Step-mother
Naiba. Awa.

Male cousin Ambassa.

Female cousin
Bolu.

Male cousin’s son
Bodu.

Female cousin’s son Baneja.
B.—Relations through the mother, whether of man or woman.

Great-grandfather ——— Great-grandmother
Bodu. ——— Bodai.

Grandfather ——— Grandmother
Akai. ——— Aia.

His wife ——— Mother's brother ——— Mother's sister ——— Her husband ——— Mother
Anna. ——— Mamu. ——— Monai. ——— Mouse. ——— Aia.

Cousin

C.—Relations through the brother and sister, whether of man or woman.

Father, Aba.

His wife ——— Elder brother ——— Younger brother ——— His wife ——— Self ——— Sister ——— Sister's husband

Brother's daughter ——— Brother's son ——— Sister's son ——— Sister's daughter Mama. ——— Dada-sirsnja. ——— Banaja. ——— Banaja.
D (1).—Relations through the wife, of a man.

- Wife's father
  - Nisaura.
- Wife's mother
  - Nisau.
- Self
  - Wife
    - Anu.
  - Wife's brother
    - Mijalah.
  - His wife
    - Bel.
  - Wife's sister
    - Pada.
    - Wife's husband
      - Sadu.
    - Wife's nephew
      - Boneja.

D (2).—Relations through the husband, of a woman.

- Husband's father
  - Sasura.
- Husband's mother
  - Saa.
- Self
  - Husband
    - His other wife
      - Migoma.
    - Husband's elder brother
      - His wife
        - Dada.
        - Husband's younger brother
          - His wife
            - Dada Nina.
            - Husband's sister
              - Her husband
                - Misora.
    - Step-son
      - Nimido.
    - Husband's nephew
      - Mi Boneja.
    - Husband's nephew
      - Boneja.
E (1).—Relations through the son, whether of man or woman.

- Self
  - Anu
- Son
  - Mrieja.
  - Son's wife
    - Au Kdua.
  - Son's wife's father
    - Misomadi.
  - Son's wife's mother
    - Samadini.
- His wife
  - Grandson
    - Aka.
  - Great-grandson
    - Bahu.
- Granddaughter
  - Aku
  - Great-grandson
    - Bahu.

E (2).—Relations through the daughter, whether of man or woman.

- Self
  - Anu.
- Daughter
  - Samadi.
  - Daughter's father-in-law
    - Samadi.
  - Daughter's mother-in-law
    - Samadini.
  - Daughter's husband
    - Assi-jama.
- His wife
  - Daughter's son
    - Aka.
  - Daughter's daughter
    - Aku.
  - Daughter
    - Assi.
Biyáhut and Kharidéhé Kal-wárs in Behar.

Kéndh pékar, a section of the sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kandir, a bird, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kándu, Kánku, Bharbhunjá, Bhujá, Gong, the grain-parchine caste of Behar and Bengal, supposed to be descended from a Kahar father and a Sudra mother, and ranking among the mixed castes. According to Buchanan,1 indeed, the Kándus of Gorakhpur were reckoned as Vaisyas, but in this connexion the term Vaisya seems to have been used merely to mean merchant, and had no reference to the Vaisyas of early Indian tradition. The fact that the Kándus keep shops and often manufacture and sell sweetmeats has led to their being confounded with the Halwái or confectioners, who make sweetmeats, but do not usually parch grain themselves. This confusion has perhaps been more difficult to avoid owing to both castes being distributed over much the same area and having among their sub-castes groups bearing the same territorial names. The Kándus are divided into the following sub-castes:

- Madhesiá, Magahiá, Bantariá or Bharbhunjá, Kanaújiá, Gong, Koránch, Dhuriá, Rawání, Ballamtríá, Thather or Thatherá. Among these the Madhesiá and Bantariá adhere strictly to their hereditary profession of parching grain and selling sweetmeats; the Kanaújiá sub-caste are said to make saltpetre, while the Madhesiá Guriá are cultivators, personal servants, and thatchers of houses; the Gong cut and dress stones, sell sweetmeats, or act as personal servants in the houses of zemindars. Grain-parching, building mud walls, brick-laying, and thatching are the characteristic occupations of the Koránch, while the Dhuriá and Rawání carry palanquins and make sweetmeats. All the sub-castes, or at any rate their women, practise grain-parching more or less; and the separation of each group from the main body seems to have been due either to geographical position or to the circumstance of the males of the group adopting other occupations in addition to their hereditary profession. The Dhuriá and Rawání rank lowest of all, owing either to their having taken up the comparatively menial profession of palanquin-bearing or to their being branches of the Kahar caste, who went in for grain-parching and thus came to be associated with the Kándus. These two intermarry with each other. All the other sub-castes are strictly endogamous.

The majority of the Dacca Kándus, says Dr. Wise, belong to the Madhesiá and Koránc sub-castes, and are usually called Bharbhunjás, from their parching and grinding grain and preparing sattú or flour. Another equally common designation is Pánch Pírya Kándús from the religious sect to which they all belong. They originally came from Damdáhá, in Purniah, but having resided for several generations in Bengal are known as Khonta, or degraded, and

---

1 Eastern India, ii, 465.
Deswáli, or alien, Kándus by their Hindustání brethren, who decline all communication with them.

The sections of the Magahiyá sub-caste, which are very numerous, are shown in Appendix I. Authorities differ as to the precise form of exogamy which is practised. Some say that a man may not marry a woman who belongs to the same section as (a) himself, (b) his mother, (c) his paternal grandmother, (d) his maternal grandmother, (e) his paternal and maternal grandmothers. According to others the four sections of father, mother, and both grandmothers are excluded on the side of the bridegroom, and the three sections of father, mother, and maternal grandmother on the side of the bride, and in reckoning consanguinity both sets are taken into account; so that if the bride's maternal grandmother should have belonged to the same section as the bridegroom's paternal grandmother, the marriage will be barred, even though the bride and bridegroom themselves belong to different sections. Probably both systems are in force in some part of the large area covered by the caste. As regards the other sub-castes, the information available is rather meagre. The Gónr, Kanaújiá, and Madhesiá have mula or sections, and exclude in marriage a man's own section and those to which his mother's and both his grandmother's belong. I have not been able to ascertain the names of the sections. Two of the Bantariá and five of the Koráncí sections are given in Appendix I. The Dhuriá and Kávání sub-castes regulate their marriages by the standard formula for calculating prohibited degrees.

As a general rule Kándus marry their daughters as infants, but cases of adult-marriage are by no means uncommon. The marriage ceremony is of the common type, and sindurddán is regarded as the binding portion. A tilak of cloth and ornaments is usually exchanged, the first gift being presented by the parents of the bride. But where the bride's people are very poor, a bride-price of from Rs. 10 to Rs. 20 is sometimes paid, and in such cases the marriage is celebrated in the bridegroom's house. Among the Gónr sub-caste I have come across a very singular practice, which appears to have been introduced with the object of avoiding the stigma incurred by a family which has a daughter unmarried at the age of puberty. Where a girl is sickly or deformed, or where, owing to the poverty of the family, it is thought doubtful whether she will get married, all the relatives are assembled, and in their presence she is formally married to a drawn sword. The full marriage ceremony is performed, the caste Brahman officiates as priest, and red lead is smeared on the girl's forehead with the point of the sword. A girl so married wears ornaments, bedaub the parting of her hair with red lead, and in every respect demeans herself as a married woman, though living in her father's house. In the event of her afterwards procuring a husband, the entire ceremony is performed afresh. In the case of adults sexual intercourse before marriage may be atoned for by payment of a fine to the pancháyat; and if the fine is duly paid, the social position of the couple after marriage is not affected by their previous indiscretion.
Polygamy is permitted up to the customary limit of two wives; but in some districts it seems to be held that before taking a second wife a man must obtain the permission either of his first wife or of the headman and panchayat of the caste. A man may marry his wife's younger sister, whether virgin or widowed, but may in no case marry an elder sister after being married to the younger. A widow may marry again by the sagai ritual, which is less meagre than is usual among other widow-marrying castes. A Brahman is employed to recite mantras, and sindur is be smeared seven times on the forehead of the widow. She is not obliged to marry her late husband's younger brother, should such a relative exist, but in practice it is usual for her to do so. If she prefers to marry an outsider, the members of her late husband's family may claim the custody of her male children by him. Female children, however, follow the mother. Most Kandus appear to allow of divorce for adultery with a member of the caste, and permit divorced wives to marry again. Among the Gonr sub-caste, however, divorce in the European sense of the word is unknown. If a woman goes wrong with a member of the caste, the matter is brought before the panchayat, and is usually condoned. A second indiscretion is visited with expulsion from the caste, and this penalty is invariably inflicted when a woman has a liaisons with an outsider.

In matters of religion the caste seems to be pretty evenly divided between Vaishnavism and Saktism. Maithil or Tirhutia Brahmans serve them as priests, and are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. Their minor gods are numerous and deserve special notice. In Behar the entire caste worship Goraiya in a fashion which seems hardly in keeping with their high social position, and which seems to be a survival of some non-Aryan rite. A lump of clay is set up outside the house to represent the deity, a Dosadh officiates as priest, and the victim is a pig which is bought for a price from the Dosadh, slain by him at the instance of the Kandu worshipers, and then eaten by the family of the priest. The Dosadh, in fact, performs exactly the same functions as the Pahan of Chota Nagpur, and is paid for them in exactly the same manner. The Bantari or Bharbhunjé sub-caste worship Govinda as a household god on the Krishnahasti (8th dark half of Bhadra) with offerings of parched paddy, plantain, curds, and sweetmeats, which are eaten by the members of the family and the deddi relations. The Gonr sub-caste perform puja once a month to a small silver image of Bandi Mai; and on the tenth day of the Dasaharâ festival they wash the chisel, hammer, and T-square which they use for stone-cutting, and worship these tools with libations of ghi. The Koranch also worship Bandi, but make her image of cloth, like a doll. The Magahiya Kandus of Bhagalpur and Monghyr worship a deified member of the caste, one Kangali Sahu, to whom goats, sweetmeats, boiled rice, parched grain, and ganja are offered in the months of Srâvan and Bhâdra.

1 Otherwise known as Kangal Mahârâj, or Kangâli Bábâ.
In the month of Mágh all grain-parching Kándus, instead of worshipping Sarasvatí, as most Hindus do, pay adoration to Sokha Sív Náth. At this festival a pot filled with ghi, flour, barley, and other articles of their trade, together with a large quantity of rosin (dhztmi), is set fire to, and the dense smoke is regarded as the symbol or manifestation of their patron deity. Rám Thákur, Rangá Dhári, and Náyá Gosán, are also mentioned among the minor gods of Behar, to whom goats are offered on Fridays in the month of Áshár.

The Dacca Kándus, although employing a Brahman as purohit, follow the singular creed called Pánch Píriyá. Many observe the fast of Ramazán, wear the baddzi or sash, and the kafri or mendicant’s garb, offer sweetmeats (shirnt) at Dargahs and at the Shísh Husainí Dálán, and put their trust in amulets (tawí) given by the Khwand-Kár. Like the Pánch Píriyá Binds and Kumhárs, their Guru is the Mahant of the Nának Sháhi Akhárá.

Their funeral ceremonies present no features of special interest. The dead are burned, and sraudhá is performed on the thirty-first day after death.

Most Kándus believe the parching of grain to be their original and characteristic occupation, and the caste is spoken of by early English travellers under the quaint name of “the frymen.” In Upper India they are often cultivators, but they also parch grain and use pack-bullocks, as the Banjárás do, for transporting merchandise and cereals. The Gonr sub-caste cut and dress stone for building, carve images of the gods, and prepare curry-stones and grain-mills for household use. They also work as masons, and many of them are employed as domestic servants in the houses of wealthy landholders. In this capacity they fetch water and do all kinds of culinary work. No money wages are paid them, but they get their homestead lands (bári) rent-free, and are also entitled to claim certain perquisites (mángan) when the crops are reaped. Their women parch grain, and sometimes make sweetmeats.

Throughout the caste, indeed, the actual work of parching grain is usually left to the women. The process is a simple one. A clay oven is built, somewhat in the shape of a beehive, with ten or twelve round holes in the top. A fire is lighted inside and broken earthen pots containing sand are put on the holes. The grain to be parched is thrown in with the sand and stirred with a flat piece of wood (dabilá) or a broom (jhrúri) until it is ready. The wages (bhág) of the parcher are a proportion of the grain, varying from one-eighth to one-fourth. In Dacca the Kándus are confectioners as well as watchmen, domestic servants, and coolies. Their lowly traditional origin does not prevent their providing the only food that strict Hindus can eat with unwashed hands. It should be explained that vegetable products, such as gur or molasses, and sweetmeats cooked without the addition of any other substance than sugar, are called játá or kánóhá, and may be eaten even by Brahmans without dishonour; but if water or milk be added, it is pakka or dressed, and becomes impure.
This rule is observed everywhere, but in Upper India the terms in which it is expressed are exactly the reverse of those used in Bengal. A native of Behar, for instance, speaks of sweetmeats, parched grain, etc., as paki food, while by kachhi he means boiled rice, chapatties, etc., and anything in the preparation of which water has been used. The convenience of the distinction is obvious. It lightens the burden of taboo, and enables a traveller or a man who is in a hurry to stay his hunger without either risking his caste or being obliged to inquire minutely into the ceremonial status of the person who supplies him with food.

In point of social standing Kándus may be classed with Koiris, Gódás, Gangautás, and the entire group of castes from whose hands a Brahman will take water. On this point Buchanan, writing of Gorakhpur, observes:—"The Kándus are considered as on a par with the lower Baniyas. One-half of them have Brahman gurus, the others are of all the sects which the Baniyas follow. Their purohits are pure Brahmans. Their widows become concubines, but they abstain from drinking liquor in public, and Rajputs do not scruple to drink their water, although they eat the wild hog." Kándus themselves will eat cooked food only with members of their own sub-caste. Gonr Kándus, indeed, are said to be so particular as not to allow even a Brahman to cook for them; but I am inclined to think that this statement may have been a piece of personal affectation on the part of my informant, for in Champáran, where all Kándus permit themselves to eat fowls, the Gonr sub-caste add to this the further iniquity of indulging in strong drink. As agriculturists the caste does not hold a very high position. A few members of the Koránch sub-caste have risen to be zamindars and tenure-holders, but most Kándus are occupancy raiyats, while in Bhagalpur some have sunk to be Kamíads or landless day-labourers.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kándus in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>817</td>
<td>747</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>407</td>
<td>299</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>192</td>
<td>721</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>50,430</td>
<td>81,618</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>493</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>22,723</td>
<td>50,078</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>315</td>
<td>9,111</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>60,145</td>
<td>65,723</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>274</td>
<td>1,104</td>
<td>Kúaúra</td>
<td>99,302</td>
<td>80,078</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>1,647</td>
<td>632</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>111,921</td>
<td>89,723</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>2,368</td>
<td>940</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>60,741</td>
<td>67,365</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>285</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>62,289</td>
<td>50,287</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khalsa</td>
<td>437</td>
<td>978</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>23,781</td>
<td>22,191</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jemore</td>
<td>1,554</td>
<td>1,123</td>
<td>Purúnah</td>
<td>4,833</td>
<td>5,925</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>1,293</td>
<td>259</td>
<td>Maidah</td>
<td>3,148</td>
<td>3,314</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>31</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>2,121</td>
<td>9,004</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rampur</td>
<td>16</td>
<td>817</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>59,386</td>
<td>58,644</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Groga</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>221</td>
<td>Buni</td>
<td>22,403</td>
<td>24,623</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>144</td>
<td>184</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>10,008</td>
<td>12,153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjlíng</td>
<td>81</td>
<td>423</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>23,005</td>
<td>25,407</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpur</td>
<td>549</td>
<td>78</td>
<td>Házaribagh</td>
<td>8,699</td>
<td>6,899</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>164</td>
<td>75</td>
<td>Lohardagá</td>
<td>8,699</td>
<td>7,195</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>1,611</td>
<td>530</td>
<td>Singhbhum</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>Manbhán</td>
<td>1,049</td>
<td>573</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainamnúrin</td>
<td>314</td>
<td>267</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>130</td>
<td>1,700</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>7</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Kandwar, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Káneil, a section of the Biyáhut and KharidháKalwáris, and of Magahiya Kándus in Behar.

Kángár, Kángálí, a beggar. Usually denotes the class of lepers, cripples, etc., who are maintained in ordinary years by the charity of their fellow-villagers. The obligation is held to cease when relief measures are undertaken by Government.

Kángali, a title of Gaálás.

Kánhaiwar, a mul or section of the Naomulí or Majraut sub-caste of Gaálás in Behar.

Kángámé-Kángárm, a mul of the Bharadvája section of Maíthil Brahmins in Behar.

Kángjar, Khángor, a Dravidian gipsy caste of the North-West Provinces, who hunt jackals, catch and eat snakes, and make strings of hemp and cotton. In Behar they are chiefly rope-twisters.

Kángi, a title of Joláhas.

Kángiári, a gáin of the Bátysa gotra of Rárhi Brahmins in Bengal.

Kángilál, a gáin of the Bátysa gotra of Rárhi Brahmins in Bengal.

Kánkhojia, an ear-picker, generally a member of the barber caste.

Kánkol, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhési sub-caste of Halwáris in Behar.

Kánkuli, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kanní, a gotra or section of Nepáli Brahmins.

Kánó, a section of the Bana-páí sub-caste of Koirís in Behar.

Kánp, a mul or section of the Kanaújiá sub-caste of Sonáris in Behar.

Kánpákár, a mul or section of the Timmulíá Madhési sub-caste of Halwáris in Behar.

Kánphát or Sannyási, a religious group of Jugiís.

Kánphatá, a sept of the Ruá-tár sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Ziénri, a Hindu caste of Purníah allied to the Doms and intermarrying with them. Their profession is hunting, and they are supposed to be experts in killing tigers and other wild beasts with poisoned arrows.

Kans, grass, a sept of Kharwáris in Chota Nagpur.

Kánshabánik, a synonym for Kánshári.

Kánsári, Kánsabánik, the brazier caste of Bengal, popularly supposed to be an offshoot of the Subarnabánik, degraded because its members took to working in Kánsá or bell-metal. Another view is that they are merely a sub-caste of Kánsáris who have severed their connexion with the parent caste and set up as an independent group. Kánsáris marry their daughters as infants by the orthodox Brahmánical ritual, prohibit the remarriage of widows, and do not recognize divorce. Their social rank is respectable. They employ the same Brahman, barber and waterman as the members of the Nabasákag group, and Brahmins take water from their hands. In Eastern Bengal almost all Kánsáris belong to the Saíva sect, but in Central and Western Bengal Saivas are found among their number. Like other artisan castes, they are very particular about observing the festival of Viswakarma, the mythical architect of the universe.

Kansaris buy their material in the form of brass sheeting, which they hammer into the shapes required. In Eastern Bengal Chandals often take service with them, and become very skilful workmen. The utensils made are sold to dealers (paikar) who retail them in villages inland.

Kansari, a sub-caste of Kamaars in Midnapur.

Kansaunghia, a section of Babhans in Behar.

Kansi, field grass, a totemistic sept of Chiks, Kumhars, Pans, Telis, Goalas, and Bairagis in Chota Nagpur; a section of Kahars in Behar.

Kant, a section of Awadhi Hajamas in Behar.

Kantaha, Mahabrahman, or Mahapatra, a division of Brahmins in Behar, who officiate as priests at the cremation of the dead.

Kantai, a group of the Rajbansi sub-caste of the Kochh caste, by profession palki-bearers.

Kantarau, a sub-section of the Bharadwaja section of Utkal Brahmins.

Kante ke rakmal, a section of the Biyahut and Kharidaha Kalwars in Behar.

Kante ke ras, a section of the Biyahut and Kharidaha Kalwars in Behar.

Kanthar, a gatin or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmins in Bengal.

Kanthwarr, a territorial section of Rautiis in Chota Nagpur.

Kanti, Kantuar, a totemistic section of Mahilis in Manbhum, the members of which will not eat the ear of any animal.
Kápa, Chhaghariá, a hyper-gamous group of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kapáli, a gáin of the Sábarna gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kapáli, a cultivating and weaving caste of Eastern Bengal, who claim to be the offspring of a Kámar father and a Teli mother; others say that the father of the caste was a Tiyar and the mother a Brahman. Both pedigrees are wholly imaginary, and only deserve mention here as illustrating the persistence and vitality of the theory that all castes except the four supposed to have been originally created have arisen by marriage between the members of these four and members of the so-called mixed castes thus produced. Like many Bengal castes, the Kapáli have a vague tradition that their original home was in Upper India; but this tradition has never assumed a legendary form. Another theory is that up to the time of Adisura they were classed as the Sudras of Eastern Bengal, and that when he imported the ancestors of the Bengal Brahmans and Káyasthas from Kanauj, he called upon the Kapális to supply the newcomers with water. This they declined to do, and in punishment for their refusal were reduced to the comparatively low position which they now hold. The internal structure of the caste throws no light upon its origin. They have only two sections—Síb (Siva) and Kásyapa—but these are not exogamous, and marriage is regulated by counting prohibited degrees down to three, or, as some say, seven generations in the descending line. We may perhaps hazard the conjecture that the section-name Sib, by no means a common one, may indicate remote kinship with the Sib-bansi Kochh, a very numerous tribe, from which in all probability many of the castes of Eastern Bengal have been derived. Kapális have no regular sub-castes, but a distinction seems to be drawn between those who make gunny-bags and those who only sell them. The latter consider themselves socially superior to the former and avoid intermarriage with them, though they have not yet reached the complete endogamy which is essential to the formation of a sub-caste properly so-called.

Kapális marry their daughters as infants by the standard Hindu ritual, the essential portion of which is sampra-dán, or the presentation of the bride to the bridegroom and his acceptance of the gift. The bride's parents receive a bride-price (van), the amount of which is slightly higher when the bride comes from a family bearing the title of Mandal, Mánjhi, or Shikdár. Polygamy is permitted when the first wife is barren, but is said to be rare in practice. Widows may not marry again. Divorce is not recognised. A woman taken in adultery is simply cast off by her husband and ceases to be a member of respectable society. She cannot marry her paramour, for súngá is not in force among Kapális, but she may live with him as his mistress, though in that case both run some risk of being expelled from the caste.
The religion of the Kapáli presents no features of special interest. Most of them are Vaishnavas, comparatively few being Sáktas. Among the minor gods Kártikéyá is held in special veneration. For religious and ceremonial purposes they employ degraded Barna-Brahmans, who are looked down upon by all members of the sacred order, except those who serve castes of still lower social status than the Kapálí. The dead are burned, and the sréddh ceremony is performed on the thirty-first day after death. In the case of persons who die a violent death, the sréddh takes place on the fourth day.

In Rangpur Buchanan found the Kapálí engaged in making umbrellas, but in Eastern Bengal at the present day they are weavers and cultivators. According to Dr. Wise, they chiefly cultivate jute (kouhta), preparing the fibre themselves and manufacturing from it coarse canvas (tát) for bags. Both men and women weave, their loom being the ordinary native one, but clumsier than that used by the Tántí. Their shuttle is called sáya, and they dispense with the reed (shána). They are careful to explain that the shuttle is shot with the hands, as among the Tántí, and not driven by pedals, as with the outcaste Jogis.

The Kapáli manufactures three kinds of canvas: the first (chhídá) being used for the carriage of rape seed; the second (chat) for packing goods; while the third (tát) is in universal demand for floor-matting, for boat sails, rice bags, and bags for country produce generally. In Bikrampúr a finer kind of canvas, known as bára-bastra, is woven for the carriage of areca nut. The trade of the Kapáli has of late years suffered greatly by the importation of gunny-bags from Europe, but they always find a ready market for the sake of matting. Bamboo mats for floors are seldom used in Bengal, but canvas is laid down in every shop, and beneath bedding whenever people sleep on the ground. On the Vijayá Dasami day of the Durgé Puja all Bengali shopkeepers, often including the Muhammadan, regard it as a duty to throw away the old matting of their shops and to replace it by new.

The Kapális generally reside in villages, where they can cultivate jute, never in large towns, and would lose caste if they worked with hemp or cotton. Their occupation being different from that of the Tántí, the two castes live in amity with one another. They are usually poor, but in former days several of them are said to have risen to be tálūqdárs. Some hold tenures, but the bulk of the caste are occupancy and non-occupancy raiyats. A few have relinquished their characteristic trade and become boatmen and shop-keepers. Socially they rank between Jelíyás and Dhopáás. They claim to be of higher rank than the Bhunimáli, Chandál, or Sunrí, and the washerman and barber admit them to be clean Sudras, and have no objection to working for them. Their practice in the matter of food is the same as that of other orthodox Hindus of Eastern Bengal. They assert that they never taste spirits, but it is generally believed they do. Ganjá-smoking, however, is common among them.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kapals in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>780</td>
<td>1290</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>552</td>
<td>810</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>150</td>
<td>287</td>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>338</td>
<td>499</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinapur</td>
<td>1,724</td>
<td>1,088</td>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>317</td>
<td>569</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>58,061</td>
<td>6,729</td>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>9,506</td>
<td>15,189</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>13,901</td>
<td>5,729</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>8,578</td>
<td>7,039</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>14,199</td>
<td>6,729</td>
<td>Maimanjitsingh</td>
<td>11,283</td>
<td>11,568</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>22,704</td>
<td>8,572</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>8,197</td>
<td>6,643</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>98,450</td>
<td>12,759</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>417</td>
<td>582</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hurludnbad</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>245</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>179</td>
<td>85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>248</td>
<td>713</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadda</td>
<td>318</td>
<td>853</td>
<td>Santál Parganas</td>
<td>10</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baras</td>
<td>761</td>
<td>810</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kápar, a section and a title of Kewats; a title of the Dhusi sub-caste of Chamás and of Magháya Kumhárs in Behar.

Kapardár, the son of a wet-nurse; a title given by the Rájás of Rámgarh to some of their servants.

Kápari, a section of the Kádar caste in Behar.

Kaphalya, a thar or section of Nepáli and Utkal Brahmans.

Kapinjala, a section of Utkal Brahmans.

Kápri, a section of the Magháya sub-caste of Barhis; a title of Aráiyá Telis; a section of the Banapár sub-caste of Koiris in Behar; a title of Chamárs and a section of Sunris in Behar.

Kapur, a section of Awadhía Hajjáms in Behar.

Kápur, a sept of the Chandrabansi division of Rajputs and a section of the Chárjáti sub-caste of Khátris in Behar.

Kár, a section of Utkal or Orissa Brahmans; a family name of Baidyas and Kayasths in Bengal; a title of the Aut sub-caste of Gandhabaniks, of Sánkháris, Tántis, and Sutrédhars in Bengal.

Kará, buffalo, a sub-sept of the Besá sept of Santáls and a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Kárá, a group of the Srotiyya sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans; a mul or section of the Tinmuliá and Chhamuliá Madhesiá and Bhojpuria sub-castes of Halwáís in Behar; a title of Kaibarttas.

Kárádhánautá, a mul or section of the Tinmuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Karaf, a section of Awadhía Hajjáms in Behar.

Karaiáchor, a section of the Banodiá and Jaiswar Kalwárs in Behar.

Karaiérk, a pur or section of the Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Karaiyá, a sub-caste of Háris.

Karaiyá, a title of Bangaja' Kayasths.
Kárák, a section of Sunris and Telis in Behar and Chota Nagpur.

Karákáta Karwár, buffalo, a totemistic section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Karál, Kurál, a sub-caste of Chandáls who sell fish caught by others. Their women prepare and sell chirá.

Karán, a tree, a sept of Goálás in Chota Nagpur.

Karámanti, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Karamwár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Karaít, Kurál, a sub-caste of Chandáls who sell fish caught by others. Their women prepare Karamwár, a sept of Rajputs and sell chirá.

Karaí, a section of Sunris and Telis in Behar and Chota Nagpur.

Karaláí, a sub-caste of Kairbarttás in Noakhali.

Karans, a tree, a sept of Goálás in Chota Nagpur.

Karánmati, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Karamwár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Karán, the indigenous writer-caste of Orissa. Karans recognize only two endogamous sub-castes—Karán proper and Sristi-Karan or Uriya Sristi-Karan. The former, like the Madhyásreni Brahmans and the Kásthás or Madhyásreni Káyasths, claim to have been originally Káyasths of Bengal who were driven to take refuge in Orissa, because they refused to accept the institution of Kulinism from Ballál Sen. The latter are supposed to be sprung from liaisons between Karans and members of the Nábasákhá group. They are generally employed as menial servants by the Karans, and I am informed that even now they do not object to admit the illegitimate children of Karans into their caste. Karans and Sristi-Karans, however, do not intermarry, and a Karan cannot eat food that has been cooked by a Sristi-Karan. As with the Káyasths of Bengal, cases occur among the Karans of outsiders being admitted into the caste, and it is said that several families of well-to-do Khandaits have thus been transformed into Karans. The children borne by maid-servants kept in the family are called Bhatuntara. They are recognised as Karans, but do not inherit the property of the head of the family.

Another group, which is not strictly endogamous, deserves special notice here. This is the class known as Naulí Karan or Karan with the sacred thread. Concerning these a curious story is told. Once upon a time the King of Orissa while out walking found two male infants, apparently twins, lying at the roadside. He had them carried home, and gave one to a washerwoman and the other to a sweeper (Hári) woman to nurse. When they were grown up, the boys were brought to the king, and he was asked to determine their caste. Seeing that no low-caste woman would be at the trouble of exposing her infants, the king concluded that they must be either Brahmins or Karans. As it was impossible to say which, he decided, as it were, to split the difference by investing them with the sacred thread as if they were Brahmins, and then enrolling them in the Karan caste. Their descendants still go through the form of investing their sons with the thread, though they only wear it for two or three months. At the time of their assuming the thread they perform a curious ceremony in memory of the vicissitudes of their ancestors. A post made of bel wood, and adorned with various kinds of devices in sola is set up at the place where the ceremony of investiture is performed, and shell bracelets, a piece of cloth, and other odds and ends are placed at the foot of it. On one side of the post stands a washerwoman, on the other a woman of the Hāri caste, and when the initiate is taken inside the house, he is made to bow ostensibly to the bel post, but really, so it is explained, to the two women who represent the wet-nurses of the twin forefathers of the caste. The Nauli Karans intermarry with the Karans proper, but not with the Sristi-Karans.

The exogamous divisions of the Karan caste are shown in Appendix I. Most of them are of the standard Brahmanical type, though it is possible that Nāgēsa and Sankha may be totemistic. Prohibited degrees are reckoned by the method in vogue among the higher Hindu castes, with the curious exception that a man is permitted to marry his maternal uncle's daughter, an alliance distinctly forbidden by the ordinary rules.

Girls are usually married as infants, but instances not unfrequently occur where, owing to difficulties in procuring a suitable husband, a man will keep his daughters unmarried until they come to be eighteen or nineteen years old. In any case the Karans, like the Kāsthās of Midnapur, are careful to guard against the physical objections to infant-marriage by forbidding the couple to cohabit until the bride attains sexual maturity. Contrary to the usual practice of Hindus, marriages in the Karan caste generally take place in the day-time. On the question what should be deemed the more binding portion of the ritual, there seems to be some difference of opinion. Some attach special importance to the offering of funeral cakes to the deceased ancestors of the bridegroom, which takes place on the fourth day after the initial ceremony of giving away the bride. Others again hold that the essential rite is the laying of the bride's right hand in that of the bridegroom, and binding their two hands together with a piece of thread spun in a special way. The wedding usually takes place at the bride's house. On the next day the bride is taken to the bridegroom's house, where she spends eight days, called the ashta-mangalā, or eight auspicious days. On the day and night immediately following the marriage, known as the biṣṣāratri or 'poison-night,' the bride and bridegroom are not allowed to see one another at all, nor in any case are they allowed to sleep together during the ashta-mangalā unless the bride has attained puberty.

Most Karans are Vaishnavas, and their favourite divinity is Krishna. They employ Utkal Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, and these are the only Brahmans from whose hands they will take food. The dead are burned; a period of mourning is observed for ten days, and the sraddh is performed in the orthodox fashion on the eleventh day. In the matter of personal law they are governed by the Mitākshāra, as interpreted by the commentary of Sambhukar Bājpayi.

Karan rank next to Brahmans in the scale of social precedence commonly recognised in Orissa. Most of them have a sound knowledge of their own vernacular and are ready scribes, and within the last few years many of them have taken to English education. Zemlindars, patnidárs, holders of lákhiráj tenures, and occupancy and non-occupancy ryots are found among the caste, and many are employed as clerks and gomashtas by the various grades of landholders. They are strict as to diet, abstaining entirely from wine and strong drink, taking cooked or uncooked food from no other caste, water only from members of the Nabasákhá group, and never smoking in the same hookah with men of another caste.

Karan, a sub-caste of Káyasths and Támbulis in Behar.

Karan, Nauli-Káran, a sub-caste of Karans in Orissa.

Karángá, Karga, Koranga, a small Dravidian caste of Western Bengal, who make baskets, dig tanks, and work as carpenters. Their special business is the making of cart wheels and wooden articles, such as pailás or seers of standard measure. In Singbhum they are also stone-cutters. They have two exogamous subdivisions, Sálmách and Kaachhaps, and four endogamous sub-castes—Dhaluá, Maluá, Sikhrájá and Tunga. The word also denotes persons who castrate goats and bullocks.

Karángá-Mundra, a sub-tribe of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Karangárhyá, a sep of Rajputs in Behar.

Karánía, kusum tree, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Karanjava, a gáin of the Káyapa gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Karanjavá, a sub-caste of Goálás in Bengal.

Karanjee, an oil-seed, a sept of Bairágis in Chota Nagpur.

Karángá, a mül or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Karáá, a section of the Kurmi caste in Manbhum, the members of which will not kill or eat a buffalo.

Kárárihá, a mül or section of the Tinmuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Karááti, a title of Chandáls who are employed as sawyers of wood.

Karáuche, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Karáunti, a section of Awaádhí Hájjáms in Behar.

Kárbháá, a section of Kánujiá Sónárs in Behar.

Kárrchóíá, a seapt of Rajputs in Behar.

Kárgáá, a section of the Maghayá sub-caste of Koiris in Behar.

Káhrar, a jungle fruit like bel, a totemistic sept of Kharwars, Chiks, and Lohárs in Chota Nagpur; a section of Rajwárs in Western Bengal.

Kárian, a section of the Satmuliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Káriárá, a seapt of Káurs in Chota Nagpur.

Káriká, Kárígar, iron-smiths and artificers generally.

Káriótnt, a section of the Kamár sub-caste of Dósáds in Behar.
Karirá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Karjáhá, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwás in Behar.

Karjhušiá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kárji, a title of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Kárkádá, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesí sept of Halwás in Behar.

Karkosa, cow, a totemistic sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Karkusá, a bird, a totemistic section of Lohárs and Mahilís in Chota Nagpur.

Karma, a tree, a totemistic sept of Mundás and Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Karmahe-Majhaurá, a mul of the Bátsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Karmáhe Ahpur, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Karmahe-Tarauni, a mul of the Bátsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Karmahe-Naruár, a mul of the Bátsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Karmahe-Behat, a mul of the Bátsa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Karni, a small and degraded caste of weavers in Eastern Bengal, whose claim to kinship with the Tántíis is repudiated by the latter. Karnís are met with in the western thánas of the Dacca district, along the left bank of the Padma river, but are more numerous in Farídpur and Pábna. They have three gotras—Bharadwásí, Alíman, and Kasayá—which appear to have been borrowed from the Brahmanical system. Vaishnavism is the religion of the majority; Saivism of the minority. Their priests are Barns Brahmans, who serve them alone.
The Karni are exclusively engaged in weaving, agriculture and fishing being strictly forbidden. They manufacture the dhoti or waist-cloth, the gamcha, napkin or towel, as well as chequered bed-curtains (chārkha). In some eastern districts they sell betel-leaf. Napits, Dhobas, and other servants of the Nava-sakhawork for the Karni, which would hardly be the case if their origin were wholly impure.

Kārni, a mūl or section of the Chhamuliā Madhesiā sub-caste of Halwāis in Behar.

Karnwār, a sept of the Surajbansī division of Rajputs in Behar.

Karrál, a sub-caste of Chandāls, which has become degraded from carrying on the business of fishmongers. Their kinsmen neither intermarry nor hold any social intercourse with them, but the same Brahman and servants work for both. The Karrál is to the Hindu population what the Mahifarosh or Panjārī is to the Muhammadan, and men and women, though they never fish themselves, retail fish in the markets, and often make advances to fishermen. This sub-caste is more numerous in Faridpur than in Dacca, but all along the left, or Dacca, bank of the Padma small colonies are established, while inland individuals are employed as constables and messengers.

The Karrálś are all Vaishnavas in creed, and united in one gotra, the Kasyapa. They confess to a partiality for spirits, but allege that they abstain from flesh, including pork, unless when the animal has been sacrificed.

Karsá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Karsal, a sept of Goālās in Chota Nagpur.

Karsul, a section of Rautiās in Chota Nagpur.

Karthiā, a kind of dāl or grain, a section of Goālās in Chota Nagpur.

Kārtik-rāsi, a section of Mālos in Eastern Bengal.

Karuā, a sept of the Tung-jainya sub-tribe of Chakmās in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Karuah, a title of the Ghāsi caste in Singbhum.

Karunā, a title of Kāmārs in Behar.

Karunjua, a big black bird, a totemistic section of Pāns in Chota Nagpur.

Karwā, a section of Chamārs in Behar.

Karwār, a section of Dhenuārs in Chota Nagpur.

Karwat, a sub-caste of Nuniās in Behar.

Kasa, a mūl a section of the Ayodhiā sub-caste of Hajiāms in Behar.

Kasāi, a butcher. Most butchers are Mahomedans, but in Bengal low Brahmans, Kārās, and Bāgdis slaughter goats and sheep, and are known as Hindu kasdis. In Eastern Bengal Mahomedan butchers are classed as Bakri-kasai or goat-killers and Goru-kasai or cow-killers. The latter were formerly looked upon as degraded, but of late years the two groups have united and intermarry freely. All are followers of Moulavi Karamat Ali, and are very bigotted, eating with the Kuti, but declining to have anything to do with sweepers and Bediyas.

Kasarwani, a sub-caste of Baniyas in Behar, who profess to have no less than ninety-six sections, of which the following are specimens:—Sagelé Bagelé, Chanankát-Kathautiá, Laungjharájhari, Sonechanrupekedándi, Abkahilá, Cháliániá, Chausowár, Málhátiá, Sonaul, Társi, Tirusiá. A man may not marry a woman belonging to his own section, and must also observe the standard formula of prohibited degrees reckoned to the fifth generation in the descending line. The Kasarwani marry their daughters as infants, and do not recognise divorce. Polygamy, however, is permitted, without any restriction on the number of wives a man may have. A widow is allowed to marry again, and is not compelled to marry her late husband's younger brother, though it is considered a very proper thing for her to do so. By religion most of them are Vaishnavas, and they also worship Banni and Sokhá-Sambhumáth as minor or household gods. Shop-keeping is their regular occupation, and only a few have taken to agriculture. Kasarwans will not allow calves to be castrated, nor will they sell cattle to Muhammadans or to men of the Telí caste.

Kasaudhan, Kasondañan, or Kasauñan, a sub-caste of Baniyas in Behar, some of whom claim to be Bais Baniyas. The claim, however, is not generally admitted.

Kásbak, the heron, a totemistic section of Bégdis.

Kaserá, Kaserá, Thatherá, the brass-founding caste of Behar, probably an offshoot from one of the higher mercantile castes, which was separated from the parent group by adopting this special profession. The fact that the Kaserá have a well-defined set of exogamous sections and pride themselves on their purity of descent seems to indicate that the caste is a homogeneous one, and is not, like many of the functional castes, a collection of men from several different groups held together merely by the bond of a common occupation. On the distinction between the Kaserá and the cognate, but distinct, caste of Thatherá, Mr. Nesfield remarks:—"The Kaserá's

1 Brief View of the Caste System, p. 29.
speciality lies in mixing the softer metals (zinc, copper, and tin) and moulding the alloy into various shapes, such as cups, bowls, plates, etc. The Thátherá’s art consists in polishing and engraving the utensils which the Káserá supplies.”

The sections of the Káserá are shown in Appendix I. A man may not marry a woman belonging to his own section, and must also observe the rules regarding prohibited degrees which are held binding by the Káyasthí of Behar. All Káserá who can afford to do so marry their daughters as infants, but they do not appear to regard this as an absolute necessity, and in poor families it often happens that girls do not find husbands until after they have attained the age of puberty. The marriage ceremony is of the standard type. Polygamy is permitted to the extent that a man may take a second wife if his first wife is barren. A widow is allowed to marry again by the sagai ritual, which consists of smearing vermilion on the bride’s forehead. This must be done at night in a dark room. Only widows attend at the ceremony, married women deeming it unlucky to be present. No religious forms are gone through, nor is any entertainment given to the members of the caste. Divorce is not recognised.

The religion of the Káserá differs in no respect from that of other members of the middle class in Behar. For religious and ceremonial purposes they employ Brahmans, who are received on terms of equality by other members of the sacred order. They burn their dead and perform śraddh in the orthodox fashion. Their social rank is respectable,1 and Brahmans will take water from their hands. The bulk of the caste are engaged in their characteristic occupation, and only a few have taken to agriculture.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Káserá in 1872 and 1881. The figures for Thátherá are included in the former year:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>4,344</td>
<td>2,558</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>2,768</td>
<td>2,558</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>2,559</td>
<td>2,509</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>6,605</td>
<td>2,986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>1,080</td>
<td>905</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>402</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>7,558</td>
<td>4,108</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>4,774</td>
<td>2,700</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>1,080</td>
<td>905</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States States</td>
<td>5,176</td>
<td>3,404</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>781</td>
<td>719</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Iohardasag</td>
<td>2,016</td>
<td>1,139</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sinadhoom</td>
<td>620</td>
<td>154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thátherá</td>
<td>593</td>
<td>199</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1 In describing the Káserá of the North-Western Provinces, Mr. Sherring says:—“As artisans and traders, the Káserá caste occupies a high position. They are said to be above the Vaisya, or commercial caste, and to hold a place between this and the Káshtriya caste. The reasons assigned for this opinion are that the tribe in all its subdivisions is more punctilious on many matters considered to be of importance by Hindus than the Vaisya or Sudra castes usually are, and that they all wear the sacred thread.” These remarks do not appear to be applicable to the Káserá of Behar.
KÁSHIB, KÁSTHA.

Kášhib, tortoise, a totemistic section of Rautiás in Chota Nagpur.
Kášmirí, a sub-caste of Brahmans.
Kashta-Srotiyá, a hypergamous group of Kari Brahmans in Bengal.
Kási, kind of grass, a totemistic section of Rautiás, Binjhiás, Khariás, and Lohárs in Chota Nagpur; a section of Goáls and Sonárs in Behar; a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.
Kásiárn, a section of the Sát-muliá Maháyá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.
Kásiáno, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.
KÁSII, a cultivating and landholding caste peculiar to the districts of Midnapur and Balasore. It is divided into two sub-castes—Madhyasreni-Káyatth and Kástha. The former, who are as a rule wealthier and more highly esteemed than the latter, claim to be the descendants of certain legendary Káyatths who settled in Midnapur before the time of Ballá Sen, and so completely lost touch with their brethren in Bengal that even the growth of Kulinism passed them by unnoticed, and there are no Kulins among them to this day. The same tradition represents the Kásthas as the offspring of these Madhyasreni-Káyatths by women of lower castes. The theory derives some support from the analogous case of Rajput families who have settled in outlying parts of the country, lost connexion with their own people, and intermarried with the women of the land.

It is, however, equally possible, and in my opinion rather more probable, that both Madhyasreni-Káyatths and Kásthas may be the descendants of an indigenous writer-tribe like the Karans of Orissa, the wealthier members of which disowned their humbler tribesmen and sought kinship with the well-known Káyatth caste of Bengal. The fact that both Kásthas and Madhyasreni-Káyatths are in possession of very old estates seems to tell in favour of this view.

Kásthas marry their daughters as infants, condemn the remarriage of widows, and do not recognise divorce. In one point, however, both divisions of the caste, and even the despised Karans of Orissa, are greatly in advance of the Káyatths of Bengal. While they accept and act up to the sacerdotal view that untold spiritual evils will befall the man who does not get his daughters married before the age of puberty, they carefully guard against the physical dangers of the practice by forbidding the married couple to cohabit until the bride has arrived at sexual maturity. In matters of religious and ceremonial observance they are at all points orthodox Hindus. Most of them belong to the Vaishnava sect. Madhyasreni-Brahmans officiate as their priests.

Madhyasreni-Káyasths occupy much the same position in Midnapur as the Káyasths in Bengal Proper and the Karans in Orissa. Their social rank is high, and Brahmans take water from their hands. Some of them hold zemindaris and substantial tenures, while the majority are engaged in clerical pursuits. Of late years, however, they have had to compete with true Káyasths who have immigrated from Bengal and become domiciled in Midnapur. The Kásthas are for the most part cultivators, tilling their own lands, but in Balasore and the west of Midnapur a few of them are found holding estates.

Kástha, a sub-caste of Kásthas in Midnapur.

Kástogiri, a title of Baidyas in Bengal.

Kastuár, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Kástu Rishi, a section of Káibarttas in Central Bengal.

Kastwár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Kásowár, a sub-caste of Bais Baníyás in Behar.

Kasya, a gotra or section of Nepálí Brahmans.

Kásyab, Kásyap, a totemistic section of Bhars and of the Rajwar, Kumhár and Koíri castes in Chota Nagpur, the members of which will not touch, kill, or eat a tortoise; a section of Korás denoting a tortoise; a sept of Bhumíj; a section of Sonárs and Tántis in Behar.

Kásyapa, a gotra or eponymous section of Brahman denoting descent from the Vedic sage Kásyapa. It has been adopted by the following castes:—Kumhár, Tánti, Telí, Baidya, the Kasundhan sub-caste of Baníyás and the Kanaují sub-caste of Lohárs in Behar, the Subarnabanik, Sunrí, Khatri, Káyasth, Karan, Rajput, Goálá, Kaíbartta, Koohh, Kámár, Dhanuk, Barhi, Beldar, Cháin, Nuniá, Baurí, Bágdi, Baruí, Chássákohó, Bünd, Dhobi, Gandhabanik, Jugi, Kapáli, Khatwé, Khatik, Pod, Madhunápít, Máli, Mayará, Muchí, Nápit, Bábhan, Bhát, Kúrmí, Sonár, Tánti, Chásá, Kewat, Sánkhári, Suklí, Támbuli, Pachim Kuliýá Sadgop, Surahiyá, Subrádhar, Tiýar, Nágar, Pási, Chero, and Káhar. The Kumbhárs and Kurmis of Behar appear to have borrowed this section from the Brahmanas in comparatively recent times, but as it is used indiscriminately by all Kumbhárs and Kurmis of that province, it does not operate as a bar to intermarriage. In the case of Magháya Kurmis, indeed, it has been superadded to an existing series of exogamous groups (muls) based on actual descent. Some of the Magháya Kumbhárs, however, have no muls, and reckon prohibited degrees by the formula referred to in the article on Kayasth. The same remark holds good of the Behar Kurmis, with the possible exception of the Ghámela sub-caste.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>KATÁDI.</th>
<th>KATHAR.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Kátádi, a gám or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.</td>
<td>Katea, field-mouse, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Katáit, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.</td>
<td>Káteár, a section of the Sátmuliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kátáiwár-Andhrá, a mu! of the Kásyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.</td>
<td>Káteká Rakmal, a mu! or section of the Biyáhut sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kataiwár-Phet, a mu! of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.</td>
<td>Kates, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kataiwár-Malangiyá, a mu! of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.</td>
<td>Kateswár, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kataiwár-Loám, a mu! of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.</td>
<td>Katewár, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kataiwár-Maráchi, a mu! of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.</td>
<td>Kátha, a sub-caste of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kátiáiyá, a mu! or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.</td>
<td>Káthádulápura, a mu! or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kataki or Ashtagrámi, a sub-caste of Támbulis in Bengal.</td>
<td>Kathak, a sub-caste of Brahmans in Behar who rank very low, the male members of which sing and dance on ceremonial occasions in the houses of respectable people. The name Káthak, properly denoting a reciter of the Hindu sacred books, is also applied to musicians of any creed or caste who play on the violin. Dr. Wise mentions an instance of a Chhatri Káthak who went about in Dacca with a troop of Mahomedan dancing boys (Bhagtiya), and adds that none of his class would condescend to accompany Mahomedan bás or dancing girls.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Katalpurí, a section of Sonárs in Behar.</td>
<td>Kathalmalet, a section of Magháiya Kumhárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kátáni, a gáją or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.</td>
<td>Kathár, a section of Kanaujiá Lohárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Káta, kátár, a title of basket-making Doms in Behar.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kathargách, a section of Mahilis in Western Bengal.</td>
<td>Kathautiá, a section of Báb-hans and of Kanaujía Lohárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kathariá, a sept of the Rautár sub-tribe of Thárus; a section of the Bijáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.</td>
<td>Kathautiá, Katháudá, a sub-caste of Beldárs in Western Bengal.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kathautiá, a sub-caste of Dhánuks and Nágars in Behar.</td>
<td>Kathautiá, a section of Káyasths in Behar.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kathbaniyá, a sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar, who have no sections and regulate their marriages by the standard formula for reckoning prohibited degrees calculated to seven generations in the descending line. They practise infant-marriage and allow a man to take a second wife during the lifetime of the first. A widow may marry again, but is not compelled to marry her late husband’s younger brother or younger cousin. In certain exceptional cases husbands are permitted to divorce their wives with the concurrence of the pancháyat, but women so divorced may not marry again.

Most Kathbaniyás belong to the Vaishnava sect. Maithil Brahmans serve them as priests, and are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. Sokha Sambhunáth and Satnárayán are among the minor gods to whom their domestic worship is directed. They burn their dead and perform śrāddha on the thirty-first day. Shop-keeping and money-lending on a small scale are believed to be their characteristic occupations, but many of them have taken to agriculture and hold land as non-occupancy raiyats or work as landless day-labourers. Instances, however, are known of Kathbaniyás having risen to be zamindárs.

Káthej, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhesiá sub-caste of Halwáís in Behar.

Katherá, a section of the Bijáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Káthuriá, a sub-caste of Bauris in Western Bengal.

Kathwáit, a kul or section of Bábhans in Behar.

Katiá, a class of Hindu weavers in Western Bengal.

Katiáin, a section of Báb-hans in Behar.

Kátiár, a totemistic section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Oriissa, the members of which pierce the ears of their boys at the Dharma pujá. They have the further peculiarity that they will not use cloth made of tasar silk.

Kátichá, a thar or sept of Sunuwárs in Darjiling.

Kati-chiore, a section of Ká-mis in Darjiling.

Katigrámi, a gain of the Kásyapa gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Katki-káét, a synonym for Karan in Oriissa.

Kátki Phulbaria, a mul or section of the Sátmuliá or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.
Katnia, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Katosía, a section of Lohárs in Behar.

Kátrás, a sub-tribe of Bhuiyáns in Manbhum.

Katri, subject to fits, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Katriár, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar.

Katsáiá, a mü or section of the Kamarkalla sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Katsarwá, a section of the Biyábut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Kattahwa, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Katur, a sept of Pators in Chota Nagpur.

Katur, a section of Awadhiá Hajjáms in Behar.

Káturate, a sub-caste of Tántias in Bengal.

Káturi, a gán or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.

Káturiá, a wood-cutter, a sub-caste of Suträdhars in Daoca.

The name usually denotes an occupation, not a caste. In Bengal Káturiá are mostly Kaibarttas or Bágdis, and in Chota Nagpur they are generally Dhángars or members of one of the Dravidian races.

Katwál, an honorific title of Kotáls, who are chaukidárs or simándárs.

Katwár, a section of Rajwárs in Western Bengal.

Kátyáyan, a section of Brahmans.

Kauá, crow, a totemistic sept of Lohárs, Mundás, Oraons, Parhaiyás, and Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kátyá, an up-country trader.

See Kání.

Kaukdaintsa, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kaulika, a synonym for Sákta, q.v.

Kaundil or Kaundin, a gotra or section of Bábhans in Behar, borrowed from the Brahmanical system and superadded to the original exogamous groups (kula) characteristic of the caste. A section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Kaundilya, a section of Brahmans; an eponymous section of Khandáits in Orissa.

Kaundilya-Kausik, a section of the Uttar-Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kaundinya, tiger, a totemistic section of Jagannáthi Kumhárs in Orissa.

Rktr, a caste of Jashpur, Udaipur, Sarguja, and other Tributary States of Chota Nagpur, who claim to be descended from the Kauravas or sons of Kuru, whose war with the Pándavas is described in the Mahábhárata. Colonel Dalton speaks of them as a dark, coarse-featured, broad-nosed, wide-mouthed and thick-lipped race, and the fact that some of their sections are totemistic seems to lend support to the view that they are of Dravidian origin. Kaurs are divided into five sub-castes—Cháuti, Charwa, Dúdh-Kaur, Paikárá and Rathiyá. The Dúdh-Kaur follow Hindu doctrine and have Brahman priests. The Paikárá are also orthodox, but rank slightly below the Dúdh Kaur. The Rathiyé rear and eat fowls, have no Brahmans, and employ the village barber as their priest, while some of them also keep a Baiga to propitiate the forest gods.

Kauras forbid marriage within the section, and observe much the same prohibited degrees as the Hindus, except that they allow a man to marry his maternal uncle's daughter. Infant-marriage is in vogue, sindurdrum is reckoned the essential portion of the marriage ceremony, and those sub-castes who have Brahmans as priests employ them at marriages. A widow may marry again, and is expected to marry her late husband's younger brother if one survives. Failing a brother, she may marry an outsider. In the case of a widow no priest is employed: the husband applies vermillion to her forehead with his own hand and the marriage is complete. Divorce is allowed with the sanction of the panchayat or caste council, and divorced women may marry again. Colonel Dalton mentions that the Kauras of Sarguja at one time encouraged widows to become Satis, and describes the shrine of a Kaur Sati who was at the time of his visit the principal object of worship near Jilmilli in Sarguja. Every year a fowl was sacrificed to her, and very third year a black goat; whereas Hindu offerings at Sati shrines are strictly confined to fruit and flowers. Probably the family of the Sati in question were land-holding Kauras who affected to be orthodox Hindus, and aspired in course of time to transform themselves into Rajputs.

Generally speaking, Kauras regard themselves as Hindus and look upon Káli Mái as the goddess whom they are more especially bound to worship. But, except for marriages, they do not employ Brahmans as priests. They bury the dead. On the third day the chief mourner gets himself shaved, and on the tenth and eleventh days funeral cakes are offered and a feast given to the relatives.

Most Kauras are common cultivators, a few hold farms of villages, and some are in possession of the clearing tenures known as Kókar and Khunt-Kätti.

Kaur, a title of Karangás.

Kaurá, a sub-caste of Doms in Bengal who breed pigs and act as scavengers.

Kausalya, a Brahmanical section of Khatris.

Kausár, a múl or section of the Tinmuliá Madhesía sub-caste of Halwáis in Behar.

Kausiká, a gotra or eponymous section of Brahmans, Baidyás, and Káyastha in Bengal, and of Bábhans, and the Chandrabansí and Surajbansí divisions of Rajputs in Behar.

Kausikár, a pur or section of Sákadwípi Brahmans in Behar.

Kausónjhiá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Kauštav, a section of Brahmanas.

Kautásasa, a section of the Bhatta Misra sub-caste of Utkal Brahmans and of Karans in Orissa.

Kauwá, a sept of Dhimáls in the Darjiling Terai.

Kaviráj, a title of Baidyás and some other Hindu families.

Kawál, a title of Kaibarttas.
KAWALI, Kalcah, Káwilí, a caste of musicians, who were originally Kapális, but having adopted a different occupation were compelled to enrol themselves in a new caste. In Dacca they preserve a tradition that they are the offspring of a Káyasth father and a Dhibin, or washerwoman, and the Sudra servants work for them, as they also do for the Kapális. The Káwilís all belong to one gotra, the Aliman. They have no surnames, but several honorary titles, such as Dhálí, Mála, Háldár, and Mánjhi, and the most respectful term by which to address them is Vidyádhara, a name given to the dancers in Indra's heaven.

The Káwilí plays on any instrument taught him by his ustád, sardár, or teacher. When young he is apprenticed to a master, whose credit depends on the proficiency of his pupil. Youths are also taught to dance, and it is said that the purohit does not disdain to join in a dance or to take a part in a theatrical play. The Káwilí will not play in the house of any caste who has not the services of the Sudra Nápit and Dhibá, and refuses to attend at the homes of the Muhammadan Dái or Hajjam. They have no objections, however, to play in concert with the Nar, Rishí, or Hajjam. The dancing girls to whom they usually play are either Muhammadans (bál), or Chandális; but widows belonging to any caste, even to the Bráhman, are often found with them.

The great annual festival of the Káwilís is the Sri Panchami, in honour of Sarasvatí; but its observance is not allowed to interfere with their professional engagements, and they as readily accept employment on that day as on any other. The Káwilís are all Vaishnavas, and are hired by Hindu villagers to sing the religious hymns called Hari San-kirtan.

They observe the sraddhá and saasthi ceremony on the same days as the Kapálí and Sudras generally.

KAWÁNI, a class of Banías.

Káwar, a title of Chhatris in Nepal; a hypergamous group of Kaibarttas in Bakarganj.

Kawnriá, a sort of newt, a totemistic sept of Mundas.

Káwot, the Behar equivalent of Kewat, g.c.

Kawwá dardáha, janawwir piprá, a formula or shibboleth denoting a dhi or local section distinguished by the shibboleth quoted above has formed itself within the original pangat. Any considerable increase of these dhis would probably convert the pangat into an endogamous group.

Kawuí, a class of Mahomedan singers and dancers.

Káyál, a title of Pods in Bengal.

Kayál, Keál, Koyál, a weighman, a petty broker, a negociator of the prices of grain between sellers and buyers. In Patna and South-East Behar the word denotes the person who weighs the grain when produce rent is collected on the system of batai khari'hâni or division on the threshing-floor. In Bengal rents are rarely paid in kind, and the Kayâts enumerated in the Census were probably weighmen in municipal markets and small village hâts.
KAYAL. 438 KAYASTHA.

Kâyastha, Kâet, Kait, Kâyath, Kâya, the writer-caste of Bengal Proper, a numerous and influential body, whose traditional origin has been the subject of much controversy. No mention of the caste occurs in Manu, and the Kâyasâths themselves reject the theory which gives them for an ancestor the Karan, the son of a Vaisya father by a Sudra mother. The earliest reference to the Kâyasâths as a distinct caste occurs in Yajnavalkya, who describes them as writers and village accountants, very exacting in their demands from the cultivators. In the Padma and Bhabishya Purânas the Kâyasâths are made out to be the children of Chitrâgupta, the supreme recorder of men's virtues and vices, who sprang from the body (kâya) of Brahma, and this was the first Kâyastha. The Skanda Purâna gives them a more distinguished ancestry. It tells how Parasu Râma's efforts to exterminate the Kshatriya race were time after time defeated by the birth of sons to the Kshatriya women whom he spared when their husbands were killed. Determined to clear the earth of the obnoxious tribe, he resolved to show mercy no longer, even to women in their pregnancy. In fulfillment of this vow he pursued the widow of the Kshatriya Raja Chandra Sen into the hermitage of Dalabhya Rishi, where she had taken refuge, and demanded that she should be given up to him. But Dalabhya begged the life of the child in the Rani's womb, and his request was granted by Parasu Rama on the condition that the child should be called Kâyastha and should be brought up to follow the ritual of the Sudras, and not that of the twice-born castes. On this showing the Kâyasâths are by birth Kshatriyas of full blood, but by reason of their following the ceremonies of the Sudras they are called Vrâtya or incomplete Kshatriyas. The faint suggestion of inferiority which this term implies seems on the whole to be borne out by the position assigned in the Mricchhakatikâ to the Kâyasâtha who sits with the Judge as assessor in the trial described in the ninth act of the play. He is charged with the ministerial duty of recording evidence under the orders of the Judge, and he, like the other assessor, Sreshthi, speaks Prakrit, while the Judge and the principal defendant use the more dignified Sanskrit. From the Mricchhakatikâ we pass on to the more recent and more popular opinion that the forefathers of the Bengal Kâyasâths came from Kanauj with the five Brahmins whom King Adisura summoned to perform for him certain Vedic ceremonies. Around this tradition a bitter controversy has raged between the Kâyasâths, who sought to exalt their social status, and members of other castes who refused to admit their claims. One party alleged that the five Kâyasâths—Makaranda Ghosh, Dasaratha Vasu, Kalidâsa Mitra, Dasaratha Guha, and Purushottama Datta—came to Bengal as the menial servants of the five Brahmanas. Their social standing therefore could have been no higher than that of the Kahârs, who in Upper India at the present day discharge personal services for members of the higher castes. The Kāyasthas for their part repudiated this view as derogatory to their dignity, and some of them went so far as to argue that the five Kāyasthas of the tradition were political officers in charge as Kshatriyas, of a mission from Kanauj to the King of Bengal, and that the five Brahmans played quite a subordinate part in the transaction, if indeed they were anything more than the cooks of the five Kāyasthas.

An ingenious grammatical argument, based on the names of the two sets of immigrants, is brought forward in support of this view.

Putting tradition aside, and looking on the one hand to the physical type of the Kāyasthas and on the other to their remarkable intellectual attainments, it would seem that their claim to Aryan descent cannot be wholly rejected, though all attempts to lay down their genealogy precisely must necessarily be futile. It appears to be at least a plausible conjecture that they were a functional group, developed within the Aryan community, in response to the demand for an official and literary class, which must in course of time have arisen. This class would naturally have been recruited more largely from the peaceful Vaisyas and Sudras than from the warlike Kshatriyas, while the Brahmans would probably have held aloof from it altogether. It is possible, though I put forward the suggestion with much diffidence, that the tradition describing the Kāyasthas as the offspring of a Vaisya and a Sudrāni may be merely an archaic method of saying that the writer caste was composed of elements drawn from the two lower grades of Aryan society. This view of the origin of the Kayasthas is entitled to whatever support it may derive from the statement of some of my correspondents, that even in recent times instances have occurred of members of other castes gaining admission into the Kāyasth community. Some of these statements are curiously precise and specific. It is said, for example, that a few years ago many Magh families of Chittagong settled in the western districts of Bengal assumed the designation of Kāyasth, and were allowed to intermarry with true Kāyasth families. An extreme case is cited in which the descendants of a Tibetan missionary have somehow found their way into the caste, and are now recognised as high class Kāyasthas. Another story tells how a certain Uriya Gošlā, bearing the name Datta, which is one of the distinctive hypergamous titles of the Kāyasthas, took service with a Kāyasth family in Calcutta, where his principal duty was to boil the milk to be offered to certain idols. This man's sons grew up and were educated with the sons of the house, and were recently admitted as Kāyasthas of the Datta group and of the Kaiyapa gotra. Alongside of these instances, derived from inquiries in Western Bengal, we may set the statement of Dr. Wise that in the eastern districts of Bengal there exist a very numerous body called Ghulām, or slave, Kāyasths, and also known as Shikdār, or Bhāndārī. The Ghulām Kāyasths are descended from individuals belonging to clean Sudra castes who sold themselves, or were sold, as slaves to Kāyasth masters. It is stoutly denied that any one belonging to an unclean tribe was ever purchased as a slave, yet it is hard to believe that this never occurred. The physique of the low and impure races has always been better than that of the pure; and on account of their poverty and low standing a slave could at any time be more easily purchased from amongst them. However this may be, it is an undoubted fact that any Ghulám Kāyasth could, and can even at the present day, if rich and provident, raise himself by intermarriage as high as the Madhālya grade, and obtain admission among the Bhadra-lok, or gentry of his countrymen. Datta being a Madhālya title, it will be observed that this is precisely the position to which in the instance quoted above the descendants of an Uriya Gaolá are said to have attained.

The Bengal Kāyasths are divided into four sub-castes: (1) Uttar-Rārhi, (2) Dakshin-Rārhi, (3) Bārendra, (4) Bangaja. These groups are in theory endogamous, but within the last few years marriages have occasionally taken place between members of the Dakshin-Rārhi and Bangaja sub-castes. The Uttar Rārhi are met with in the districts of Birbhum, Bardwan, Murhededebad, parts of Bangpur, Dinajpur, Hugli, and Jessore. The Dakshin-Rārhi are massed in Bardwan, Hugli, Midnapur, 24-Parganas, Jessore, Kishnagar, and parts of Bakarganj, while in Dakoa only two families reside. The Bangaja are established in Bakarganj, Jessore, 24-Parganas, Dakoa, Faridpur, western part of Maimansinh, eastern part of Pabna, and in several villages of the Bogra district. The Bārendra are settled in Rajeshahya, Pabna, Maldah, Bogra, Dinajpur, as well as here and there throughout Faridpur, Jessore, and Kishnagar.

Within each of the sub-castes we find a series of three hypergamous groups, each comprising so many family names. These are given in tabular form in the Appendix. The rules governing the intermarriage of these groups differ in several material points from those in force among the Brahmans.

Ballal Sen is said to have divided the Kāyasths into four sub-castes according to locality, thus:—Uttar-Rārhi, Dakshin-Rārhi, Bangaja and Bārendra. He selected eight members from each kūl of the Dakshin-Rārhis in order to create samajas or hypergamous groups, e.g., eight each from the three families of Ghosh, Basu and Mitra, out of which two were made Kulin and six were made Bansaj. Prabhākār of the Akná group and Nisapati of the Bālī group represented the Ghosh family; Sukti of the Bāgánda group and Mukti of the Māhinagar group represented the Basu family; while Dhuin of the Bārisā group and Guīn of the Tek group represented the Mitra family. Thus according to the rules of Ballal Sen only these six men were made Kulin; the rest were made Bansaj, i.e., born of the Kulin family. The following are the names of the Bansaj groups:—Amreswar, Dirghānga, Karāti, Sākhālā, Khānī, and Sānkrali of the Ghosh family; Nimārkā, Sāthuli, Chitrapur, Dirghānga, Gohari and Panchamuli of the Basu family; Dābarakupi, Chāndarā, Denti Chāklāi, Kumārhatta and Bālī groups form the Mitra family.

The members of the Guha family lived in Eastern Bengal, where their ancestor, Dāsaratha Guha, was ranked as a Kulin, but those who had been incorporated after Ballál's grouping into the Dakshin-Báthi sub-caste were reckoned as Mauliks.

Those Káyasthas who had been living at that time in Eastern Bengal, including Datta and Guha, were classed as Mauliks, out of which eight families—De, Datta, Kar, Pálit, Sen, Sinha, Dás, and Guha were Siddha Mauliks, and the remaining seventy-two families beginning with Hora were classed as Sádhya Mauliks. Formerly ten out of seventy-two families of Sádhya Mauliks used to intermarry with the Kulins, but afterwards 16 families became connected with the Kulins by intermarriage. The names of the sixteen families are—Pál, Nág, Arnáb, Som, Rudrá, Adityá, Aích, Ráhá, Bhanja, Hora, Teja, Brahma, Bishnu, Nandi, Rakshit and Chandra.

The kuls of Káyasthas are of nine sorts, out of which five are known as mul or original and four as sákhá or branch.
Following the order of social estimation, the mul Kuls are Mukhya, Kanishtha, Sharabhrátá or Chhabháyá, Madhyánsa and Turjyák or Teyaj. The sákhás or branches are—Dwitiya-Po (the second son of Kanishtha), Chhabháyá's Dwitiya-Po (second son of Chhabháyá) Dwitiya-Po (second son of Madhyánsa), and Dojó-Po (second son of Teyaj). Kulins belong to one or other of these nine varieties.
They are further sub-divided into different grades, and they rise or fall in social estimation according to the marriage made by the eldest son and eldest daughter. If they marry into Kulin families, the reputation of their own family is secured, and the younger members may marry as they please.

Mukhya Kulins are of three kinds—Prakrita, Sahaj and Komal.
Only the eldest son of each has the right to hold that title. Their other sons will descend a step or rise in social estimation in accordance with their observance of the marriage law.

It is a great distinction for a Mukhya to observe the "Navarranga" or nine-grade kul, the rules regarding which are—The áchheí, or eldest daughter of a Mukhya, should be given in marriage to a Mukhya; the dochheí, or second, to a Kanishtha; the teckheí or third, to a Chhabháyá; the clauchheí, or fourth, to a Madhyánsa; and the panchomí, or fifth, to a Teyaj Kulin. Conversely, the eldest son of a Mukhya should be given in marriage to a Mukhya girl, the second to a Kanishtha girl, the third to a Madhyánsa girl, and the fourth to a Teyaj girl. The Mukhya who observes these rules of marrying and giving in marriage earns the title of Navarangi.

"Pancharanga" kul is observed in the following manner:—The first son of a Kanishtha Kulin ought to marry the dochheí or second daughter of a Mukhya; the second son that of a Madhyánsa girl; the third son that of a Teyaj girl. The Kanishtha Kulin who observes these rules is held in honour by his fellows and is called Pancharangi.

The following general rules are to be observed by all Kulins Káyasthas, though some of them apply to other castes as well:—

A Kulin loses his kul by marrying or giving in marriage outside the parjyá or generation to which he himself belongs, counting from the first advent of Kayasthas in Bengal. Whoever does so becomes a Maulik. A Kulins loses his kul by marrying a randa or daughter of a man having no male issue, or if he should by accident marry a sva gotra or svapinda. An adopted son of a Kulins is not a Kulins. Though he has the privileges of a son in other respects, he has no such privilege as regards kul. He will simply remain a Bansaj. A Kulins by marrying the daughter of a Kulins of a lower degree descends to the level of the latter. For instance, if a Mukhya man marries a Madhyansa girl, he becomes a Madhyansa. Again, if a Tejaj man marries a girl of Madhyansa’s Dwitiya-Po, he becomes Dwitiya-Po of Madhyansa. A man should not give in marriage his daughters one after another to Kulinsof the same degree. For instance, if the first daughter is given to a Mukhya, it is not proper that the dochher or second daughter be given to another Mukhya. In that case both the giver and taker become degraded.

Subject to the exceptions noted above, the religious practice of the Kayasths does not differ materially from that of the highest Hindu castes in Bengal. It is a singular fact that while the teaching of Chaitanya has united almost all the artisan and agricultural castes in a common faith, the three highest and most intelligent castes in Bengal adhere as a rule to the Sakti ritual. In Eastern Bengal all Kulins Kayasths, and something like three-fourths of the other divisions, are believed to practise Saktism, and it is said that a large proportion of these celebrate the Ramachari Akhar or Chakra ceremonies. For the fulfilment of domestic religious duties every Kulins family has a private temple, or sacred nook, where a Siva-linga is erected and daily worship performed by the head of the household. All Kayasths observe the Sri Panchami, or “Dawat Pujia,” on the fifth of the waxing moon in Magh (January-February). This festival is held in honour of Saraswati, the goddess of learning, who is regarded by the Kayasths as their patron deity. On this day the courts and all offices are closed, as no Hindu penman will use pen and ink, or any writing instrument, except a pencil, on that day. When work is resumed a new inkstand and pen must be used, and the penman must write nothing until he has several times transcribed the name of the goddess Durga, with which all letters should begin. Kayasths are expected to spend the holiday in meditating on the goddess Saraswati after they have observed certain religious rites; but the extent to which this obligation is observed depends largely upon the inclinations of the individual. On this day, says Dr. Wise, the Kayasth must taste of a hilsa fish, whatever its price, while from the Sri Panchami festival in January to the Vijaya Dasami in September or October fish must be eaten daily; but from the last to the first month it must not be touched. This curious custom, probably founded on some hygiene superstition, is often reversed by Bengali Kayasths.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kayasths in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>53,208</td>
<td>32,069</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>75,016</td>
<td>57,168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>11,576</td>
<td>20,578</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>74,504</td>
<td>66,772</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>8,519</td>
<td>4,923</td>
<td>Chittagong Hill Tracts</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>188</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>101,968</td>
<td>29,178</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>28,232</td>
<td>30,504</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>35,728</td>
<td>15,340</td>
<td>Ghaziabad</td>
<td>42,670</td>
<td>49,094</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Es-Parganas</td>
<td>82,903</td>
<td>37,334</td>
<td>Murshidpur</td>
<td>70,084</td>
<td>45,134</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>30,710</td>
<td>40,780</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>50,640</td>
<td>62,611</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>47,586</td>
<td>61,065</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td></td>
<td>36,085</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>34,547</td>
<td>35,411</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshabazar</td>
<td>17,077</td>
<td>15,565</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>30,468</td>
<td>23,044</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>4,253</td>
<td>6,024</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>17,170</td>
<td>31,610</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahi</td>
<td>3,777</td>
<td>8,273</td>
<td>Parnish</td>
<td>11,833</td>
<td>13,701</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranagpur</td>
<td>10,397</td>
<td>11,440</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>4,801</td>
<td>4,656</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boga</td>
<td>5,485</td>
<td>3,759</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>5,940</td>
<td>7,839</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>35,350</td>
<td>24,620</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>5,332</td>
<td>6,643</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>408</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>1,194</td>
<td>2,333</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpur</td>
<td>337</td>
<td>375</td>
<td>Baisara</td>
<td>3,571</td>
<td>1,277</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,206</td>
<td>2,123</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>396</td>
<td>1,017</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>102,084</td>
<td>99,900</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>6,300</td>
<td>9,313</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faridpur</td>
<td>57,785</td>
<td>91,180</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>4,961</td>
<td>6,690</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>115,164</td>
<td>97,314</td>
<td>Singhabazar</td>
<td>911</td>
<td>966</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansingh</td>
<td>105,337</td>
<td>106,409</td>
<td>Mansbhum</td>
<td>7,991</td>
<td>6,696</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>68,916</td>
<td>72,070</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The statement includes the Kayasths of Behar and the Karans of Orissa which form the subject of separate articles. It would be impossible to distinguish the statistics relating to these three groups.

Kāpasia, Kāth, Lala, the writer-caste of Behar, who trace their mythical parentage to Chitrāgūpta, the scribe or recorder of Yama, the regent of the dead, and pique themselves on being wholly distinct from the Kayasths of Bengal. The physical characters of the Behar Kayasths afford some ground for the belief that they may be of tolerably pure Aryan descent, though the group is doubtless a functional one recruited from all grades of the Aryan community. Kayasths themselves hand down a tradition that their progenitor Chitrāgūpta was produced from the inner consciousness of Bṛahma for the purpose of managing the business affairs and keeping the accounts of the other castes, and each of the twelve sub-castes traces its pedigree back to some member of his family. Chitrāgūpta himself and all his sons and grandsons are said to have been invested with the sacred thread marking the twice-born castes, and Kayasths claim to have, and occasionally to exercise, the right to wear this sacred symbol. The sub-castes are the following:—(1) Aithānā, (2) Ṭarmasha, (3) Bālānik, (4) Bhatnāgar, (5) Gaur, (6) Kāran, (7) Kulsrashta, (8) Mathur, (9) Nigam, (10) Saksena, (11) Sribāstab, (12) Surajdwaj. Of these the Aithānā are supposed to come from Jaunpur in the North-Western Provinces. The Ṭarmasha may possibly, as Mr. Crooke suggests, be the modern representatives of the Ambastha tribe said

1 Ethnographical Handbook, p. 106.
to be descended from a Brahman father and Vaisya mother. They, like the Karans, also in theory a mixed group, born of a Sudra woman by a Vaisya father, are found in large numbers in Gya, Patna and Tirhut. The Balmik or Vâlmiki sub-caste are supposed to have come from Guzerat. Mr. Crooke thinks they may perhaps have taken their name from the author of the Râmâyana. Karans, Amahtas and Sribastab will smoke in the same hooka, but will not eat kachchi food together. The two former, however, will eat kachchi that has been cooked by a Bâbhan. Nigam (derived by the same authority from the Sanskrit nîgama, meaning the veda, a town, road, traffic) are not met with in Behar. The Surajdwaj group—the word means having the sun for emblem—are said to be descended from the Brahman Mâdhava Nâl and Kâm Kândla, a dancing girl of Vikramáditya’s Court. The Mâthur, Saksena, Bhatnâgar and Sribastab sub-castes claim descent from the first wife of Chitrâgupta, said to have been a daughter of the Surajbansri caste. The names appear to have reference to localities—the first to Mathura, Saksena to the ruined town of Sankissa in Farukhabad, Bhatnâgar to Bhtner, and Sribastab either to Srinagar, the traditional place of origin of the sub-caste or to Srivatas, an epithet of Vishnu, who is their favourite object of worship. The Khare and Dure subdivisions of the Sribastab sub-caste trace their origin to the grandsons of Chitrâgupta. According to Buchanan, the Khare Sribastab claim to be higher than the ordinary Sribastabs, and call themselves Pâure. The two subdivisions do not intermarry or eat and drink together. Similar subdivisions are found in the Saksena sub-caste. Contrary to the common usage of Hindus, Káyasths of the Mâthur, Bhatnâgar and Saksena groups eat even kachchi meals fully dressed. The Gaur Káyasths believe that they derive their name from Gaur, the ancient capital of Bengal, and allege that the Sen kings of Bengal were really Gaur Káyasths. A curious story is told about the Gaur and Bhatnâgar sub-castes which is worth quoting as an illustration of the growth of mythical traditions of that type. The Bhatnâgar Káyasths, it is said, came to Bengal at the time of the Mahomedan conquest, and finding the Gaur Káyasths settled there, asked to be admitted to eat and drink with them. The Gaur Káyasths agreed to invite the Bhatnâgars to their houses for food, but declined to accept their hospitality in return. After a time the Bhatnâgars, who had friends at court, began to put pressure on the Gours in order to compel them to accept their invitations, and the latter fled to Delhi to lay their case before the Emperor Balban. Meanwhile Balban died, and the Bhatnâgars prevailed upon his successor to order some of the Gaur Káyasths to be arrested and compelled to eat with their rivals. To avoid this dishonour the rest of the sub-caste took refuge with the Brahmans of Badaon, who passed them off as members of their own caste, and went so far as to eat with them in support of their allegation. For doing this the Brahmans were turned out of their caste, and became the family priests of the Gaur

1 Crooke op. cit. p. 105.
2 Eastern India, ii, 466.
Kāyasths. After a time the Gaur Kāyasths who had been forced to eat with the Bhatnagar were admitted on the intercession of the Badaon Brahmans to communion of food with their brethren. For the purpose of marriage, however, they were formed into a separate group under the name of Shamali or Northern Gaur. Traditions of this sort are not uncommon, and it is to be regretted that no means exist of testing their historical value. Their most singular feature is the conspicuous part alleged to have been played by the ruling power, whether Hindu or Mahomedan, in determining purely social questions. A caste is now regarded as an autocratic body, whose decisions on questions concerning its own members no one would dream of questioning. This does not seem to have been the view taken by the earlier rulers of Bengal, and the further back we go, the more frequent and pronounced do such instances of interference become.

Besides the regular Lāla-Kāyasths included in the twelve sub-castes enumerated above, people calling themselves Kāyasths are found working as tailors in the Sewên subdivision of Saran, and some of the vermilion-selling Sindurias, who formerly acted as inoculators and now have turned vaccinators, claim to belong to this caste. The Lāla-Kāyasths disown all connexion with these groups. There is, however, nothing prima facie improbable in the hypothesis that a certain number of Kāyasths may have adopted the profession of tailors or vaccinators, and may thus have become separated from the main body of the caste. Nothing is more common than to find even a slight departure from the traditional occupation of a caste becoming the occasion for the formation of a new endogamous group. Signs of a tendency in this direction may be traced in the fact that many Kāyasths object to marry their daughters in the family of those who have served as hereditary patwāris or village accountants. "Patwāris," says one of my correspondents, "however rich, are regarded as socially lower than other Kāyasths, e.g., Kanungo, Akhauri, Pānde, or Bakshi."

The system of exogamy practised by the Kāyasths of Behar is shown in detail in Appendix I, and needs only brief explanation here. An examination of the names of the sections will show that intermarriage is really regulated by a number of kuls or exogamous sections, mostly of the territorial or titular type, and that the Brahmanical gotras, though recognised in theory, are really ineffective. Thus the Sribāstab Kāyasths reckon among their sections the Brahmanical gotra Kasyapa; but this is the only section of the Brahmanical type that they possess. All Sribāstabs belong to the Kasyapa gotra and thus of necessity violate the primary rule of exogamy upon which the gotra system depends. Although the Brahmanical gotra is disregarded, the rule of exogamy is carefully observed in relation to the kul. Thus members of the Akhauri kul believe themselves to be descended from an ancestor holding the title of Akhauri, conferred many generations ago. Their original habitat was Churāmanpur in Shahabad, and the full designation of the kul is Churāmanpur ke Akhauri. The meaning of the term Akhauri is uncertain. Some say it is a corruption of Lakhauri, owner of a lakh of rupees. In further illustration of this system of using titles as the designations of exogamous groups and expanding or eking them out by prefixing the name of a village, the following kuls of the Sribástabs may be mentioned:—Amaundha ke Páuore; Dibhia Koth ke Páuore; Mithabel ke Tewári; Morar ke Bakshi, Ráí or Thakur; Batááa ke Misir; Hargáon ke Singh; Patar ke Tewári; Parsarma ke Thákur; Sahuli ke Sahuliár. The last appears to be of the local or territorial type. All kuls are strictly exogamous. Only the father's kul is excluded in marriage. The system is supplemented by a table of prohibited degrees calculated in the manner described in the article on Brahman.

All Kayasths who can afford to do so marry their daughters as infants, but the scarcity of husbands is greatly complained of, and daughters of poor Kayasth families frequently remain unmarried up to the age of eighteen or nineteen. When a girl is married before puberty, she lives with her own people apart from her husband until she has attained sexual maturity. Connubial relations cannot commence until the ceremony of duragaman, or bringing the bride home, has been performed. This may take place one, three, five or seven years (numero Deus impare gaudet) after the marriage according to the age of the bride. When a girl is married after puberty, this ceremony is added to the regular ritual, and the girl goes to live with her husband at once or at latest after a year. Widows may not marry again; nor is divorce recognised.

Among the Kayasths, as among the other high castes of Behar, the balance of the sexes seems to be uneven, and the number of girls marriageable at a given time is usually in excess of the number of possible husbands available for them. The first step therefore towards initiating proposals for marriage is taken by the parents or guardians of the bride who depute a Brahman (generally the purohit, or priest of the family) and the family barber to find out a suitable bridegroom. These emissaries select several suitable boys and report accordingly. Among Kayasths no marriage can take place unless the horoscopes of both the bride and bridegroom 'agree,' as the phrase goes, that is to say, unless from the dates of the births of both the girl and the boy it can be calculated by astrological methods that the bride will not become a widow, and that the marriage will prove fruitful and happy in every respect. If the two horoscopes do not 'agree,' the negotiations are broken off. In order to comply with these conditions, the Brahman who acts as go-between carries with him a copy of the bride's horoscope, takes copies of those of all the eligible boys, and reports to his employer on the prospects of each possible combination. Here it is that difficulties begin. Highly educated as the Kayasths are, they have not yet shaken off the trammels of astrology, and the custom of insisting on the 'agreement' of the horoscopes has such a strong hold upon their minds that it often proves the chief obstacle to a marriage desirable in other respects. Owing to this cause the marriage of the girls is delayed in many cases till long after they attain puberty, and the consequence is that the bride is often older than the bridegroom. In order to get their daughters married, parents are obliged to give them to bridegrooms of unequal age, doubtful education and character, and of unequal position and wealth. This practice, though often preventing the marriage of the girl in her infancy, turns out undesirable in many respects. Other difficulties arise from the exorbitant demand of tilak and jākes (dowry) by the parents of the bridegroom, which leads to unequal marriages and brings about the ruin of families unfortunate enough to have a number of girls to be married.

After the gunamā has been made out to the satisfaction of both parties, and it has been ascertained that there are no objections to the marriage on the ground of consanguinity, etc., the question of bridegroom price and dowry (tilak, jāhes or dān pan) is settled. This is too often exorbitant. If the terms are agreeable to the bride's parents, the marriage is at once agreed upon. In many cases the bride's parents depend wholly on the discretion of the Brahman and Hajjām in the selection of the bridegroom, and these either to save themselves trouble or in collusion with the parents of undesirable bridegrooms are said to make selections which the bride's family would not approve if they knew all the facts. The bridegroom's relations on the other hand are equally in the dark regarding the qualifications of the bride, and it thus happens that girls suffering from actual physical defects are enabled to obtain husbands by the collusion of the match-makers.

The following observances make up the marriage ceremony as celebrated by orthodox Kayasths of Behar:—

(1) When the marriage is agreed upon, a day is fixed for the betrothal or the taking of sagun. On that day the Brahman and Hajjām go to the bridegroom's house, where the latter's friends assemble at an auspicious time. His parents put rupees, rice, haldi and supari in a thāli before them, and the Brahman takes from this his fee at the rate of five per cent. on the amount of tilak and jāhes agreed upon. If therefore the dowry be settled at Rs. 500, he will take out Rs. 25. Sometimes the bride's party pay cash as earnest money instead of taking the sagun. This is called bardekhī, literally meaning the seeing of the bridegroom. It is also called barchheka, as a retaining fee is paid in advance in order to secure the bridegroom.

(2) After this the date for the tilak or the payment of the first instalment of the dowry is fixed. On that day a party, consisting of Brahmins and others and often a relative of the bride, about seven in all, proceed to the house of the bridegroom. He is adorned and made to sit in the angan or inner courtyard, where the gods are worshipped, after which the bride's party put a tilak or patch of curd on his forehead, and make a present to him of money, plates and clothes, amounting in all to the sum agreed upon to be paid at this time. This ceremony is called tilak. The bride's parents make a profit over the plates and cloth, which they estimate sometimes at double their value, thus reducing the actual cash payment agreed upon. It is for this reason that some astute guardians insist upon the payment of a certain amount in cash before giving the sagun, and if the money is not paid at the time of tilak, disagreements between the parties continue till after the celebration of the marriage. After the ceremony the bride's party, together with the friends of the bridegroom's family, receive pakki food. Before the tilak neither the Brahman nor the Hajjam would even drink water at the bridegroom's house.

(3) On the following day the tilak party returns, being presented with dresses and money by the bridegroom's father according to his means. The latter at the same time addresses a letter to the bride's father, fixing an auspicious date for the marriage. This is called lagnapatri. If convenient to him, he agrees to it, otherwise some other date agreeable to both parties is fixed. After the tilak the betrothal becomes complete, and an engagement thus ratified is rarely broken off.

(4) On the eighth, fifth, and in some families on the third day before the marriage the ceremony variously known according to its date as dithmangrā, panchmangrā or tinmangrā, is performed. On that day the women troop out singing to fetch earth from some field outside the village, and put it in the courtyard where all the family gods and dead ancestors are invited to attend. This ceremony is performed at the houses of both parties. On an auspicious day the mandap, a sort of thatched canopy supported on nine new bamboos, is erected at the house of the bride's father. In the centre is placed an earthen vessel (kalse) supposed to contain water from all Hindu places of pilgrimage. Under this mandap and near the kalse, where all the family gods and ancestors are invited by mantras to be present and witness the marriage, the marriage ceremonies are subsequently performed. No mandap is erected at the bridegroom's house, but only a haris or plough shaft is set up in the angan, courtyard, and a kalsa similar to the bride's is placed beside it.

(5) Then the ceremony of hardikahandan takes place. Turmeric with oil is applied to the persons of the bride and bridegroom at their respective houses at stated times daily up to the day of marriage. This ceremony is not performed at the bridegroom's house when he is married a second time.

(6) Matrik Pujah—Is the ceremony of worshipping the wives of all the gods, i.e., Sakti in all her forms. The gods are also invited to be present and worshipped. The women of the family invoke the spirits of departed ancestors, and pindas are offered to them.

(7) Ceremonies in propitiation of dead ancestors (abhyudāik śrāddhā) are also performed by the parents of the bride and the bridegroom at their respective houses on the day of the marriage.

(8) Dwār Pujah.—After performing the matrik pujah the women bathe the bridegroom and smear him with turmeric, and he eats with some unmarried boys his last meal as a bachelor. He is then dressed and made to sit on the lap of his mother, who drinks water which he has tasted. His brother also assists in this ceremony. After some other observances the bridegroom's party go in procession to the bride's house with as much show and noise as the means of the family permit, timing their journey so as to arrive after dark.

On arrival, and after their formal reception, the bridegroom is presented with money. This is called dwār pujah, the homage done to the bridegroom at the door of his father-in-law's house. After it the bridegroom's party proceed to the place (janwāsa) prepared for their temporary reception.
(9). Ashuch parichhalan.—After the procession has gone to the jänwäsā, the ceremony of cutting the nails of the bride takes place. At the same time a drop of blood is drawn from her little finger, and preserved in mahawar (cotton soaked in red dye). Her feet are also marked with mahawar.

(10) Bar Newatran or Dhurchkak.—A party of the bride’s relatives, Brahmans and others taking some sherbet, eatables, tobacco, etc., go to the jänwäsā and present them to the bridegroom’s party. The bridegroom is formally invited to dinner with a present of money, which his father accepts. But owing to the exorbitant demands of money and grain generally made by the bridegroom’s father, which the bride’s father cannot always meet, this dinner seldom comes off before noon on the following day. Thus the food prepared is wasted, and the bridegroom’s party remain unfed. Sometimes the bride’s father in order to make up for the high tilak he had to pay in order to secure the bridegroom tries to cut down the amount of jahes agreed upon, and also doles out the raasad or supplies to the bridegroom’s party very sparingly. The bridegroom’s father, on the other hand, tries to get as much as he can out of the arrangement.

(11) Kanya Nirechhan, seeing the bride.—After the invitation to dinner has been accepted, the elder brother or some other elder relative of the bridegroom proceeds to the house of the bride’s father; the bride is made to sit under the mandap, and the bridegroom’s brother going there presents to her jewels and clothes, after which she returns to the inner apartments and is dressed in those clothes and ornaments. By this time the bridegroom is also brought to the place.

(12) The bridegroom’s feet are washed by the bride’s father, and (13) he is given a wooden seat (Pidhā) and a Kusāsān or pad of Kusa grass to sit on. All these ceremonies are performed according to Vedic prescription.

(14) His feet are again washed after taking his seat (Padañjali and Hast Argha).

(15) Then dahi, honey and ghī and sugar (madhuparka) are given him to eat by the bride’s father. The bride also is brought and made to sit on his right side on a similar wooden seat.

(16) Agnisthitāpan, or the placing of the fire before them, is duly performed.

(17) Gotranchara, or the ceremony of transferring the bride into the family of bridegroom by reciting the names of the father and grandfather of each with vedic mantras, is performed, and the bride and bridegroom’s clothes are knotted together. By this ceremony the bride gives up all claims on her father’s family and is transferred to that of the bridegroom.

(18) Kanyādān or pānigrahān, by which the bride’s father puts her hand into that of the bridegroom and entrusts her to his care, while he in turn accepts the offer.

(19) Then the bridegroom changes his dress (bastra bandhan), and puts on a ahoti given by the bride’s father.

(20) Next in order hom is performed by throwing ghī and sugar on the sacred fire in homage to all the Hindu gods.
(21) Ladhu or Lade Medan.—Unhusked and parched paddy brought by both parties is mixed together. The bride and bridegroom go seven times round the sacred fire, which stands in the centre of the mandap, taking care to keep it always on their right hand. The bride puts her hands into those of the bridegroom, holding at the same time a small supli or basket for cleaning grain. Into this supli the bride's brother pours out the lade, which the bride and the bridegroom jointly pour on to the fire. This offering is said to be made to a toothless god, named Pukha.

(22) Silarohan (Sapta Bedi).—The bride puts her foot on a sil, the stone used for grinding spices, and the bridegroom removes it. Both parties call the gods to witness that they have accepted each other as husband and wife.

(23) Sumangli Karan or Sendur bandhan.—The bridegroom smears vermilion on the bride's forehead. This form is now regarded merely as a token and memorial of the married state. Clearly, however, as has been pointed out in the article on Kurmi and elsewhere in these volumes, it is a survival of mixing the blood of the parties or drinking each other's blood which is found among the marriage customs of more primitive races.

(24) Dauchina shankalp.—The bride's father promises in a form authorised by the scriptures to pay a price for the bridegroom. The tilak and janes, it appears, are not sanctioned by the Shastras.

(25) Kudat mantra pathan.—The bridegroom formally confers his blessing on the bride's father for the presents he has made to him.

(26) Ashuch Karan.—It has been mentioned above (No. 9, ashuch parichhalan) that a piece of coloured cotton containing a little of the bride's blood is kept. With this the bridegroom's neck is touched, and the bride's neck is also touched with a piece of simple coloured cotton brought by the bridegroom. The pieces of cotton are tied on their wrists (kangan bandhan). It is believed that this practice generates mutual affection. Clearly it is a survival of the earlier rite already referred to.

(27) Pith Paritechan. The couple exchange seats, and the bridegroom swears to protect and love his wife, and the bride swears to obey, respect and love her husband.

(28) After this the priest tells them that they have become girhasta and should live like married people, and explains to them their duties.

(29) Ashirbad.—The Brahmans and all present bless the bride and the bridegroom, and throw rice (achhat) over them. This ends the Vedic rites necessary to make a marriage binding. Neither the bridegroom nor the bride understand what is said, and in most cases the Brahmans recite even those parts which the parties to the marriage ought to pronounce themselves.

After the final blessing all the men present retire, leaving the bride and bridegroom under the mandap. Then the women come and do chumavan, i.e., touch the feet, knee, and shoulders of the bridegroom with their fingers, at the same time holding rice in their hands. They are then taken into the kohbar, or the room prepared for their reception. There the women perform their own peculiar ceremonies, playing at the same time various tricks on the bridegroom till daybreak when he returns to the janewsā. Then the marriage party is invited to dinner, or rather breakfast, which, as stated above, seldom comes before noon. At this time a present of plates, etc., is made to the bridegroom, and his relatives, all of which counts towards the amount of jahes agreed upon. At night, or rather next morning, comes a repast of kachchi food, after which the bridegroom's party prepares for return. Before leaving, each of the relatives of the bridegroom makes presents of money and ornaments to the bride. This is called madhoa or muhdekhai, and at the same time all the relatives of the bride meet those of the bridegroom, and each of the former makes a present of money when embracing the latter. Attar, pān, etc., are distributed. The party returns to the janewsā followed by the bride's people, who supply them with provisions for return journey. Thus ends the marriage. On the fourth day the ceremony of chauthāri is performed. In some districts, especially in Patna, the bride accompanies the bridegroom to his house, where they jointly perform this ceremony. The bridegroom visits all the places of family worship. The family gods and all Hindu gods are worshipped, who having been invited to be present during the marriage are supposed then to take their departure to their respective abodes. After this the bride returns to her father's house. In such cases the ceremony of duragawān is performed just after the performance of the marriage rites. To complete the ceremony of duragawān, which means the going of the bride to the house of the bridegroom, only the nails of the bride are cut. Conjugal life cannot begin until this rite has been performed. In Shahabad and other places the bride does not accompany the bridegroom to his house after the marriage, and chaukthari is performed by each at their respective fathers' houses. In these cases the ceremony of duragawān is performed after one, three or five years according to the age of the bride and the convenience of the parties. The ritual observed is simple. The bridegroom goes with his friends to the bride's house. No mandap is constructed: only a kalsa is placed as in marriage. The bride and bridegroom are seated together, the gods and ancestors are worshipped, and the bride's nails are cut. Chumawān, etc., as in marriage, is performed by the women, and the bride sent to the bridegroom's house. On this occasion the bride's father gives her dresses, jewels, bed, bed-clothes, and presents to the bridegroom. Henceforth she lives with her husband and visits her parents whenever she likes.

Votaries may be found among the Kayasths of nearly all the main Hindu sects—Vaishnava, Saiva, Sākta, Kabirpanthi, Nānak-shāhī, and the like. The worship of Durga and the Saktis is believed, however, to be their favourite cult. Chitragupta, the mythical ancestor of the caste, is honoured once a year on the 17th Kartik, the festival of the dawāt pujd, with offerings of sweetmeats and money, and the symbolic worship of pen and ink, the tools of the Kayasth's trade. For the worship of the greater gods an generally for religious and ceremonial purposes, the Káyasthá employ Brahmanas, who are received on equal terms by other members of the priestly caste. As regards the ceremony of śrāddhá, the practice of the caste appears to vary. Some Káyasthá observe it on the 13th, some on the 16th, and some on the 29th day after death. The final funeral ceremony, known as bárki śrāddhá, is performed at the end of a year in the case of a father, mother, or other ascendant, but after three months for the death of a wife.

Clerical work is believed to be the original and characteristic occupation of the caste, and an illiterate Káyasth is looked upon as a creature with no proper reason for existing. Káyasth tradition, however, puts a very liberal construction on the expression clerical work, and includes in it not merely clerically pursuits of a subordinate character, but the entire business of managing the affairs of the country in the capacity of deván, sárbaraahkár, etc., to the ruling power. It is doubtless owing in some measure to this connexion with former governors that Káyasthá are now in possession of considerable zemindaris and tenures of substantial value, while comparatively few of them are to be found among the lower grades of cultivators. In the course of the cadastral survey undertaken in 1886–87 of 235 villages in chakla Nai, pargana Bissarrah, Mozafferpur, a statement was drawn up at my suggestion showing the caste of the various grades of landholders. The following table shows the number of Káyasthá in these villages possessing rights in connexion with the land and the proportion that number bears in each case to the total of the class of landholders concerned:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Occupation</th>
<th>Number of Kayasthá</th>
<th>Percentage on total of class</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Proprietors</td>
<td>673</td>
<td>13.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lákherájáirs</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>4.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thikádárs</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>3.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tenants at fixed rents</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>5.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Settled ryots</td>
<td>373</td>
<td>2.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Occupancy but not settled ryots</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>0.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Non-occupancy ryots</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>3.0</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

These figures cannot of course be taken to represent precisely the relations of Káyasthá to the land in all districts of Behar, but they are of interest as showing the strong position that a caste, having in theory no connection whatever with agriculture and affecting to despise those of its own members who serve as village accountants, has managed to win for itself in the land system of the country. There could be no better comment on the numerous proverbial sayings current in Behar which have for their subject the cunning and the acquisitiveness of the Káyasth caste.

Notwithstanding the jealousy with which their less astute neighbours regard them, the social position of the Behar Káyasthá is unquestionably a high one. Popular opinion ranks them next in order to the Bábhans and Rajputas, and like these, when they hold land as ryots, they get their homestead free of rent. All Kayasths will eat kachchi food that has been cooked by a 'good' Brahman, that is, by a Brahman who belongs to a respectable sub-caste, and whose ceremonial purity has not been affected by serving low people. The Amasht and Karan sub-castes will eat kachchi cooked by a Bābhān. None of the Kayasth sub-castes will eat kachchi food prepared by a member of another sub-caste. Sribestas, Amashtas, and Karans will sometimes eat pakki off the same plate and smoke out of the same hookah. Ordinarily speaking, Kayasths take pakki food from any caste from whose hands water can be taken. The Vaishnava members of the caste abstain from flesh and wine; but Kayasths usually eat mutton and goat's flesh, hare, game birds, and are notorious for their indulgence in strong drink.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kayasths in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>28,299</td>
<td>29,304</td>
<td>Purnish</td>
<td>11,804</td>
<td>12,738</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>40,289</td>
<td>43,089</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>6,500</td>
<td>6,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>45,407</td>
<td>46,904</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>5,940</td>
<td>7,950</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Morpurpur</td>
<td>70,372</td>
<td>70,234</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>6,300</td>
<td>9,338</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Durbhanga</td>
<td>40,000</td>
<td>40,000</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>4,000</td>
<td>4,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Karan</td>
<td>47,085</td>
<td>48,000</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>6,11</td>
<td>985</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>54,587</td>
<td>58,411</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>6,883</td>
<td>6,558</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>90,412</td>
<td>93,044</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>210</td>
<td>490</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>17,170</td>
<td>17,010</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kayat, a synonym for Darzi, q.v.

Kayan, a synonym for Kayastha.

Kechengia, a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Kekría, crab, a sub-sept of the Márndi sept of Santals.

Kelatoni, a thar or section of Nepálí Brahmans.

Keli, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Kelobo, bee, a totemistic sept of Juángs in Orissa.

Kendi, a tree, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Kendwár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kenu, fish, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Keoli, a section of the Baháñnajáti sub-caste of Khatría in Bengal.

Keond, fruit, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Keophasa, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Keora, a flower, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Keoya, a sept of Tipperahs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kephuk, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.
Kerá, plantain, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kerálaba, pumpkin, a totemistic sept of Jūangas in Orissa.

Kerketa, a bird which makes a noise like ‘ket ket,’ a totemistic sept or section of Orans, Lohárs, Korwas, Mundas, Doms, Asuras, Chamárs, Goráits, Khariás, Mabilis, Turis, and Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Kerungma, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Kerwar, a sub-sept of the Hansda sept of Santáls.

Kerwári, a sept of Pators in Chota Nagpur.

Kesarari, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kesargia, a sept of Kharwás in Chota Nagpur.

Kesariá, a totemistic section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa, the members of which will not cut or touch kesar grass.

Kesarkuni, a gáin of the Sán-dilya gotra of Ráahi Brahmans in Bengal, to which the Rájá of Nadiya belongs.

Kesaur, a mull or section of the Chhamuliá Madhési sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Kesrá, a totemistic sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur, who are forbidden to eat rahar dál.

Keswál, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Ket-Chhutár, a sub-caste of Sutradhars in the Santál Par-ganas.

Ketugrámi, a gáin of the Sá-barna gotra of Bándrendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kevala Gaura, a group of Gaura Brahmans.

Kewat, Kiot, a fishing and cultivating caste of Behar, also largely engaged in personal service among the higher classes of natives. Its origin is uncertain. Buchanan¹ thought it not improbable that the Kewats of Behar and the Kaibarttas of Bengal belonged in the earliest times to one aboriginal tribe bearing the name Kewat, and that the Sanskrit name Kaibartta might "have been adopted when Ballál Sen raised the tribe to the rank of purity." Lassen’s remarks on these two names have been quoted in the article on Kaibartta, at p. 376 above. It will be seen that he differs from the Indian grammarians in holding that Kaibarta has nothing to do with fishing, but denotes a person who follows a low occupation, and from Buchanan in thinking that Kewat or Kewat, so far from being the ‘barbarous’ name of an aboriginal tribe, is merely a popular corruption of Kaibarta.

¹ Eastern India, iii, 530.
At the present day the Kewats of Behar are divided into five sub-castes—Ajudhiabasi; Bahiawak, Bahiot or Ghibihar; Garbhait, Gorwai, or Saghar; Jathot; and Machhu. The Ajudhiabasi are believed to have immigrated in comparatively recent times from Oudh, and are engaged solely in cultivation. The Bahiawak sub-caste, called Ghibihar or ghi-eater, from a story that one of them once ate the leavings of his master, also believe that they came from Upper India, where they followed the occupation of boatmen and fishermen. In those days it is said the personal servants of the Darbhanga Raj were Kurmis; but one of them, named Biru Khawas, who had risen to be a tahsildar, dealt dishonestly with the Rajah, and owing to his treachery all the Kurmis were turned out and Kewats from the North-West Provinces established in their places. Various titles were conferred upon the Kewats, according to the offices which they held. Thus the Khawas was the Rajah's personal servant; the Bhandari had charge of the bhandar or granary, where rent paid in kind was stored; the Deredar worked in the kitchen; the Kapat looked after the Rajah's clothes; and the Kamat saw to the cultivation of his sirat or private lands. In course of time the distinction between agriculture and personal service became accentuated: the cultivators drew together into the Garbhait sub-caste, and the serving class formed the Bahiawak group. The names Ghibihar, 'ghi-eater,' and Saghari, 'vegetable-eater,' appear to indicate that supposed divergences of practice in the matter of food gave rise to the separation. The Bahiawak Kewats living in and about their employers' houses would necessarily fall under the suspicion of eating forbidden food, and this would of itself be sufficient to cut them off from their cultivating brethren. Those Kewats, on the other hand, who adhered to their original profession of boating and fishing, formed the nucleus of the Machhu sub-caste.

Infant-marriage is in full force among the Kewats, the marriageable age for boys being ordinarily from five to ten, and for girls from three to ten years of age. Curiously, it is deemed less material that the bridegroom should be older than the bride than that he should be taller. This point is of the first importance, and is ascertained by actual measurement. If the boy is shorter than the girl, or if his height is exactly the same as hers, it is believed that the union of the two would bring ill luck, and the match is at once broken off. The marriage ceremony corresponds in its main features with that described by Mr. Grierson at page 362 of Behar Peasant Life. Some points, however, seem to deserve special notice. After the first proposal has been made, the bridegroom's people pay a visit to the bride's house (ghardekhi) for the purpose of seeing the bride. This is followed by a return visit on the part of the bride's people, known as bardekhi, seeing the bridegroom. Then comes tilak, which consists in the bride's father or guardian going to the bridegroom's house with a present of money, clothes, etc., proportionate to the respective rank of the two families. If, for example, a Bahiawak Kewat employed in the family of the Mahara of Darbhanga marries the daughter of a Kewat who serves a man of inferior rank, or marries into a family of Kewats who allow their women to do menial offices in the houses of their employers, the family of higher rank claims and receives a proportionately large tilak. Tilak having been paid, a Tirhutia Brahman is called in to fix a lucky day for the marriage. On the day before the wedding, not five or eight days before, as in the case described by Mr. Grierson, the ceremony called kumram or matkorwa is performed by the relatives of both bride and bridegroom. The women of each family with their female friends go forth singing to a tank outside the village. There, after bathing the bride or bridegroom as the case may be, the mother or female guardian digs up and brings home a clod of earth. From this clod a rude fireplace is made, on which ghi is burned and paddy parched in honour of the household god on the threshold of the kitchen, where he is supposed to dwell. A goat is sacrificed at the same time. Some of the parched paddy is kept to be used in the ceremony of the following day.

On the wedding day parchkan is performed in the manner described by Mr. Grierson. For the bukud urdi or dhurchhak ceremony, noticed in paragraph 1320 of Behar Peasant Life, the Kewats substitute sirhar. The females of the bride's household, one of them bearing on her head a gharā of water, go in a body to the ianmeda, where the bridegroom's party are lodged, and assail them with abusive songs and personal ridicule. This is kept up until one of the bridegroom's friends comes out and drops some prepared betel and some money. Then the women retire; but one of them, usually the wife of one of the brothers of the bride, returns armed with a scarf, which she throws round the neck of the bridegroom and drags him away to the courtyard of the bride's house. On his arrival there he is made to walk round the marhua, scattering on the ground the paddy parched in the matkorwa ceremony of the preceding day. Both parties are then seated under the marhua. The family Brahman makes his appearance, and the religious portion of the ceremony begins, which need not be described in detail. Sindurān is believed to be its essential and binding portion. Before, however, sindurān is performed the purohit writes the names of the bride and bridegroom and their ancestors up to the third degree on two mango leaves, and binds one of these on the wrist of each. After sindurān again there follows a curious rite, called sonch, which looks as if it were a survival of the primitive form of sindurān described in the article on Kurmi. The bridal pair are taken into one of the rooms, where two dishes of boiled rice and milk are standing ready. A tiny scratch is then made on the little finger of the bridegroom's right hand and of the bride's left, and the drops of blood drawn from these are mixed with the food. Each then eats the food with which the other's blood has been mingled.

Polygamy is permitted only in the event of the first wife being barren, and in no case can a man have more than two wives. A widow may marry again by the sagai form. She is not obliged to marry her late husband's younger brother, but she may do so if she pleases, and this arrangement is usually favoured by the other members of the family. Divorce is not permitted. Adultery within the caste is atoned for by a penalty fixed by the manjan, while an intrigue with an outsider involves instant expulsion.

In religion the Kewats are orthodox Hindus, who regard Bhagavati as their special goddess. They also worship the snake god Bisahari, and some members of the caste abstain altogether from killing snakes. Maithil Brahmans officiate as their priests, and their gurus are Sannyasi ascetics. Among the minor gods, so numerous in Behar, they worship Bandi Goraiya, Nar Singh, and Kali with offerings of goats, rice, milk, sweetmeats, and various kinds of cakes. Cocks are sacrificed to Bandi alone, but these may not be slain within the house, nor may they, like the other articles mentioned, be eaten by the worshippers. Sanai Maharaj and Baba Dayal Singh, both supposed to be deified Kewats, are also reckoned among their gods.

In point of social standing Kewats occupy much the same position as Kurmis, Koiris, Dhánukas, and other members of the group of castes from whom Brahmans can take water and certain kinds of sweetmeats. Their own rules as to diet differ little from those of other orthodox Hindus, except that Bahiziwak Kewats will eat the leavings of the Brahmans, Rajputs, Bábhans, and Káyasts whom they serve, while Machhák Kewats eat fowls and indulge freely in strong drink. They will take water and sweetmeats, etc., from Goelas, Koiris, and Dhánukas, but will eat kachchi food with no other caste except Amás of good family. Most cultivating Kewats hold the position of raiyats with or without occupancy rights in the land which they till. Some few have risen to hold small zamindaris, while the poorest members of the cultivating sub-caste work as agricultural labourers.

It deserves mention that the Kewats, though properly a Behar caste, are very widely distributed in Bengal and Orissa. A colony of them, says Dr. Wise, has for centuries been settled in the city of Dacca, but no traces of them are to be found in the interior of the district. A tradition still survives that they were brought from Behar by the Mahomedan rulers of Eastern Bengal and employed as messengers and watchmen. They repudiate the idea of relationship with the Kaibarttas, although they do not object to eat or smoke with them. The Dacca Kewats have three subdivisions—Seo Rámi, Gauri or Gomrhi, and Dhun Kewat. These names, however, must be regarded rather as titles than as the designations of true sub-castes, for their members not only eat together, but intermarry just as Kewats who happen to bear different titles do in Behar. These Kewats are all included in one gotra, Kásyapa; and though domiciled in Bengal, are not excluded from caste privileges when on a visit to Behar. Owing to association with more orthodox or more bigoted people, widow-marriage has been discontinued. In Dacca the caste have relinquished fishing, and have generally adopted the occupation of fishmongers, although a few are poddárs or bankers.
The Kewat fishmonger usually makes advances to the fishermen, and finds it more profitable to buy small fish by the basket and large ones by weight than to haggle for each day’s catch. The Kewat generally brings the supply from the fishing ground himself if it is near, but a servant is sent if it is distant.

Dr. Wise remarks on the strange fact that the Dacca Kewats have become followers of the Nának Sháhi faith. Their guru is the Mahant of the Akhárá of that sect in the suburb of Shujáśátpur; their purohit a Maithil Brahman. The Kantha Brahman performs their funeral service, and attends at the śrddálka observed fifteen days after death; but he is charged with being extortionate, and with demanding more than poor Kewat families can afford.

The great annual festival of the Kewats of Dacca is the Nauámi, or ninth lunar day of Pauah (December-January), when every one visits the Akhárá, and after prayers receives Mohan Bhog, a sweetmeat specially prepared for the occasion. The Chhath, on the sixth of Kárty, is a great bathing rite observed by Kewats and all Hindu stání castes; while the Ganga Pújá, as well as the principal Hindu festivals, are kept. Sacrifices, too, are offered at the proper seasons to Bura-Buri, the androgynous village deity of Eastern Bengal, whose worship has been described at length in the article on the Chandás.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kewats in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>631</td>
<td>1,747</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>1,165</td>
<td>2,578</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>1,201</td>
<td>2,519</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhola</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>188</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>341</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murlabazar</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>338</td>
<td>366</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpaiguri</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>100</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>427</td>
<td>534</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>283</td>
<td>223</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>706</td>
<td>656</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tribut {Mouffeerpur}</td>
<td>55,572</td>
<td>45,966</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Seran</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>2,279</td>
<td>3,169</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monshyur</td>
<td>3,101</td>
<td>2,929</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>84,064</td>
<td>80,215</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnish</td>
<td>20,067</td>
<td>38,464</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maidh</td>
<td>1,119</td>
<td>1,119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>1,113</td>
<td>238</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>57,373</td>
<td>10,989</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Furt</td>
<td>27,198</td>
<td>4,885</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>34,443</td>
<td>21,311</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>31,384</td>
<td>3,744</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lohardak</td>
<td>632</td>
<td>926</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>678</td>
<td>1,073</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sinbhoom</td>
<td>1,539</td>
<td>1,671</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>692</td>
<td>1,048</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,860</td>
<td>9,371</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kháðhnu, a section of the Sátmuliá Meshayá sub-caste of Kandus in Behar.

Khadohar, tattooers; also employed as vaccinators.

Khadolía, Khadotiá, a section of Goáliá in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Khadumiá, a section of Goáliá in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Khadgaur, a muí or section of the Kanaújiá sub-caste of Sonaras in Behar.

Khairá, a small caste in Hazaribágh who grow vegetables. and other crops. They are believed to be akin to Kharwars.

Khairá, a cultivating sub-caste of Bágdis in Bengal; also a synonym for Korá.

Khaíri, a sub-tribe of Kharwars in Palámau.

Khairwál, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Khajkalian, a sub-caste of Sunris in Behar.

Khajurárk, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Khajuri, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Khálang, a section of Khambus in Darjiling.

Kháhad, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kháling, a thar or sept of Khambus in Darjiling.

Khalkho, a section of the Banodhiá and Jaiswr Kalwars in Behar.

Khálí, a sub-caste of Kalwars in Behar.

Kham, a synonym for Sherpa Bhotia of Nepal.

Khamapong, the dweller under the bar (Ficus religiosa) tree, a sept of the Phédáb sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Khámaru, a synonym for Bhuinmáli, q.v.

Khambá, a sub-tribe of Lepchas in Darjiling.

Khambey, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Khambha, fork of a tree, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Khambu, Jimdár, Ráí, one of the fighting tribes of Nepal, forming with the Limbu and Yákhi the Kiranti group who have their original home in the Kirant Des or mountainous country lying between the Dud-Kosi and Karki rivers. Like several other Nepalese tribes, the Khambu cherish a tradition that they came to Nepal from Káí or Benares. A mythical ancestor, Parubang, is still worshipped as a household deity. Khambus marry their daughters as adults, and tolerate sexual license before marriage on the understanding, rarely set at defiance, that a man shall honourably marry a girl who is pregnant by him. Men usually marry between the ages of 15 and 20, and girls between 12 and 15, but marriage is often deferred in the case of the former to 25, and of the latter to 20. The preliminary negotiations are entered upon by the bridegroom’s family, who send an emissary with two chungas or bamboo vessels of marwa beer and a piece of ham to the bride's house to ask for her hand. If her parents agree, the bridegroom follows on an auspicious day about a fortnight later, and pays the standard bride-price of Rs. 80. The wedding takes place at night. Its essential and binding portion is the payment of one rupee by the bridegroom as saimandā or earnest-money to the bride's father, the smearing of vermilion on the bride's forehead and putting a scarf round her neck. The bride-price may be paid in instalments if the bridegroom's family cannot afford to pay in a lump. A widow is allowed to marry again, but her value is held to have declined by use, and only half the usual bride-price is paid for her if she is young, and only a quarter if she has passed her first youth. Divorce is permitted for adultery; the adulterer must pay to the husband the full amount that the woman originally cost, and he can then marry her. In actual practice the marriage bond is very readily broken among the Khambus and among many other of the Nepalese tribes. Women are faithful to the men they live with while they live with them, and secret adultery is believed to be rare, but they think very little of running away with any man of their own or a cognate tribe who takes their fancy; and the state of things which prevails approaches closely to the ideal regimé of temporary unions advocated by would-be marriage reformers in Europe.

By religion Khambus are Hindus, but they have no Brahmans, and men of their own tribe, called Homé, corresponding closely to the Bijuas employed by the Tibetans, serve them as priests. Their special god is the ancestral deity Parubang, who is worshipped in the months of March and November with the sacrifice of a pig and offerings of incense and marwa beer. Him they regard as a ghardevati or household deity, and he is held in greater honour than the unmistakably Hindu divinity Devi to whom buffaloes, goats, fowls and pigeons are occasionally sacrificed. Another of their minor gods, Sidha, is honoured with offerings of dhuba grass and milk. His origin is uncertain; but it seems to me possible that the name may be a survival of the stage of Buddhism through which the Khambus, like many other Nepalese castes, have probably passed.

The practice of the Khambus in respect to disposing of the dead varies greatly, and appears to depend mainly on the discretion of the Homé called in to supervise the operation. Both burial and cremation are resorted to on occasion, and the mourners sometimes content themselves with simply throwing the body into the nearest river. A svādāḥ ceremony of a somewhat simple character is performed once for the benefit of the deceased in the next world, and to prevent him from coming back to trouble the living. Land-owning and cultivation are believed by the Khambus to be their original and characteristic occupation, but a certain number of them adopt military service and enter Gurkha regiments under the title of Rai. A Khambu if asked to what caste he belongs will usually reply Jimdār (a corruption of zamindār) or KHAMBU.

Rai-Jimdar. A few Khambus have also taken to weaving. Their social status, so far as Nepal is concerned, is best marked by the statement that they belong to the Kiranti group, and are recognised as equals by the Limbus and Yakhas. In the matter of food they are less particular than the Hindus of the plains, for they eat pork and the domestic fowl, and indulge freely in strong drink.

Khám, a title of Máls.

Khámá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Khámthák, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Khán, a title of Rajputs and a section of Sunris in Behar; a title of the Desé sub-caste of Gandhabaniks; of Nápita and of Bágdis in Bengal; a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwára; a title of Thárus and Karangás.

Khána, a title of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Khanál, a thar or section of Nepáli Brahmans.

Khandabati, a gáin of the Sábarma votra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Khandáit, Khandáyat, a swordsman, from Uriyá khandá, 'a sword,' the generic title of the feudal militia of Orissa, the leading members of which claim to be descended from a band of pure Kshatriyas who came in as conquerors from Northern India. A good observer writes of them as follows:—"Although a numerous and well-defined body, the Khandáits do not appear to be really a distinct caste. The ancient Rájás of Orissa kept up large armées, and partitioned the lands on strictly military tenures. These armies consisted of various castes and races, the upper ranks being officered by men of good Aryan descent, while the lower ones were recruited from the low castes alike of the hills and the plains. On the establishment of a well-defined caste system such troops took their caste from their occupation, and correspond to the military class in the fourfold division in Northern India; but with this difference, that in Northern India the military class consists of an ethnical entity, whereas in Orissa the Khandáits exhibit every variety of type, from the high Aryan of good social position to the semi-aboriginal mongrel taken from the dregs of the people." In this passage, taken from the Statistical Account of Balisore District, Mr. Beames appears to regard the Khandáits as a heterogeneous group, made up at the one end of Aryan immigrants from Upper India and at the other end of recruits from a number of indigenous non-Aryan tribes.

The data now available enable us to carry the analysis a step further, and to show that the Khandáit caste is for the most part, if not entirely, composed of Bhuiyás of the southern tribe, whose true affinities have been disguised under a functional name, while their customs, their religion, and in some cases even their complexion and features, have been modified by long contact with Hindus of relatively pure Aryan descent. The evidence for this view consists of the following facts:—first, that the Khandait of the Chota Nagpur Division, who say that they immigrated from Orissa some twenty generations ago, and many of whom still speak Uriya, regulate their marriages by the totemistic sections characteristic of the Southern Bhuiyés, and call themselves Bhuiyá-Páiks; secondly, that among the numerous titles of the Khandáit in Orissa we find the very singular names Uttar, Dakhin, and Paschim-Kapát, which are assumed by the Bhuiyás of Singhbhum; thirdly, that as late as 1825 the term Bhuiyá was current as a synonym for Khandait even in Orissa, where it now seems to have fallen into disuse.

The sub-castes and sections of both Orissa and Chota Nagpur Khandáits, so far as I have been able to ascertain them, are shown in Appendix I. The relations of the subdivisions of the Bar-gohri sub-caste are rather intricate. Members of all four groups may intermarry, but the women of the Pánchsaughariá and Pandrasaughariá subdivisions, if married to men of the Dasghariá or Pánchghariá classes, are supposed to be to a certain extent degraded, and members of their own groups will not take food from their hands. So also the Das and Pánch-ghariá will eat food cooked by the Pánchsau and Pandrasau-ghariá, but the latter will not return the compliment. The Pánchsau, again, will take boiled rice, etc., from the Pandrasau-ghariá, but only the unmarried men of the former class are deemed pure enough to prepare food of this kind for members of the latter class. The whole of the Bar-gohri sub-caste profess to maintain a high standard of ceremonial propriety, and will on no account intermarry with the Chhot-ghori, who eat fowls and indulge in strong drink like their non-Aryan neighbours. The Orissa sub-castes seem to be based on the social difference between the Mahanáiik or Sresta Khandáits holding large jagir tenures, who represent the officers of the ancient feudal militia, and the rank and file of that body who now bear the name of Chásá-Khandáit, Orh-Khandáit, or Khandáit-Páik, and occupy the lower position of village chaukidárs and ordinary cultivators. Intermarriage between the two groups, though not absolutely forbidden, occurs very rarely, and they may properly be regarded sub-castes. The latter class still retain totemistic sections of the same type as are found among the Khandáits of Chota Nagpur, while the former have borrowed the Brahmanical gotras. In all cases the rule of exogamy extends only to a man’s own section, and is supplemented by a table of prohibited degrees closely corresponding to that given in the article on the Rautias. The Chásá or Orh-Khandáit sub-caste admit into their own ranks members of the Chásá caste, but this appears to be effected simply by intermarriage, and not to form the occasion of any special ceremony.

The main body of Khandáits marry their daughters after they are grown up, and the practice of infant-marriage is confined to those landholding families who pretend to be Rajputs and affect strict conformity with orthodox usage. Even among these, however, special care is taken to guard against premature consummation, and the husband is not allowed to take his wife home until she has attained the age of puberty. The ceremony is supposed to be in the Prájápatya form, referred to by Manu. The essential portions of the ritual are hātigvātri, or binding the hands of bride and bridegroom together with kusa grass, and ganthiyān, or knotting their clothes. Polygamy is permitted, and in theory at least there is no restriction on the number of wives a man may have. This luxury, however, is sparingly indulged in even by the wealthier members of the caste, and in practice few Khandáits take a second wife unless the first is barren or suffers from an incurable disease. In Chota Nagpur widows may marry again, and are bound by no conditions in their choice of a second husband, except that they must avoid the prohibited degrees binding upon them before marriage, and that they cannot marry elder brothers or elder cousins of their first husband. Marriage with the first husband's younger brother or younger cousin is allowed, and is deemed a very proper arrangement on the ground of family convenience. In Orissa the Sresta Khandáits forbid widow-marriage: in other sub-castes it is allowed on the same terms as in Chota Nagpur. Divorce may be decreed by the pancháyat on the application of the husband if a woman is convicted of unchastity, persistent disobedience, or serious misconduct. In such cases the divorced wife generally gets alimony for a year; but the more orthodox hold that she is only entitled to the jewels and property which she brought with her at marriage. All sub-castes except the Sresta Khandáits of Orissa allow a divorced wife to marry again by the sagāritual.

The majority of Khandáits follow the tenets of the Vaishnava sect, and comparatively few Sáktas or Saivas are met with among them. Their religious observances present no features of special interest. In Orissa the Sásani Brahmans, who serve them as priests, are received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order, and are deemed socially superior to the Sebak or Panda Brahmans, who minister to the spiritual necessities of the Chásá caste. Among minor gods Gramdevati in Orissa, and in Chota Nagpur the unmistakeably aboriginal deity Bar Pahár, corresponding to the Marang-Buru or great mountain of the Mundas and Santáls, are worshipped by the head of each household with offerings of goats, sweetmeats, and fruit, which are afterwards divided among the members of the family. The Orissa Khandáits profess great reverence for the sword as the symbol of their rank, and at the Dasahara festival the family weapons are solemnly cleaned and worshipped by laying flowers and fruit before them. This practice, however, seems to be merely a reflex of the common Hindu usage which leads every artificer to worship the tools of his craft, and cannot be regarded as of itself giving any clue to the tribal affinities of the caste. As a rule Khandáits burn their dead and perform a sráddh ceremony of the orthodox pattern on the eleventh day after death.

In the social system of Orissa the Sresta Khandáits rank next to the Rajputs, who are comparatively few in number and have not the intimate connexion with the land which has helped to raise the Khandéits to their present position. A Sresta Khandéit assumes the sacred thread at the time of his marriage, a practice not uncommon among castes of dubious origin, who are pressing to be counted among the number of the twice-born. The Chásá Khandéits do not wear the thread, but Brahmans will take water from their hands, and they occasionally intermarry with the Karan caste. Khandéits themselves will take cooked food only from their own Brahmans, whose leavings also they will eat. Sweetmeats and water may be given to them by Chásás, Gor-Goálás, and Karans. In Chota Nagpur Kansajuí Brahmans take water from Bar-Gohri Khándezts, but not from the Chhot-Gohri, who eat fowls, indulge freely in spirituous liquors, and generally order their lives in a fashion entirely inconsistent with the Hindu standard of ceremonial purity. Their traditions aver that shortly after their immigration from Orissa they were in possession of eight forts (éth garh) at Biru, Básia, Belsián, Dimba, Gorra, Lachrá, Lodhma, and Sonpur, and it is certain that at one time entire parganas in Chota Nagpur were held by Khandéits on terms of military service. These, however, passed out of their hands as the country settled down under British rule, and at the present day very few families retain tenures of any substantial value. The Orissa Khandéits seem to have held their ground more firmly; and it may be that our settlement of the land revenue, by recording the rights of all persons connected with the land, has enabled them to resist the modern tendency towards the resumption of ancient service grants. However this may be, the leading families of the caste still hold estates and rent-free tenures directly under Government, while the rank and file are occupancy raiyats or have small tenures in payment for their services as headmen (sarbarakhkárs) or watchmen (chaukídárs) of villages; others, again, are occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats and landless day-labourers. Khandéits who wear a sword and do not cultivate with their own hands consider themselves superior to those who are working agriculturists; but this distinction does not seem to coincide exactly with the existing division into sub-castes.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Khandéits in 1872 and 1881. In Bengal Proper the figures for Ghatwáls are included in the former year:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Hardwán</td>
<td>331</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>336</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>Pabna</td>
<td>1,910</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birthinum</td>
<td>184</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>Decca</td>
<td>288</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>797</td>
<td>1,239</td>
<td>Maimainsinh</td>
<td>353</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughil</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>325</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bowrah</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1,107</td>
<td>265,358</td>
<td>243,596</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24 Parganas</td>
<td>1,340</td>
<td></td>
<td>Maitah</td>
<td>325</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>265,358</td>
<td>243,596</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khusla</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>7,547</td>
<td>34,592</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jumoro</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>Raibáre</td>
<td>125,945</td>
<td>134,772</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murehbadar</td>
<td>1,545</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>54,574</td>
<td>80,541</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinjpur</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Lohardagá</td>
<td>326</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajahábó</td>
<td>996</td>
<td></td>
<td>Singhbún</td>
<td>2,330</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>254</td>
<td>895</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Khandáit-Paik, a sub-caste of, and a synonym for, Khandáite in the Orissa Tributary States.

Khandánia, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Khandáyat, a synonym for Khandáit.

Khandélvála, a group of the Sanádhya sub-caste of Gaura Brahmans in Behar.

Khandiwar, a sub-caste of Bais Baniyás in Behar.

Khandásap, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Khanduar, a section of Goálás in Behar.

Khandwal, a sub-caste of Goálás in Singbhum.

Khangar, a section of Mahilis in Western Bengal.

Khangar-Munda, a sub-tribe of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Khangótha, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Khangór, a synonym for Khánjar.

Kháni Khor, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Khánjar, a small caste in Behar whose women practise prostitution.

Khánná, a sept of Rajputs and a section of the Chárájáti sub-caste of Khatris in Behar.

Khánrsimriá, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Khanwár, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Kápángí, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Khapariyá, a sub-caste of Dhánukas in Behar.

Khapráhá, a section of the Biyáshut and Kharidáhá Kalwárs in Behar.

Khapur, a bird, a totemistic sept of Kharwárs in Chota Nagpur.

Khara, a hypergamous group of Karans in Orissa.

Khárdáí (Khárád, a lathe), the caste of turners in Behar chiefly employed in making and painting legs of bedsteads and toys.

Kharaít, a title of Sadgops in Bengal.

Kháraít, a mul or section of the Magháya sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Kharak, sword, a totemistic section of Rautíás in Chota Nagpur.

Kharakwár, a territorial section of Rajwárs and Rautíás in Chota Nagpur.

Kharáont, a sub-caste of Nuniás in Behar.

Kharaunre-Bhaur, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kharaunre-Khutti, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kharaunre-Gurdi, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kharaunre-Ekáná, a mul of the Sándil section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kharbháhíá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kharchwár, a sub-caste of Kurmis in Behar.

Khardáhá, a mel or hypergamous sub-group of Rárhí Brahmans in Bengal.

Kháre, an endogamous division of the Sribástab sub-caste of Káyasths in Behar.
Khargá, a section of Sunris in Behar.

Khargpur, a group of Maghahiya Telis in Behar.

Kharí, a Dravidian cultivating tribe of Chota Nagpur, classed on linguistic grounds as Kolarian. In physique the settled members of the tribe resemble the Mundas, but have rather coarser features and a figure not so well proportioned. One of their traditions alleges that they succeeded the Oraons as settlers in the country between Rohrťgarh and Patna, while another says that their original home was in Moharbhunj, of which State they and the Puráns were the first inhabitants, being born there from a pea-fowl’s egg,—the Puráns from the white, the Kharí from the shell, and the family of the chief (Bhanj) from the yolk. Thence they made their way up the valley of the Koel into the south-western corner of the Lohardaga district, where we now find them massed in tolerably large communities. Colonel Dalton endeavours to reconcile these conflicting accounts, but with no great success. In truth, legends of this kind are for the most part a highly unprofitable study. As often as not they refer to some recent migration of a comparatively small section of the tribe, and it is hopeless to expect that they should contain the clue to any really ancient history. Barbarous people like the Kharí have no means of handing down a statement of fact for any length of time. Writing is unknown to them, their language is rapidly dying out, and they have no form of poetry or modulated prose suited to the preservation of the early traditions of their race.

The Kharí of Lohardaga are divided into four sub-tribes:—Dhilki-Kharí, Dud-Kharí, Erengé-Kharí, and Munda-Kharí. The Dud-Kharia affect a leaning towards Hinduism, and do not eat beef. The Munda-Kharia are supposed to be the offspring of an intrigue with a Munda woman. This statement is in accordance with the hypergamous relations which subsist between the two tribes. Kharí speak of the Mundas as their elder brethren, and Kharí women are sometimes taken as wives by the Mundas, who, however, will on no account give their girls in marriage to the Kharí. The septs of the tribe are shown in Appendix I. All of them are totemistic, but I am informed that the usual rule making the totem taboo is not now very generally observed. It must, however, at one time have been in force, for a sept of wild Kharí whom Mr. Ball observed on the Dalma range in Manbhum had the sheep for their totem, and were not allowed to eat mutton, or even to use a woollen rug. Exogamy is regularly practised, and a man may not marry a woman of his own sept. Beyond the circle defined by the sept name, the ideas of the Kharí on the subject of consanguineous marriages are said to be lax, and on the maternal side they appear to content themselves with forbidding a man to marry his aunts, his nieces, and his first cousins. Girls are usually married after they have attained puberty, and sexual intercourse before marriage is tacitly tolerated. Of late marriage... years the richer members of the tribe have adopted the Hindu fashion of infant-marriage. The preliminary negotiations for a marriage are carried on by the parents, and a bride-price (sukmur) of from one to ten head of cattle must be paid before the day can be fixed. This must be some time in Māgh (January–February), as Khariás can only marry during that month. On the day before the wedding the bride's family escort her to the bridegroom's house, great care being taken that she does not put her foot into a running stream on the way. The bridal party establish themselves under a tree, where a place has been prepared for them. There they are met by the bridegroom's party, each side being provided with an earthen jar of water wreathed round with ears of rice and crowned with a lighted lamp. The rest of the day is spent in feasting and in songs and dances, all bearing "more directly than delicately on what is evidently considered the main object of the festivities—the public recognition of the consummation of the marriage." Early next morning the bride and bridegroom are anointed with oil and taken to bathe. Five bundles of straw are then spread on the ground, and the yoke (jūr) of a plough laid upon them. The bride and bridegroom stand facing each other on the yoke, and the bridegroom smears vermilion on the bride's forehead and the parting of her hair, while she makes a small round spot of the same colour on his forehead. This completes the marriage, and the whole party sit down under a tree to feast at the expense of the bridegroom. While the feast is going on the bride is brought before the company and is made to wash a cloth in hot water, in token, apparently, of her willingness to do any form of household work. After this she is finally handed over to the bridegroom. If the full bride-price has been paid, the bride's father is expected to provide his daughter with a trousseau of seven pieces of cloth, and to give one ox to his son-in-law within a month after marriage.

A widow may marry again by the sagai form, which consists of the bridegroom presenting her with a new cloth. If her husband leaves a brother younger than himself, the widow is expected to marry him, but is not compelled to do so. It may indeed be inferred, from the fact that one head of cattle is the customary bride-price for a widow, that she frequently does marry outside of her late husband's family. Divorce is permitted on the ground of adultery, in which case the wife's family are required to give back the cattle which they received as the bride-price. A divorced woman may marry again, and her customary market value is stated to be two head of cattle.

Inheritance.

The Dud-Khariás profess to be guided in matters of inheritance and succession by the principles of the Mitákshará. This, however, is mere pretence, for they, like the rest of the tribe, follow a customary law of their own, administered by a pancháyat or council of elders, at which the tribal priest usually presides. The chief features of Khariá custom, so far as I have been able to ascertain them, may be summarised as follows. Sons inherit to the exclusion of all other heirs; but the eldest son gets two shares more than any of his brothers, and on him is supposed to rest the obligation of providing for the maintenance of the daughters. In dividing property a distinction is drawn between sons by a bhāḍi wife, married by the full ceremony, and sons by a sagai wife, who may have been a widow or a divorced woman. Thus, supposing a man dies leaving two sons by a bhāḍi and two by a sagai wife, and the property to be divided consists of sixteen kancas of rice land, the land would be divided into two lots, one containing twelve kancas and the other four. The elder of the two bhāḍi sons would get seven kancas, and the younger five kancas; while the sagai sons would get two kancas apiece. Brothers and uncles exclude widows and daughters.

1 Dalton, Ethnology of Bengal, p. 160.

The religion of the Khariás may be defined as a mixture of animism and nature-worship, in which the former element on the whole predominates. As the nominal head of their system we find Bar Pahār, to whom buffaloes, rams, and cocks are offered at uncertain intervals. He seems to be a faineant sort of deity, who brings neither good nor ill-fortune to men, and is not in charge of any special department of human affairs. He has no Kharia name, and it is possible that the practice of worshipping him may have been borrowed from the Mundas and Oraons. The working deities of the Kharia pantheon are the following:—(1) Dorho Dubo, who delights in muddy places and takes care of the dārhib or springs of water, which are a notable feature in the Lohardagá district. Pigs, goats, and red fowls are the offerings set apart for him. (2) Nasán Dubo, the god of destruction, who scatters death and disease abroad, and must be propitiated with sacrifices of five chickens. (3) Giring Dubo, the sun, whom Colonel Dalton mentions under the name of Bero, adding that "every head of a family should during his lifetime make not less than five sacrifices to this divinity; the first of fowls, the second of a pig, third of a white goat, fourth of a ram, and fifth of a buffalo. He is then considered sufficiently propitiated for this generation, and regarded as an ungrateful god if he does not behave handsomely to his votary. In praying to Bero they address him as 'Parameswar,' the Hindi word for God. The Ho term 'Sing bonga' they do not know. The sacrifices are always made in front of an ant hill, which is used as an altar. This peculiar mode of sacrificing has fallen into desuetude among the Hos and Mundas; but on my making some enquiries on the subject from old men of those tribes, I was informed that it was orthodox, though not now generally practised." (4) Jyolo Dubo, the moon—offering, a black cock. (5) Pát Dubo, a god who loves rocky places—offering, a grey goat or reddish-brown fowls. (6) Donga Dárhéi, a hill god—offering, a white goat. (7) Mahádán, another hill god, to whom rams are sacrificed. (8) Gumi, the god who lives in the Sarmi or sacred grove, which serves as temple for most of the aboriginal deities—offering, a sow. (9) Agín Dárhé, the protector of the rice crop—offering, a white goat. (10) Kárá Sarná, the god of cattle-disease, to whom buffaloes are sacrificed on the occasion of an outbreak.

---

1 Ethnology of Bengal, p. 159.

Khariás have not yet attained to the dignity of employing Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, but have priests of their own, called Kálo, whose office is usually hereditary. They also avail themselves of the services of the village Páhan, who is usually a Munda or an Oraon. In their funeral rites they observe a curious distinction: the bodies of married people are burned, while persons who die unmarried are buried. When cremation is resorted to, the bones and ashes of the dead are put into a new earthen vessel with some parched rice and thrown into the deepest pool of a river, or, should there be no river near, into a rocky chasm or a tank in the bhuinharí village of the deceased, that is to say, the village in which he ranks among the descendants of the original clearers. If this village cannot be traced, the ashes may be thrown into any tank that is near, only in that case a feast must be given to the bhuinharí of the village, and a sithá of rice presented to the landlord. The relations and friends of the deceased are entertained at a feast, and a slab of unhewn stone is set up near his house, before which daily oblations are supposed to be offered in order to appease his spirit and avert the danger of his returning to trouble the living.

The settled Khariás are fair cultivators, and in the south-west of Lohardagá, where they are fairly numerous, many of them claim to be bhuiharí, holders of korkar tenures, and occupancy raiyats. In other parts of the district they are mostly tenants-at-will and farm-labourers. The wild Khariás who frequent the Dalmá range in Manbhum and the forest-clad hills of Gangpur and other Tributary States know no other mode of agriculture than the barbarous jhum or dâhá system, which consists in burning down a patch of jungle and sowing bajrá, birí, or kodo in the ashes between the stumps of the trees. They are said to be not over-fastidious feeders, eating monkeys and various kinds of small animals and cattle which have been killed by wild beasts or have died from disease. The settled Khariás have much the same notions as the Mundas on the subject, but the Dud-Khariá sub-tribe, as has been mentioned above, profess to abstain from beef, and eat kachchí only with men of their own tribe. “Some Khariás,” says Colonel Dalton, “profess to be intensely exclusive in regard to cooking and eating. This characteristic I found most developed in villages of Chota Nagpur, where Khariás were associated with Oraons under Brahman proprietors; and it is a common saying in that part of the country that every Khariá must have his hariah, i.e., cooking pot. He may not allow even his wife to cook for him, and if a stranger enters a house in which he keeps his earthen drinking and cooking vessels and water pots, every vessel is polluted, and the whole are destroyed or thrown away. This class of Khariás are specially filthy in their habits, and it is not improbable that Hindus may have been more than ordinarily harsh in excluding them from their kitchens and inner apartments, and that the Khariás retaliate by outcasting everybody.”
The foregoing paragraphs treat for the most part only of the settled agricultural Kharias of the Lohardaga district, a people who are respectably dressed, comfortably housed, and well supplied with wholesome food. Some of them hold landed tenures of appreciable value, and there are signs of a tendency among them towards the adoption of Hinduism—a step which, whenever taken, will speedily obliterate all traces of primitive usage. Even now there is little left to show that they come of the same stock as the wild Kharias who inhabit the crests of the highest ranges in Manbhum, Singhbhum, and the Tributary States of Chota Nagpur and Orissa, and are shunned even by the Hos and Bhumij on account of their reputation as wizards. These wandering savages, like the Birhors of Hazaribagh and Palamau, who Colonel Dalton supposes may belong to the same tribe, are now believed to be rapidly dying out, and very few Europeans have had the opportunity of seeing them in their homes. No apology therefore is needed for quoting Mr. V. Ball's description of the Kharias whom he met with on the Dalmá range in Manbhum during the cold weather of 1866-67:

"The Kharias show a marked dislike for civilization, constantly leaving places where they have any reason for supposing that they are overlooked. Their houses, generally not more than two or three together, are situated on the sides or tops of the highest hills; they stand in small clearances, a wretched crop of bejra being sown between the fallen and charred trunks of trees.

Close to the south boundary of Manbhum there are a succession of hill ranges, of which Dalmá (3,407 feet), the rival of Parasnáth, is the highest point. On this hill I saw three or four neat little Kharia cottages, made of wattled bamboo, which, together with the small standing crop, had for no apparent reason been deserted. Further west, just outside the boundary of Manbhum, on a plateau formed of trap, where there was a good water-supply, the small Kharia villages had assumed a somewhat permanent appearance. Occasionally Kharia cottages are to be seen on the outskirts of villages, but this is a departure from what is one of the most characteristic customs of the race.

The first Kharias I met with were encamped in the jungle at the foot of some hills. The hut was rudely made of a few sál branches, its occupants being one man, an old and two young women, besides three or four children. At the time of my visit they were taking their morning meal; and as they regarded my presence with the utmost indifference, without even turning round or ceasing from their occupations, I remained for some time watching them. They had evidently recently captured some small animal, but what it was, as they had already eaten the skin, I could not ascertain. As I looked on, the old woman distributed to the others, on plates of sál leaves, what appeared to be the entrails of the animal, and, wrapping up her own portion between a couple of leaves, threw it on the fire in order to give it a very primitive cooking. With regard to their ordinary food, the Kharias chiefly depend upon the jungle for a supply of fruits, leaves, and roots. I got them to collect for me specimens of the principal species they used.” The list of edible plants will be found in full in the Statistical Account of Hasaribágh (vol. xvi). “Besides these, however, the Kharias eat rice, which they obtain in the villages in exchange for several jungle products, such as honey, lac, dhuná, tasar cocoons, sal leaves, and bundles of bamboo slips, called khurki, wherewith the leaves are stitched into plates. That the rice which they thus obtain, though small in quantity, is an important element in their daily food, seems apparent from the fact that a large number of them are said to have died in the famine. I can only explain this by supposing that they lost heart on being deprived of what had been a regular source of supply, and failed to exert themselves in the collection of an extra quantity of roots. An explanation somewhat similar to this was given to me by a Santél, who said, speaking of his own race, that those who underwent the labour of searching the jungles escaped, while those who sat in their houses wishing for better times died. The roots are dug up with considerable labour from the rocky ground, by means of an instrument called khunti—an iron spike firmly fixed in a wooden handle. The point of this, as it is natural it should be, frequently becomes blunted. To avoid the necessity of taking it to be sharpened, perhaps half a dozen miles to the nearest Kámár, the Kharias have invented for themselves a forge, the blast of which is produced by a pair of bellows of the most primitive construction. They consist of a pair of conical caps about eighteen inches high, which are made of leaves stitched together with grass. These are firmly fixed down upon the hollows in the ground, whence a pair of bamboo nozzles conveys the blast produced by alternate and sudden elevations and depressions of the caps to a heap of ignited charcoal. In this the iron spikes are heated until they become sufficiently soft to be hammered to a point by a stone used as a hammer on a stone anvil.

---

1 Jungle Life in India, p. 89 ff.

“The Kharias never make iron themselves, but are altogether dependent on the neighbouring básárs for their supplies. Had they at any period possessed a knowledge of the art of making iron, conservative of their customs as such races are, it is scarcely likely that they would have forgotten it. It is therefore not unreasonable to suppose that there was a period anterior to the advent of the Hindus when iron was quite unknown to them,—when, owing to the absence of cultivation in the plains, they were even more dependent on the supply of jungle food than they are at present. In those times their axes and their implements for grubbing up roots were in all probability made of stone, and their arrows had tips made of the same material.

“In their persons the Kharias are very dirty, seldom, if ever, washing themselves. Their features are decidedly of a low character, not unlike the Bhumij, but there seemed to me to be an absence of any strongly-marked type in their faces or build, such as enables one to know a Santél, and even a Kurmi, at a glance.”
The following statements show the number and distribution of Kharias in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>1,926</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>721</td>
<td>731</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>17,959</td>
<td>511</td>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>3,945</td>
<td>8,404</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>221</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States, Orissa</td>
<td>72</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>2,360</td>
<td>3,543</td>
<td>Hazardibagh</td>
<td>75</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>170</td>
<td>1,574</td>
<td>Lohardagh</td>
<td>4,916</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24 Parganas</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>564</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>2,505</td>
<td>8,651</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>518</td>
<td>26,074</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Khariá-Munda, a sub-tribe of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Khariá-Oraon, a sub-tribe of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Khariá, a section of Mahilis in Western Bengal.

Khariát, a sub-caste of Binds in Behar.

Khariidahá, a sub-caste of Kalwás in Behar.

Kharihi, a title of Goáldás in Behar.

Khariápára, a sub-caste of Subtradhars in Western Bengal.

Kharkábáyu, a section of Kámis in Darjeeling.

Khárwá, Khérvá, a Dravidian cultivating and landholding tribe of Chota Nagpur and Southern Behar, regarding whose origin there has been much discussion. Speaking of the Kharwás of Shahébéd, Buchanan says that great confusion prevails concerning them, because in different places they have adopted the precepts of Hinduism in different degrees. The social position of the tribe also varies greatly. Some are found amongst the labouring classes bearing burdens and carrying palanquins, some have attained positions as land-owners, lording it over Brahmans and Rajputs, their raiyats, whilst others occupy the table-land unmixed with any other tribe, and there is little reason, no doubt, that they are its original inhabitants. These, he observes, have retained the features by which the aboriginal tribes of the Vindhyán mountains are distinguished, but no one has met with any of the tribe who retain a trace of their original language. Some Kharwás declare their original seat to have been the fort of Rohtás, so called as having been the chosen abode of Rohitaswa, son of Harischandra, of the family of the sun. From this ancient house they also claim descent, call themselves Surjabansis, and wear the janeo or caste thread distinguishing the Rajputs. A less flattering tradition makes them out to be the offspring of a marriage between a Kshatriya man and a Bhar woman contracted in the days of King Ben, when distinctions of caste were set aside and men might marry whom they would.

The difficulty experienced by Buchanan in arriving at any conclusions regarding the true affinities of the tribe in Shahabad is well illustrated by Colonel Dalton's account of their status in Chota Nagpur:—

"The Raja and Jaspur are members of this family, who have nearly succeeded in obliterating their Turanian traits by successive intermarriages with Aryan families. The Jaspur Raja is wedded to a lady of pure Rajput blood, and, by liberal dowries, has succeeded in obtaining a similar union for three of his daughters. It is a costly ambition, but there is no doubt that the infusion of fresh blood greatly improves the Kharwar physique. The late Maharaja Sambhunath Sing, of Ramgarh, was a remarkably handsome man, sufficiently so to support his pretensions to be a true child of the sun; but according to the traditions and annals of his own family his ancestors must have been very low in the social scale when they first came to Ramgarh. They are descended from the younger of two brothers who, generations ago, came as adventurers and took service under the Maharaja of Chutia Nagpur. The elder obtained Ramgarh as a fief on his doing homage to the Maharaja and receiving the 'tilak,' or mark of investiture, from that potentate's great toe. Almost all the men of ancient standing with proprietary rights in the Ramgarh estate are Kharwars. The Thakurs of Husir Saram and Babu Dalgovind of Khoyra, of Rajput lineage, have become Kharwars by marrying into the Raja's family."

In another place Colonel Dalton notices the traditional connexion between the Kharwars and the Cheros, who are said to have invaded Palamau from Rohtas and driven the Rajput Chief of the country to retire and found a new kingdom in Sargijá.

"It is said that the Palamau population then consisted of Kharwars, Gonds, Māras, Korwās, Parheya, and Kisāns. Of these the Kharwars were the people of most consideration. The Cheros conciliated them, and allowed them to remain in peaceful possession of the hill tracts bordering on Sargijá; all the Cheros of note who assisted in the expedition obtained military service grants of land, which they still retain. It is popularly asserted that at the commencement of the Chero rule in Palamau, they numbered twelve thousand families, and the Kharwars eighteen thousand, and if an individual of one or the other is asked to what tribe he belongs, he will say, not that he is a Chero or a Kharwar, but that he belongs to the twelve thousand or to the eighteen thousand, as the case may be. • • • • Intermarriages between Chero and Kharwar families have taken place. A relative of the Palamau Raja married a sister of Maninath Sing, Raja of Ramgarh, and this is amongst themselves an admission of identity of origin; as both claiming to be Rajputs they could not intermarry till it was proved to the satisfaction of the family priests that the parties belonged to the same class."
Others, again, regard the Cheros as a sub-tribe of Kharwars, but this opinion appears to have been based on observations in Southern Lohardaga, where the Cheros have gone down in the world and ceased to be of any social importance.

Colonel Dalton describes the low Kharwars as strongly resembling the Santals in feature. "They are," he says, "very dark, with pyramidal-shaped low noses, thick protuberant lips, and cheek-bones or zygomata that project so as to make the temples hollow." The landholding classes, on the other hand, have refined the type by intermarriages with higher castes, and are quite as high bred in appearance as most of the pseudo-Rajput families of Chota Nagpur and Western Bengal.

An examination of the internal structure of the tribe, which is given in Appendix I, leaves little doubt as to their Dravidian descent. Many of their septs are certainly totemistic; although the animals associated by other tribes with septs bearing the same names appear not to be deemed sacred by the Kharwars. Further research among more primitive members of the tribe may, however, show that the older ideas have not altogether died out. Special interest attaches to the fact that the Kharwars of South Lohardaga regard the khar grass as the totem of their tribe, and will not cut or injure it while growing. The adoption of the khar as a totem may of course be due merely to the consonance of names—a factor which plays an important part in the speculations of savages regarding their own descent. If, on the other hand, the case is one of genuine survival, it goes far to suggest the inference that the Kharwar tribe of the present day may be merely an enlarged totem-sept which broke off from some larger group and in course of time developed a separate organization. Instances of septs splitting up into sub-septs are by no means uncommon, and it is obvious that circumstances favouring separation might easily lead to the transformation of the original sept into a distinct tribe.

Among the endogamous divisions of the tribe the Bhogtas are the most important. They are found, says Colonel Dalton, "in the hills of Palamau skirting Sarguja, in Tori and Bhanwar Pahar of Chutiá Nagpur and other places. They have always had an indifferent reputation. The head of the clan in Palamau was a notorious freebooter, who, after having been outlawed and successfully evading every attempt to capture him, obtained a jagir on his surrendering and promising to keep the peace. He kept to his engagement and died in fair repute, but his two sons could not resist the opportunity afforded by the disturbances of 1857-58. After giving much trouble they were captured: one was hanged, the other transported for life, and the estate was confiscated." Bhogtas do not intermarry with ordinary or Deswari Kharwars, and although living side by side with them, affect to repudiate the idea of tribal relationship between the two groups. There is, however, no reason to question the accuracy of the general opinion that the Bhogtas are a branch of Khárwars who have formed themselves into an independent group.

Throughout the tribe the form of exogamy practised is the simple one that a man may not marry a woman of his own sept. Outside that circle of relationship, prohibited degrees are reckoned by the standard formula. All who can afford to do so arrange for the marriages of their children while they are still too young to choose for themselves, and adult-marriage is looked upon as a sign of poverty and social insignificance. Deswari Kharwars profess to disapprove of the practice of taking money for a daughter, but among Bhogtas and Manjhis a bride-price, ranging from Rs. 5 to Rs. 12, is regularly paid. Remnants of non-Aryan usage may be discerned in the marriage ceremony itself. Both parties must first go through the form of marriage to a mango tree, or at least to a branch of the tree; and must exchange blood mixed with sindur, although in the final and binding act sindur alone is smeared by the bridegroom upon the bride's forehead and the parting of her hair. Polygamy is permitted, but not generally practised, except in the event of failure of offspring by the first wife. The Bhogta and Manjhis sub-castes sanction the marriage of a widow, and deem it right for her to marry her late husband's younger brother. Deswari Kharwars, however, require widows to remain unmarried. Divorce is permitted if the wife is convicted of unchastity or if the couple cannot agree. Divorced women may marry again by the sagai form, which is the same as that in use among the Rautias.

In matters of inheritance Kharwars follow tribal customs of their own, and cannot be described as formal adherents of any of the recognised schools of Hindu law. The eldest son of the senior wife, even if younger than one of the sons of a second wife, inherits the entire property subject to the obligation of providing all other legitimate children. If the inheritance consists of land, the heir is expected to create separate maintenance grants in favour of his younger brothers. Daughters can never inherit, but are entitled to live in the ancestral house until they are married.

"The Kharwars," says Colonel Dalton, "observe, like the Kols, triennial sacrifices. Every three years a buffalo and other animals are offered in the sacred grove, 'sarna,' or on a rock near the village. They also have, like some of the Kols, a priest for each village, called pahn. He is always one of the impure tribes—a Bhuiya, or Kharwar, or a Parheya, and is also called baiga, and he only can offer this great sacrifice. No Brahmanical priests are allowed on these occasions to interfere. The deity honored is the tutelary god of the village, sometimes called Duár Pahár, sometimes Dharti, sometimes Purghahail or Daknai, a female, or Dura, a sylvan god, the same perhaps as the Darhá of the Kols." In Sargújá a village of Kharwars was found employing a baiga of the wild Korwa tribe to offer sacrifices in the name of the village every second year to Chindol, a male spirit, Chanda, a female spirit, and to Parvin. Buffaloes, sheep, and goats were offered to all of these. These people made no prayers to any of the Hindu gods, but when in great trouble they appealed to the sun. The apparent anomaly of their having a Korwa for their priest was explained by the belief that "the hill people, being the oldest inhabitants, are best acquainted with the habits and peculiarities of the local spirits, and are in least peril from them; besides, they are wholly pagan, whilst the people in whose behalf they make offerings, having Hindu and Brahmanical tendencies, could only offer a divided allegiance to the sylvan gods, which it might not be safe to tender.”

The main body of the tribe, and particularly those who belong to the landholding class, profess the Hindu religion, and employ Sákadwipi Brahmans as priests. Mahadeo and Sitaram are the popular deities; Gauri and Ganesh being worshipped during marriages.
In addition to these, the miscellaneous host of spirits feared by the Mundas and Oraons are still held in more or less reverence by the Kharwárs, and in Palámau members of the tribe sometimes perform the duties of pánah or village priest. Srádha is performed ten days after death, and once a year in the month of Aswin regular oblations are made for the benefit of deceased ancestors in general.

The social standing of the tribe varies greatly in different places, and seems to depend chiefly upon the hold they have on the land. This appears to be strongest among the Deswári Kharwárs. A landed proprietor of this sub-tribe will wear a jáneó and pose as a kind of Rajput; while Bhogtás, Manjhis, and the like aspire to no such distinction. Similar differences may be observed in matters of diet. Beef is forbidden to all members of the tribe; but Bhogtás, Manjhis, and Rauts eat pigs and fowls, which the Deswári regard as unclean. Kharwárs profess to take water and sweetmeats only from Brahmans, Rajputs, the higher classes of Banías, Jhoras, and Rautias. In Chota Nagpur they regard landholding as their traditional occupation;

| Occupation. | landholding as their traditional occupation; some are zamindars, many hold substantial khundredí and korkar tenures, and the rest of the tribe are raiyats with occupancy rights. Very few have sunk to the position of landless day-labourers; but many of the Bhogtás have taken up the comparatively degraded occupation of making baskets and working in bamboos.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kharwárs in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
<th>District.</th>
<th>1872.</th>
<th>1881.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>266</td>
<td>82</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>5,883</td>
<td>5,906</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Basikura</td>
<td></td>
<td>427</td>
<td>Tirhat</td>
<td>135</td>
<td>457</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>37</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>135</td>
<td>457</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinapur</td>
<td>80</td>
<td>683</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>125</td>
<td>457</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td></td>
<td>94</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>817</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>138</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>141</td>
<td>198</td>
<td>Bhangipur</td>
<td>8,019</td>
<td>9,043</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bijnajpur</td>
<td>329</td>
<td>3,098</td>
<td>Purvish</td>
<td>4,068</td>
<td>5,716</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmahé</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>Mithá</td>
<td>6,005</td>
<td>6,203</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saingpur</td>
<td>247</td>
<td>150</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>481</td>
<td>6,996</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Egra</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>22,986</td>
<td>26,010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>213</td>
<td>213</td>
<td>Lohardagar</td>
<td>67,495</td>
<td>74,335</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>Singhbhum</td>
<td>3,872</td>
<td>2,533</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimaninesh</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>Nalnubh</td>
<td>25,976</td>
<td>13,158</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chittagang</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>11,501</td>
<td>17,959</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kharwara, a sub-caste of Kahárs in Behar.

Khát, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Khátádiá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.
Khataiá, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidháá Kalwárs in Behar.

Khatait, a sept of Thárus in Behar.

Khatauri, a small cultivating and landholding caste of the Santál Parganas who claim to be Rajputs, but are believed by Mr. Oldham to be Mals, who, by virtue of being owners of landed estates, were enabled to claim a higher social position.

Kháti, a sept of the Surya-bansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar; a section of Kámis; a thar or sept of Gurungs and Mangars in Darjiling.

Khatic, a sub-caste of Khatiks in Behar.

Khatik, a cultivating and vegetable-selling caste of Behar, divided into two sub-castes—Khatik and Dharamdási. They have only one section (Kásyapa), and regulate their marriages by the standard formula, calculated to five generations in the descending line. Khatiks marry their daughters as infants, between the ages of five and twelve years. When a marriage is under consideration, the headman and panchdáyat are consulted regarding the prohibited degrees. If their opinion is favourable, mutual visits of inspection (ghar-dekhí) follow, at which presents of betel-leaves, areca nut, and sweetmeats are exchanged. After this a tilák, consisting of new clothes, brass feeding utensils, and one rupee in cash, is given to the parents of the bridegroom, and a Tírhati Brahman is called in to fix an auspicious date for the wedding. This is celebrated in the form usually followed by the lower castes, the place of the Brahman being taken by a Bairági ascetic belonging to the Khatik caste. Polygamy is not expressly recognised, but a man may take a second wife if the first is barren. Divorce is effected by the pancháyat in the manner described in the article on the Khatwe caste.

Khatiks follow the Hindu law and profess the Hindu religion as usually understood in Behar. Their minor gods are Bandi and Míra, to whom sacrifices of kids, cakes, and sweetmeats are offered on Wednesdays and afterwards eaten by the worshippers. The latter, it should be observed, is common to them and to the Khatwes, and appears to be worshipped by no other castes. Khatiks do not employ Brahmans, and Bairági members of their own caste serve them as priests.

In point of social standing Khatiks rank little higher than Musahars. Their rules as to food differ little from those of respectable middle-class Hindus, but they make no secret of their partiality for spirituous liquors.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Khatiks in 1872 and 1881. The figures of 1872 include other vegetable-selling castes, hence the discrepancy:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Muzhbadabad</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmaháys</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
<td>...</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,744</td>
<td>623</td>
<td>2,548</td>
<td>1,391</td>
<td>1,191</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>2,144</td>
<td>594</td>
<td>2,628</td>
<td>326</td>
<td>275</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Siahbad</td>
<td>3,472</td>
<td>238</td>
<td>806</td>
<td>275</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thrut (Muzhberpur)</td>
<td>19,594</td>
<td>3,264</td>
<td>330</td>
<td>60</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saran (Darbhanga)</td>
<td>17,104</td>
<td>1,289</td>
<td>1,298</td>
<td>150</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Khátimaharé, or pure Mahara, a sub-caste of Chamás in Behar. Khatkalá, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Khatiwéra, a thar of the Atri gotra of Nepálí Brahmans. Khatri, a sub-caste of Baniyás in Behar.

Khatri, a mercantile caste of the Panjáb, described by Mr. Ibbetson as superior in physique, in manliness, and in energy to the rest of the trading community of that province. Many of them have settled in Bengal and Behar, and the Maharajá of Bardwan is considered the head of the caste. The locus classicus for the Khatris is Sir George Campbell's paper on 'The Ethnology of India,' published in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal for 1866, from which I quote the following passages:—

"Trade is their main occupation, but in fact they have broader and more distinguishing features. Besides monopolising the trade of the Panjáb and the greater part of Afghanistan and doing a good deal beyond those limits, they are in the Panjáb the chief civil administrators, and have almost all literate work in their hands. So far as the Sikhs have a priesthood, they are, moreover, the priests or gurus of the Sikhs. Both Nának and Govind were, and the Sodhis and Bedis of the present day are, Khatris. Thus, then, they are in fact in the Panjáb, so far as a more energetic race will permit them, all that Mahratta Brahmans are in the Mahratta country, besides engrossing the trade, which the Mahratta Brahmans have not. They are not usually military in their character, but are quite capable of using the sword when necessary. Diwan Sáwan Mal, governor of Multán, and his notorious successor, Mulraj, and very many of Ranjit Singh's chief functionaries, were Khatris. Even under Mahomedan rulers in the west they have risen to high administrative posts. There is a record of a Khatri diwan of Badakshan or Kunduz, and, I believe, of a Khatri governor of Peshawar under the Afghans. The Emperor Akbar's famous minister, Todur Mal, was a Khatri, and a relative of that man of undoubted energy, the great commissariat contractor of Agra, Joti Parshad, lately informed me that he also is a Khatri. Altogether there can be no doubt that these Khatris are one of the most acute, energetic, and remarkable races in India, though in fact, except locally in the Panjáb, they are not much known to Europeans. The Khatris are staunch Hindus, and it is somewhat singular that while giving a religion and priests to the Sikhs, they themselves are comparatively seldom Sikhs. The Khatris are a very fine, fair, handsome race, and, as may be gathered from what I have already said, they are very generally educated.

"There is a large subordinate class of Khatris, somewhat lower, but of equal mercantile energy, called Rors or Roras. The proper Khatris of higher grade will often deny all connexion with them, or at least only admit that they have some sort of bastard kindred with Khatris; but I think there can be no doubt that they are ethnologically the same, and they are certainly mixed up with Khatris in their avocations. I shall treat the whole kindred as generically Khatris.
"Speaking of the Khatris then thus broadly, they have, as I have said, the whole trade of the Panjab and of most of Afghanistan. No village can get on without the Khatri, who keeps the accounts, does the banking business, and buys and sells the grain. They seem, too, to get on with the people better than most traders and usurers of this kind. In Afghanistan, among a rough and alien people, the Khatris are as a rule confined to the position of humble dealers, shopkeepers, and money-lenders; but in that capacity the Pathans seem to look at them as a kind of valuable animal, and a Pathan will steal another man's Khatri, not only for the sake of ransom, as is frequently done on the Peshawar and Hazara frontier, but also as he might steal a milch-cow, or as Jews might, I dare say, be carried off in the middle ages with a view to render them profitable.

"I do not know the exact limits of Khatri occupation to the west, but certainly in all Eastern Afghanistan they seem to be just as much a part of the established community as they are in the Panjab. They find their way far into Central Asia, but the further they get the more depressed and humiliating is their position. In Turkistan Vambery speaks of them with great contempt, as yellow-faced Hindus of a cowardly and sneaking character. Under Turcoman rule they could hardly be otherwise. They are the only Hindus known in Central Asia. In the Panjab they are so numerous that they cannot all be rich and mercantile, and many of them hold land, cultivate, take service, and follow various avocations.

"The Khatris are altogether excluded from Brahman Kashmir. In the hills, however, the 'Kakkas,' on the east bank of the Jahlam, are said to have been originally Khatri (they are a curiously handsome race), and in the interior of the Kangra hills there is an interesting race of fine patriarchal-looking shepherds called Gaddis, most of whom are Khatris. Khatri traders are numerous in Delhi; are found in Agra, Lucknow, and Patna; and are well known in the Bara Bazar of Calcutta, though there they are principally connected with Panjab firms.

"The Khatris do not seem, as a rule, to reach the western coast: in the Bombay market I cannot find that they have any considerable place. In Sind, however, I find in Captain Burton's book an account of a race of pretended Kshatriyas, who are really Banias of the Nanak-Sahi (Sikh) faith, and who trade and have a large share of public offices. These are evidently Khatris. Ludhiana is a large and thriving town of mercantile Khatris, with a numerous colony of Kashmiri shawl-weavers."

Khatris allege themselves to be the direct descendants of the Kshatriyas of early Indian tradition, and in support of this claim refer to the fact that they assume the sacred cord and commence the study of the Vedas at the age of eight years, as is enjoined in the sacred books, and that Sāraswat Brahmans will eat kachchi food prepared by them. Mr. Neefield thinks the claim a good one, adding that "the cause which detached the Khatri from the Chattri or Kshatriya and shut out all possibility of a return to the ancestral caste was the establishment of a marriage union between fragments or clans drawn from several different sub-castes of Kshatriyas between whom no connubial rights had hitherto existed, or from sub-castes of Kshatriyas mixed with those of Brahmans. There is much reason to believe that Brahmans as well as Kshatriyas have contributed to form the new caste of Khatri; for Brahmans of the Sáraswat sub-caste will to this day eat food cooked by Khatri, but no Brahman of any sub-caste will eat food cooked by a Kshatriya.” Mr. Ibbetson puts the question by with the remark that “the validity of the claim is as doubtful as are most other matters connected with the fourfold caste system.” It seems to me that the internal organization of the caste furnishes almost conclusive proof that they are descended from neither Brahmans nor Kshatriyas, and that the theory connecting them with the latter tribe rests upon no firmer foundation than a resemblance of name, which for all we know may be wholly accidental. Their features and complexion, indeed, entitle them to be ranked as Aryans of comparatively pure lineage, but among their numerous sections we find none of those territorial names which are characteristic of the Rajput septs. The section-names of the Khatri belong to quite a different type, and rather resemble those in vogue among the Oswals and Agarwáls. Were they descended from the same stock as the Rajputs, they must have had the same set of section-names, and it is difficult to see why they should have abandoned these for less distinguished patronymics. In addition to their own sections, they have also the standard Brahmanical gotras; but these have no influence upon marriage, and have clearly been borrowed, honoris causd, from the Sáraswat Brahmans who serve them as priests. If, then, it is at all necessary to connect the Khatri with the ancient fourfold system of castes, the only group to which we can affiliate them is the Vaisyas. This conjecture is at least in keeping with the present occupations of the caste, and gets us out of the difficulty which led Sir George Campbell to propound the doubtful theory that in the ordinary course of history the warlike conquerors of one age become the astute money-dealers of another. In truth, however, all speculations which profess to connect existing castes with the four traditional castes are on the face of things futile and misleading. We do not know enough about these primitive groups to be able to apply to their internal structure that minute analysis which alone can determine their precise tribal affinities.

The exogamous sections of the Khatri are shown in Appendix I.

Internal structure. As I have stated above, there is a double series,—one original and the other borrowed from the Brahmans. Only the original or tribal series is taken into account for the purposes of marriage. The rule is absolute that a man may not marry a woman of the same tribal section as himself; but the fact that two persons belong to the same Brahmanical gotra does not operate as a bar to intermarriage, provided that their tribal sections are different. Thus the three sections Kapur, Khanná, and Mehará all belong to the Kausalya gotra, but members of these groups intermarry freely. Apart from the section rule, prohibited degrees are reckoned on the system in vogue among the Brahmins; marriage with saptinatas, samánadakas, pitribandhus, and mátribandhus being forbidden.

The endogamous divisions of the Khatris are exceedingly obscure and complicated. "Within recent times," says Mr. Ibbetson, "there has sprung up a system of social graduation, in accordance with which certain Khatri tribes refuse to intermarry with any save a certain specified number of their fellow tribes, and the distinctions thus created have been formulated in a set of names, such as Ārḥāīghar, he who only marries into two and a half houses; Čhārzsāti, he who marries into four tribes; Čhezsāti, he who marries into six tribes; and so on. This purely artificial and social classification has obscured the original tribal divisions of the caste; for Khatris of the same tribe may be in one part of the province Chārzsātis, and in another Bārzsātis, and so forth."

In describing the Khatris of the Panjab, Mr. Ibbetson gives the following abstract:

Bunjáhi  ... )  Tribal groups.
Sarin  ...
Báhri  ...
Khokhrán ...

Ārḥāīghar  ...
Čhārzsāti  ...
Panjáti  ...
Čhezsāti  ...

Sodhi ...
Bedi ...
Kapur ...
Khanna ...
Marhotra ...
Seth ...

"The origin of the division into the four sections called Bunjáhi, Sarin, Báhri, and Khokhrán is said to be that Ala-ul-din Khilji attempted to impose widow-marriage upon the Khatris. The Western Khatris resolved to resist the innovation, and sent a deputation of 52 báwan of their members to represent their case at court; but the Eastern Khatris were afraid to sign the memorial. They were therefore called followers of Shara Ayin or the Mahomedan customs —hence Sarin; while the memorialists were called Bāwanjái, from the number of the deputation or of the clans respectively represented by the members of the deputation—hence Bunjáhi. The Khokhrán section is said to consist of the descendants of certain Khatris who joined the Khokhars in rebellion, and with whom the other Khatri families were afraid to intermarry; and the Báhri section, of the lineage of Mahr Chand, Khan Chand, and Kapur Chand, three Khatris who went to Dehli in attendance upon one of Akbar's Rajput wives, and who, thus separated from the rest of the caste, moved only within each other's families. But these are fables, for the same division into Bāhri and Bunjāhi appears among the Brahmans of the Western plains. The number of clans is enormous. The most important in point of social rank are the Marhotra or Mahra, the Khanna, the Kapur, and the Seth, the first three of which are said to be called after the names of the three men just mentioned, while Seth is a term now used for any rich banker. These four clans belong to the Bāhri section of the caste, and constitute the Dhāighar and Chārzāti divisions, which stand highest of all in the social scale. The origin of the term Dhāighar lies in the fact that the families of that division exclude not only the father's clan, but also such families of the mother's clan as are closely connected with her, and thus reduce the clans available for intermarriage to two and a half. I should say that each division will take wives from the one below it, though it will not give its daughters to it in marriage. The Bedi and Sodhi clans belong to the Bunjāhi tribe, and owe most of their influence and importance to the fact that Bābā Nānak belonged to the former, and Guru Rām Dās and Guru Hargovind to the latter. They are commonly said to be the descendants of these men, but this appears to be a mistake, the two clans dating from long before Bābā Nānak. The Sodhis played an important part during the Sikh rule. They claim descent from Sodhi Rāi, son of Kāl Rāi, King of Lahore, and the Bedis from Kālpat Rāi, brother of Kāl Rāi and King of Kasur, who being deprived of his kingdom by his nephew, studied the Vedas at Benares and was known as Vedi. The modern headquarters of the Bedis is at Dera Nānak, in Gurdaspur, where Bābā Nānak settled and died, and of the Sodhis at Anandpur, in Husysarpur, which is also the great centre of the Nihang devotees. The divisions recognised in Bengal are shown in Appendix I, where I have attempted by brief explanatory notes to clear up the confusion in which the subject is involved.

The Khatris of Bengal trace their origin to the Panjab, and the main body of them is said to have emigrated from Lahore in the reign of Aurangzib. These eastern or Purbiyā Khatris are spoken of in a somewhat slighting fashion by the Pachhainya Khatris of Upper India, and are charged with having departed from the high standard of ceremonial purity supposed to be characteristic of the caste. I do not understand that any specific allegation is made against the Bengal Khatris, and the latter appear to pique themselves on keeping the usages of their original home. But in most cases where a branch of a caste domiciled in Upper India has settled in Bengal Proper, we find that the settlers fall under the suspicion of infringing the customs of the caste and indulging in acts forbidden by the sacred texts. The Khatris are no exception to this general rule. Rightly or wrongly, the Bengal members of the caste are to a certain extent looked down upon by their brethren in Upper India, and intermarriage between the Purbiyā and Pachhaiyna groups is comparatively rare.

The relative positions of the Khatris of Bengal and the Panjab are, I believe, stated in the last paragraph as precisely as the nature of the subject permits. So far as my knowledge extends, the bulk of the Bengal Khatris endeavour to conform on the whole to the traditional usages of the Panjab branch of the caste. They look on the Panjab as the original home of their race, and in theory at least Panjab custom is the standard by which their social and domestic affairs are regulated. On the other hand, at Paikpara, in the Dacca district, and in villages around Barmi Hat on the Lakhya, Dr. Wise came across a class of Hindus calling themselves Rândá or Randak Khatri, who gave a confused account of themselves, repeating the names of Ballál Sen and Rájá Mán Singh, as if connected in some mysterious way with their settlements in Bengal and their degraded position among Hindus. Kanaújí Brahmins officiate as their purohit, and they have a Bengali Brahman for their guru. Being naturalised Bengalis, they have relinquished the names of the characteristic Khatri sections and adopted the common Sudra gotra Alyamán along with Bengali titles such as Chakravarti, Prasád, and the like. Sudras eat with them in private, but in public refuse to take water from their hands. They are employed as shopkeepers and cultivators, and some of them are talukdárs.

Khatri marry their daughters as infants and make use of the standard marriage ceremony, the binding element in which is the giving away of the bride by her father or guardian and the acceptance of the gift by the bridegroom. Polygamy is permitted, nor is there any definite limit to the number of wives a man may have. Fashion, however, is on the whole adverse to his taking more than one. On the other hand, many Khatris keep concubines of their own and other castes. The children of these women form a separate class, bearing the name Pirúzúl, and as a rule marry among themselves. Widows may not marry a second time, and divorce is not recognised.

Most Khatris belong to the Vaishnava sect, and comparatively few worshippers of Siva are found among them.

Religion.
Sáraswat or Sarasut Brahmins serve them as priests. In Eastern Bengal, says Dr. Wise, Chandiká, a form of Durgá, is the patron deity of the caste; but each gotra has its own peculiar idol. An interesting tradition connects the modern Khatris with the foundation of the Muhammadan city of Dacca. When the Khatri Rájá Mán Singh occupied Dacca in 1595 with the Mughal army, he encamped on a tract clear of jungle, ever since called Urdu. Here was found an image of Durgá, believed to have been the property of Vedabati, the divorced wife of Adisura. The image was deposited in a shrine, and under the name of Dhakeswari is still regarded as the palladium of the city. At the present day the revenue of this sanctuary is divided between several old Khatri families and the Brahmachári Mahant of the Ramná Akhár.

The majority of the Bengal Khatris are engaged in some form of trade. A few of them are zamindars and tenure-holders, and a certain number are occupancy raiyats. They never touch the plough themselves, and employ hired labourers to cultivate their lands. The Maharaja of Bardwan is the head of the caste in Bengal. Their social rank is high. All Brahmins take water from their Khatri, a pur or section of Sáraswati Brahmins in Behar.

Khatwá, Khatwá, a sub-caste of Kahárs in Behar who live by weaving and cultivation.

Khatwe, a small palanquin-bearing and cultivating caste of Behar, divided into two sub-castes—Bahio and Goro, names which appear to have reference to the original avocations of the members, though at the present day the Goro are not exclusively engaged in cultivation, nor the Bahio in carrying palanquins. They have only one section, Kásyapa, and regulate their marriage by the standard formula defining prohibited degrees, calculated to seven generations, in the descending line. Khatwés marry their daughters as infants, between the ages of five and twelve years. The marriage ceremony is of the standard Behar type. The headman of the caste (manjan) is consulted on the question of prohibited degrees, and tilak is paid to the bridegroom’s parents in the form of a present of clothes. Tirhutiá Brahmins are called in to fix an auspicious date for the wedding, but they take no part in it themselves. Polygamy is permitted to the extent that a man may take a second wife if the first is barren. Widows may marry again, and are bound by no conditions in their choice of a second husband, except that they must not infringe the rules regarding prohibited degrees. Divorce is supposed not to be recognised, but in actual practice I understand that when a woman has gone wrong

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Hardwán</td>
<td>15,630</td>
<td>5,527</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>6,628</td>
<td>6,628</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>497</td>
<td>1,328</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>1,413</td>
<td>223</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>914</td>
<td>307</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>1,968</td>
<td>3,907</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,338</td>
<td>1,288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>2,557</td>
<td>2,303</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>350</td>
<td>1,063</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>701</td>
<td>906</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>320</td>
<td>310</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P. Parganas</td>
<td>665</td>
<td>907</td>
<td>Tinsukhía</td>
<td>1,432</td>
<td>2,209</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>1,314</td>
<td>228</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>7,739</td>
<td>7,739</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khunna</td>
<td>1,165</td>
<td>156</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>450</td>
<td>450</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>373</td>
<td>374</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>678</td>
<td>678</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>578</td>
<td>670</td>
<td>Monigar</td>
<td>358</td>
<td>343</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>1,233</td>
<td>18,954</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>654</td>
<td>2,503</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Basalpara</td>
<td>226</td>
<td>238</td>
<td>Furnishur</td>
<td>736</td>
<td>1,256</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bengur</td>
<td>118</td>
<td>1,500</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>388</td>
<td>261</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>717</td>
<td>6,401</td>
<td>Santál Parganas</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Farina</td>
<td>737</td>
<td>808</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>6,286</td>
<td>6,286</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjilina</td>
<td>146</td>
<td>249</td>
<td>Furi</td>
<td>506</td>
<td>506</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalipori</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1,766</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>840</td>
<td>840</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,381</td>
<td>2,826</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>3,985</td>
<td>3,985</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deccu</td>
<td>671</td>
<td>2,769</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>850</td>
<td>850</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faraspur</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>500</td>
<td>Lohardágá</td>
<td>196</td>
<td>196</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>112</td>
<td>294</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>375</td>
<td>375</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansinh</td>
<td>941</td>
<td>2,058</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>994</td>
<td>994</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>89</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

They rank below both Rawáni and Dhimar Kahárs, and the higher castes will not take water from their hands.

Khatwá, a sub-caste of Jólasás in Behar.

The following statements show the number and distribution of the Khatris in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Hardwán</td>
<td>15,630</td>
<td>5,527</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>6,628</td>
<td>6,628</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>497</td>
<td>1,328</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>1,413</td>
<td>223</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>914</td>
<td>307</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>1,968</td>
<td>3,907</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>1,338</td>
<td>1,288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>2,557</td>
<td>2,303</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>350</td>
<td>1,063</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>701</td>
<td>906</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>320</td>
<td>310</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P. Parganas</td>
<td>665</td>
<td>907</td>
<td>Tinsukhía</td>
<td>1,432</td>
<td>2,209</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>1,314</td>
<td>228</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>7,739</td>
<td>7,739</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khunna</td>
<td>1,165</td>
<td>156</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>450</td>
<td>450</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>373</td>
<td>374</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>678</td>
<td>678</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>578</td>
<td>670</td>
<td>Monigar</td>
<td>358</td>
<td>343</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>1,233</td>
<td>18,954</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>654</td>
<td>2,503</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Basalpara</td>
<td>226</td>
<td>238</td>
<td>Furnishur</td>
<td>736</td>
<td>1,256</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bengur</td>
<td>118</td>
<td>1,500</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>388</td>
<td>261</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>717</td>
<td>6,401</td>
<td>Santál Parganas</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Farina</td>
<td>737</td>
<td>808</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>6,286</td>
<td>6,286</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjilina</td>
<td>146</td>
<td>249</td>
<td>Furi</td>
<td>506</td>
<td>506</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalipori</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1,766</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>840</td>
<td>840</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,381</td>
<td>2,826</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>3,985</td>
<td>3,985</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deccu</td>
<td>671</td>
<td>2,769</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>850</td>
<td>850</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faraspur</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>500</td>
<td>Lohardágá</td>
<td>196</td>
<td>196</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>112</td>
<td>294</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>375</td>
<td>375</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maimansinh</td>
<td>941</td>
<td>2,058</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>994</td>
<td>994</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>89</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
with a member of the caste her husband may get rid of her by solemnly abjuring her society before the headman and the panchayat, while the woman may marry again by the sagai form, provided that her previous indiscretions are duly atoned for by a fine in the form of a feast to the caste brethren. Intrigues outside the caste admit of no atonement.

In matters of religion Khatwés affect to be orthodox, and regard Bhagawati with especial reverence. They have, however, not attained to the dignity of having Brahmans of their own, and Bairagi members of their own caste serve them as priests. Their minor gods are Sasié, Káli, Dharam-ráj, Nar-Singh, and Mirá. Sheep, goats, pigeons, cakes, milk, rice, and sweetmeats are offered to these on Mondays, Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, and are afterwards eaten by the worshippers. The priests take no part in this worship, which is confined to the members of the household. The dead are burned, and the ashes buried near the burning place on the third day. Libations of water (tarpan) are poured forth for the propitiation of ancestors in the month of Asin.

Palanquin-bearing and cultivation are believed by the Khatwés to be their original occupations. With the decline in the demand for bearers caused by the railway extensions of recent years, the caste tends more and more to fall back upon cultivation as a means of livelihood. In some districts they have taken to weaving and assumed the title Joláhá. Their social rank is low, being much the same as that of Tatwás and Musahars. Nevertheless they are cleaner feeders, according to Hindu ideas, than the latter, for they will eat neither fowls nor field-rats, both of which the Musahars freely indulge in. All of them, except those who call themselves Bhakats and profess to abstain from flesh and strong drink, make free use of fermented and spirituous liquors.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Khatwés in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>24</td>
<td>2,010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tirhat (Mousipur)</td>
<td>40,047</td>
<td>44,800</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barun</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>478</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>16,873</td>
<td>8,909</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Furfush</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>228</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Santí Pargana</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hamaribagh</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Khatya, a sub-caste of Kumhárs in Dacca and Orissa who are supposed to have immigrated from Upper India.

Khauniá, a section of Kaibartas in Orissa.

Khavur, a section of Awadhiá Hajjáms in Behar.

Khawás, "servant," a title of those members of the Amát, Dhanuk, and Kewat castes in Behar who are employed as personal servants by the higher castes. A sub-caste of Ghartis in Darjiling.
Khawásiyá, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Khebangba, the native of Khebang, a sept of the Yangorup sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Khechá Kesria, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa.

Khechar, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Khechinjíá, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kheksa, curry vegetable, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Kheláut, a mul or section of the Sátmuliá or Kishnaut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Kheldá, a class of hereditary prostitutes in Behar.

Kheldenda, a sub-caste of Jugis in Eastern Bengal.

Kheiri, a woman retained for purposes of dancing and amusement, a prostitute.

Khema, a pheasant, apparently a totemistic sept of the Chhothar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling. This thar will not eat a pheasant or fowl or any bird of that class. The story is that the founder went out to shoot pheasants in a fir copse, but found none, and vowed never to eat a pheasant again.

Khendro-Oraon, a sub-tribe of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Kherá, a sub-caste of Mál in Bankura.

Kheresanchhá, a thar or sept of Kambus in Darjiling.

Khereswar ke pánre, a section of the Biyáhut and Kharidáhá Kalwárás in Behar.

Kherho, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Kheri, a section of Maghaiyá Kumbárás in Behar.

Kheroar, a sept of Mundas; a title of Parhaiyas in Chota Nagpur.

Kherwár, a synonym for Kharwár.

Kherwár or Safá-Hor, a sub-tribe of Santálás in the Santál Parganas who affect a high degree of ceremonial purity.

Khes, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur who cannot eat corn that grows in ponds.

Kheswá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Khetta, cobra, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Khichengia, a totemistic sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur who cannot eat jengia, a fruit.

Khil, a title of Dakshin-Ráhí and Bangaja Káyasthas in Bengal.

Khili-wálá, a title of Támbulis in Behar.

Khingba, a sept of the Yangorup sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Khiongje, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chitta-gong.

Khiráha, a section of the Kanaujíá sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Khirheri, a title of Goálás in Behar.
KHIRKATORA.

Khirkatorá, a mul or section of the Timmuliá Madhesíá sub-caste of Halwás in Behar.

Khobaipong, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Khodál or Khandyal, a thar of the Dhartá-Kausik gotra of Nepáli Brahmans.

Khodíá, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Khoepa, wild dog, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Khojorn, he who ate his earnings, a sept of the Chhothar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Khojwár, a sept of Thárus in Behar.

Khol, a ruí or sept of the Ruichhung sub-tribe of Dejong Lhors or Bhotias of the south of Tibet.

Khon, a sept of the Rautár sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Khosé, a section of Goalás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Khorrér, a gdín of the Bharadwája gotra of Barendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Khota, a sub-caste of the Bahán-najáti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Khotawá, a class of Beldárs in Western Bengal.

Khojwár, a sept of the Surajbansi division of Rajputs in Behar.

Khottá, (i) a generic name in Bengali for natives of the North-Western Provinces and Upper India. I cannot ascertain the derivation of the word, but the fact that the dialect of broken Hindi spoken in the north of Manbhum is known locally as Khottá bháshá may perhaps warrant the conjecture that it has reference to the linguistic peculiarities of up-country men. (ii) A designation of up-country barbers who have settled in Bengal. Such persons practically form a separate sub-caste, as Bengali barbers will not intermarry with them, and they are regarded as impure by the barbers of Upper India and Behar by reason of their having taken up their residence in Bengal. (iii) A sub-caste of Kámárs in Murshedabad and of Doháis in Western Bengal.

Khottá or Mauná, a sub-caste of Pods.

Khowáre-Nahás, a mul of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.
Khwáré-Mahuá, a mul of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Khowére-Mahnuré, a mul of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Khowére-Kokráhi, a mul of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Khowére-Khari, a mul of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Khowére-Murajpur, a mul of the Kásyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Khoyea, a wild dog, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Khoyra, a title of Bagdis in Bengal.

Khuadáng, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Khujirié, a section of Kémérs in Singbhum and the Santál Parganas.

Khukri, a kind of mushroom, a totemistic sept of Chiks and Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Khulál, a thar or sept of Gurungs and Mangars in Darjiling.

Khunaut or Khulaut, a sub-caste of Gonrhis in Behar.

Khungbá, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.

Khur, a title of Támbulís in Bengal.

Khurdá, a sub-caste of Bhandáris in Orissa.

Khuskhélia, a sub-caste of Telis in Behar.

Khuthá Bhagwánpur, a mul or section of the Naomuliá or Majraut sub-caste of Gozilas in Behar.

Khutibaran, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Khurútiá, a sub-caste of Máls in Birbhum.

Khwánd-Kár.

Akhnánd, a teacher or reader in Persian, who in Eastern Bengal performs for the lower classes several singular functions arising from the corrupt and Hinduised character of Muhammadanism in India. He is often styled the Murshíd, or religious guide, and Akhúníd or tutor. As a rule he is very illiterate and only able to read Arabic with difficulty, but he makes much of this smattering of knowledge. Thirty years ago the Khwánd-Kárs were important persons, their services being in great demand, but the reformed teaching of modern times has been gradually undermining this influence, and they are now little respected and seldom consulted. During the early years of this century, when Islam in Bengal was still paralyzed by the revolution that had occurred, the Khwánd-Kárs educated boys, instructing them in the rudiments of their religion. At the present day, however, Munshís generally teach children, although a Khwánd-Kár is often preferred by strict Muhammadans to instruct their children in the doctrines of the faith, and teach them the Kalma, or confession of faith.

The Khwánd-Kár, moreover, makes Muríds or disciples, exorcises persons possessed of devils, and cures diseases by preparing charms (ta'wíz); while many families consult him on all occasions of sickness; and his ability to relieve suffering is never for a moment questioned by women. Should a child be attacked by fever or convulsions, the father goes to the Khwand-Kar and obtains a charm, usually consisting of a sentence of the Koran scribbled on a piece of paper, which is fastened to the child's hair or arm; or the Khwand-Kar mumbling a few sentences from the same book, blows into a cup of water and gives it to the father as a medicinal draught. Parents put implicit faith in the efficacy of these charms, and every Muhammadan can relate wonderful cures effected by them. It is said that if an adult disabled by a neuralgic or rheumatic pain, drinks water in which the written charm of a Khwand-Kar has been dipped, immediate relief is procured, and no native will deny the possibility of this occurring.

Khyan, Kolita, a trading and cultivating caste of Northern Bengal and Assam, who claim to be descended from a Kayasth who was employed at the Court of the Raja of Kuch Behar to determine auspicious times and seasons for doing particular things. Colonel Dalton describes them as a good-looking race with "oval faces, well-shaped heads, high noses, large eyes, well-developed eye-lids and eye-lashes, and the light supple frame of the pure Hindu." In Assam they are called Kolita, in Northern Bengal they are known by the name of Khyan.

The sections of the caste are shown in Appendix I. They are of the ordinary Brahmanical type, with slight modifications such as might easily arise from maladroit borrowing. A Khyan may not marry a girl belonging to his own section, nor may he marry within the usual formula of prohibited degrees reckoned to the seventh generation in the descending line. Girls are married as infants at ages varying from five to thirteen. The marriage ceremony is of the standard Brahmanical type, the gift of the bride to the bridegroom and his acceptance of her being reckoned the essential and binding portion. Widows are not allowed to marry again, nor is divorce permitted.

As to their religion, Khyanas are orthodox Hindus. Most of them belong to the Saktas sect, but Vaishnavas are also found among them. They employ Brahmans as priests, who are received on terms of equality by other members of the sacred order. Their social rank is respectable, and Brahmans, Kayasths and Baidyas take water, fruit and sweetmeats from their hands.

Khyan, a synonym for Kibartta.

Khyaurakar, a title of Nepits in Bengal.

Khyungpo, a rui or sept of Dejong Lhoris, whose ancestor is said to have emigrated from North Bhotan.

Khyung-toipa, a rui or sept of the Bedtshan-gye sub-tribe of Dejong Lhoris or Bhotias of the south.

Kidat, a section of Goalas in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kilkhagaur, a mui or section of Sonars in Behar.

Kinda, date palm, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>KIN TICHA.</th>
<th>KOARL</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Kintichá, a thar or sept of Sunuwárs in Darjiling.</td>
<td>Kisánsinduriá, a class of cultivators in Chota Nagpur said to have come from Gángpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kinwar, a sept of the Suryabansi Rajputs and a section of Bábhans in Behar.</td>
<td>Kisán Turi, a sub-caste of Turis in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kiot, a synonym for Kewat.</td>
<td>Kisauriá, a section of Kanaujíá Lohárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kiral, a gái of the Káyapa gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.</td>
<td>Kishánpakshi, one born in the dark half (Krishna pakhá) of the month; a title of the illegitimate offspring of members of two different castes in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kiránti, Kiráti, a native of the Kiránt-des or mountainous country lying between the Dud-Kosi and the Karki rivers in Nepal. The term includes the Khambu, Limbu, and Yákhi tribes; and the Danuár, Hayu, and Thámi also claim to be Kiránti. Their title, however, to be included in this category is not admitted by the three tribes first mentioned, who claim to be, and are generally recognised as being, of superior social status.</td>
<td>Kishnaut, a sub-caste of Ahirs or Goálas in Behar and Chota Nagpur whose title is Mandar. Their gotra is Prem Ghuno. They churn milk.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kirénti, Kiréti, a native of the Kirant-des or mountainous country lying between the Dud-Kosi and the Karki rivers in Nepal. The term includes the Khambu, Limbu, and Yákhi tribes; and the Danuár, Hayu, and Thámi also claim to be Kiránti. Their title, however, to be included in this category is not admitted by the three tribes first mentioned, who claim to be, and are generally recognised as being, of superior social status.</td>
<td>Kisku, a sept of the Ho and Santál tribes.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kíri, weevils in rice, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.</td>
<td>Kisauriá, a section of Kanaujíá Lohárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kíro or Bágh, a section of Kharís in Chota Nagpur.</td>
<td>Kispotta, pig’s entrails, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kírtoliá, a mul or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goálas in Behar.</td>
<td>Kissan, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur; also a synonym for the Nágueswar tribe.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kírttan, a title of Sunris in Bengal.</td>
<td>Kissauriá, a section of Kanaujíá Lohárs in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kíratti, a title of Dakshin-Rárhi and Bangaja Káyasths in Bengal.</td>
<td>Kissi, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kisán, a mul or section of the Biálhut sub-caste of Kalwárs in Behar; a title of Kharís in Chota Nagpur.</td>
<td>Kistobagál, a sub-caste of Goálas, who eat fowls, drink wine, etc.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kisangir, a sect of religious mendicants who worship Kriátna.</td>
<td>Koá, cocooon, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Koáljibhá Thákur, a title of Bábhans in Behar.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Koári, a gái of the Káyapa gotra of Bárhi Brahmans in Bengal.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Kochh, Kochh-Mandai, Rajbansi, Paliya, Desi, a large Dravidian tribe of North-Eastern and Eastern Bengal, among whom there are grounds for suspecting some admixture of Mongolian blood. At the present day the name Kochh, without doubt the original designation of the tribe, is so carefully tabooed in the districts where they are most numerous, and where there is every reason to believe them to represent the earliest permanent settlers, that in Kuch Behar itself at the Census of 1881 not a single Kochh was to be found. The transformation of the Kochh into the Rajbansi, the name by which they are now known in Rangpur, Jalpaiguri, and Kuch or Kochh Behar, is a singular illustration of the influence exercised by fiction in the making of caste. As described by Buchanan at the beginning of the century and by Hodgson some fifty years ago, the Kochh tribe was unquestionably non-Aryan and non-Hindu. Now the great majority of the Kochh inhabitants of Northern Bengal invariably describe themselves as Rajbansis or Bhanga Kshatriyas—a designation which enables them to pose as an outlying branch of the Kshatriyas who fled to these remote districts in order to escape from the wrath of Parasu-Rama. They claim descent from Raja Dasarath, father of Rama; they keep Brahmans, imitate the Brahmanical ritual in their marriage ceremony, and have begun to adopt the Brahmanical system of gotras. In respect of this last point they are now in a curious state of transition, as they have all hit upon the same gotra (Kasyapa), and thus habitually transgress the primary rule of the Brahmanical system which absolutely prohibits marriage within the gotra. But for this defect in their connubial arrangements—a defect which will probably be corrected in a generation or two as they and their purohits rise in intelligence—there would be nothing in their customs to distinguish them from Aryan Hindus, although there has been no mixture of blood and they remain thoroughly Kochh under the name of Rajbansi. Although there is no historical foundation for the claim of the Rajbansis to be a provincial variety of the Kshatriyas, it is a singular fact that the title Rajbansi serves much the same purpose for the lower strata of the Hindu population of Northern Bengal as the title Rajput does for the landholding classes of dubious origin all over India. The one term, like the other, serves as the sonorous designation of a large and heterogeneous group bound together by the common desire of social distinction. The original nucleus of the Rajput group may have been Aryan, as that of the Rajbansi was certainly Dravidian. Both, however, have been, and continue to be, recruited by very similar methods. Only the recruits of the one are drawn from the landholders; of the other from the cultivating classes.

A good observer describes the Rajbansi as "the most conspicuously Dravidian race in Bengal. Their men are tall and robust, and neither in feature nor dress strikingly Tamulian; but at a market or village gathering thronged by their women one could imagine oneself transported to Kanara or Tamil land. The Rajbansi women, whose cast of feature is singularly homely

1 Mr. W. B. Oldham, then Deputy Commissioner of Darjiling.
KOCHH.

and rough-hewn, leave the head uncovered and wear a dress in which blue or purple invariably predominates, reaching only to the knee and bound over the bosom, leaving both shoulders bare in a fashion not seen among other people in Bengal; while the ornaments of the head and limbs recall those worn in Southern India. Their language, however, is only Bengali, and they have no separate dialect or patois. That their adhesion to Hinduism is compactly recent is shown by their own customs as regards burial, food and marriage, as well as by the existence of the Dhimal, who might be defined as a non-Hinduised Kochh or Rajbansi among them and beside them."

A medical officer, resident in Kochh Behar, whose opinion is quoted by Colonel Dalton, describes the Kochh of that country as having flat square faces; eyes black and oblique; hair black and straight, in some curling; nose flat and short; cheek bones prominent; beard and whiskers rather deficient; colour of skin in most instances black. Colonel Dalton himself says that the Rajbansi are all very dark, and that the Kochh display the thick protuberant lips and maxillaries of the negro.

A comparison of these opinions with my own observations and with the average cephalic, nasal and naso-malar indices of the caste ascertained by a large number of actual measurements seems to me to warrant the conclusion that the Kochh, Rajbansi, Paliya, Desi and other varieties by whatever names they are called are descended from a Dravidian stock which may probably have occupied the valley of the Ganges at the time of the Aryan advance into Bengal. Driven forward by this incursion into the swamps and forests of Northern and North-Eastern Bengal, the tribe were here and there brought into contact with the Mongoloid races of the Lower Himalayas and of the Assam border, and their type may have been affected to a varying degree by intermixture with these people. But on the whole Dravidian characteristics predominate among them over Mongolian.

The endogamous divisions of the caste differ slightly in different districts, but are based everywhere upon the degree of ceremonial purity which the members of particular groups are believed to have attained.
In Northern Bengal the principal sub-caste is the Rajbansi, who also call themselves Sivbansi with reference to the legend which traces their origin to a liaison between the God Siva and Hira, the daughter of Haju, chief of the Kochh tribe, about the middle of the sixteenth century. Other synonyms—Bhanga-Kabatriya, Patita-Kabatriya, Kabatri-Sankoch, and Suraj-bansi—rest on the tradition which makes them out to be a remnant of the Kabatiriyas scattered by Parasu Ram, who cast off their sacrificial threads, hid themselves in the swampy jungles of Northern Bengal, and thus for the time being abdicated the proud position which the Rajbansi are now anxiously striving to reclaim. Alongside of the Rajbansi, but usually 1 I have come across Rajbansis who said that members of the two groups intermarried, and that Rajbansi and Paliya were practically convertible terms.

distinct in respect of intermarriage and the eating of cooked food, we find the large sub-caste of Paliyá. The name Paliyá is said by some to refer to the flight (paláyan) of the supposed Kshatriya ancestors of the tribe; but it is equally possible that it may be merely a variant of the first half of the name Pani-Kochh by which the people now calling themselves Paliyá were known at the beginning of this century, when Dr. Buchanan made his survey of Dinajpur and Rangpur. They are further subdivided into two subordinate groups, known as Sádhu or pure and Bábú Paliyá. The latter name is regarded by the members of the sub-caste themselves as a title of distinction, or at least of respectability, connecting them with the Maharaja of Kuch Behar and the Rákát of Jalpaiguri, whom they regard as the heads of the large heterogeneous body known as Rájbansí or Paliyá. By the Sádhu Paliyás, on the other hand, it is explained as a corruption of Byábahári from Byábahár usage, implying that the observances of the Bábú group are not up to their own standard of ceremonial purity. It is by no means easy to say how far these imputations are justified in regard to the entire Bábú sub-caste. Custom varies from district to district, and the tendency to imitate the usages of the higher castes is continually raising the ideal to which people endeavour to conform. Subject to this limitation, I think it is true as a general rule that the main distinction between the Sádhu and Bábú Paliyá consists in the fact that the latter eat pork, fowls, crocodiles, lizards and the leavings of men of their own caste, and indulge freely in strong drink, while all these things are forbidden to the Sádhu Paliyá. Another sub-caste known in Dinajpur is Desí, who regard themselves as somewhat superior to the Paliyás. A Desí can take rice, water, sweetmeats, etc., from a Paliyá man, but not from a Paliyá woman; nor is there any intermarriage between the two groups. One is tempted to conjecture that this group, which is not a particularly large one, may be the modern representatives of the Deosi, a sort of rudimentary priests among the Pani-Kochh, who, according to Buchanan, were "supposed to know more than their neighbours of the manner in which the gods are to be pleased." The Desí claim to be better than the Paliyás, in that they do not plough with cows or use them to turn oil-mills.

In Jalpaiguri the general name is Rájbansí, and three sub-castes are found—the Dobhásir, who eat pork and fowls and drink spirits; the Modási, who eat pork and drink spirits, but abstain from fowls; and the Jálaú or Jháluá, who catch and sell fish. It is curious to learn that within comparatively recent times the Rájbansís of the Darjiling Terai were divided into three endogamous sub-castes, bearing names having reference to the character of their dwellings. The Tongia lived in houses raised from the ground on piles, such as the Mongoloid races of the north-eastern border usually build; the Khopria contented themselves with low huts on the level of the ground; while the Gobria kept their cattle in the houses which they lived in themselves. These distinctions have now died out, and have been replaced by the divisions Paliyá and Bábú Kochh, and they are only mentioned here as showing how tribes which adopt Hinduism tend continually to get rid of their pre-Hindu methods of grouping and to remodel their internal structure. on lines which indicate the degree in which particular groups approach the orthodox standard of food and usage.

The Kántái Réjbansí are a smaller group found scattered in several districts of Northern Bengal, who cultivate the soil, hold various kinds of tenures, serve as gomashtas, and sometimes practise medicine. The Tiár or Dalai are a fishing group mentioned by Buchanan, whose characteristic pursuit is fishing in the shallow drains or ditches connected with swamps and rice-fields. "In these they lay a long trap, called dhånggi, made of split bamboos. The mouth may be six or eight feet in length and one and a half to two feet wide. It slopes to an edge behind, being about two and a half or three feet broad. The fish that enter are prevented from returning by a row of bamboo splits placed as in a mouse trap, and they are shaken out by a hole at one corner which is plugged when the trap is set. Where there is any stream, the fish enter of their own accord; but they are often collected from a whole marsh and driven to the trap by dragging through the water a rope made of twisted ribs of the plantain tree leaves, the sides of which hang down like a fringe and alarm the fish as the rope approaches."

The Kochh-Mandai of the Bhowal forest tract in the north of Dacca appear to be a branch of the Kochh who have long been separated from the main body of the tribe and have to some extent intermingled with the Garos. The latter half of the name Kochh-Mandai is said to be the Garo word for man, and the entire name may be taken to be analogous to those double names which occur among several Dravidian tribes and denote groups owing their origin to crossing.

Mention has been made above of the singular fact that in seeking to copy the Brahmanical method of exogamy, the Réjbansí have been content to borrow one gotra only. All Réjbansí in fact belong to the same gotra Kasyapa, and thus habitually disregard the leading principle of the system which they proudly profess to follow. In theory intermarriage is regulated by the standard formula calculated to seven generations in the descending line from the paternal and maternal uncles, and to three generations from the aunts. But great laxity is said to prevail on this point throughout the caste, and in one district I am informed that marriage with a uterine half-sister is not prohibited. Another circumstance which tends rather to encourage consanguineous marriages is the prejudice entertained against marrying any one who comes from a distance. The result of this is that for matrimonial purposes the Réjbansí are broken up into a number of small territorial groups which bear no distinctive names and the limits of which do not admit of being precisely defined.

The Réjbansí profess to marry their daughters as infants, between the ages of four and ten years; but this custom has only recently been adopted, and it is difficult to ascertain to what extent it is really followed even among those sub-castes which profess to be pure Hindus. In the more primitive groups adult-marriage still prevails, and a breach of chastity before marriage is readily condoned, though the tendency is continually towards the adoption of what is believed to be the more orthodox usage. The same remark applies to the remarriage of widows. The Rajbansi in Rangpur if questioned on this point aver most positively that nothing of the sort is permitted; while their brethren in the Darjiling Terai make no secret at all of allowing a widow to remarry outside the degrees prohibited to her before her marriage, and subject to the further condition that she may not marry any of the elder relations of her late husband. Where a widow happens to be the head of the family, she enjoys the further privilege of choosing any man not within the prohibited degrees to live with her as her husband without going through any ceremony whatever. This looks like a survival, and may possibly furnish an explanation of the statement made by Buchanan1 about the Pani-Kochh that “women who happen to be unmarried after they have grown up select a husband according to their own discretion,” which by itself seems rather unlikely. If, however, we suppose the privilege to have been limited to women who had control of the property of their family, it bears a different aspect, and falls into line with several points of primitive practice in matters affecting property. Curiously enough, the Rajbansi, who prohibit widow-marriage, nevertheless recognise divorce,—a fact sufficient in itself to show, if further proof were wanting, that the former prohibition cannot have been long in force among them. Such divorces are effected before a panchayat, at which the purohit and the barber of the caste,—the former a Rajbansi-Brahman or Bara-Brahman,—are present. The husband states his case, the wife has or is supposed to have the right of reply, and the judgment of the panchayat is given by acclamation. If, as usually happens, it is adverse to the wife, her hair is shaved close to her head by the barber and the husband turns her out of the Rajbansi community.

Among the Rajbansi of Rangpur the feeling against widow-marriage has given rise to a curious form of hypergamy. Not content with adopting from the higher castes an artificial and inconvenient restriction which causes special hardship in a country where girls are married as children, they have proceeded to manufacture for themselves an imitation of Kulinism based upon the extent to which particular families have kept themselves free from the sin of allowing their widows to marry. Just as Ballal Sen appraised the virtues of the Brahmins of his day and allotted them graded rank accordingly, so Rajbansi opinion has seized upon the one tangible quality of having refrained from countenancing widow-marriage, and has made this the test of social respectability. Families of whom it can be said that none of their widows have been allowed to take second husbands rank in Rajbansi circles as Kulins; their members are spoken of as mahat or “great;” and people who wish to marry their daughters have to pay a substantial bride-price for the privilege. In point of stringency and completeness the copy falls far short of the model it professes to reproduce. Kulin women are not restricted in marriage to their own grade, and the alliances contracted by them have not, as among the Brahmins, the property of tainting the entire family to which they belong.

1 Eastern India, iii, 540.
Professional match-makers (ghatak) are employed to arrange marriages. The initiative is taken by the father of the bridegroom, who sends the ghatak with two hundred leaves of the betel and eighty areca nuts to the bride’s house. The ghatak stays there three days, which are spent in discussing the pros and cons of the match and haggling about the amount of the bride-price. If this time is disturbed by any unlucky event, such as the house catching fire, or a cloth being accidentally burned, or a cooking pot or water pot broken, the negotiations are abandoned and cannot be afterwards renewed, it being believed that grave misfortunes would follow if the omens were disregarded. Supposing all goes well, the ghatak returns to the bridegroom’s house and reports the result of his mission, laying stress upon the attractions of the bride, and stating the bride-price that is asked for her. This of course depends mainly upon the circumstances of the families. When the bride’s father is rich he may decline to accept money. Again, the amount sometimes varies in proportion to the age of the bridegroom. An elderly man may have to pay Rs. 80 or Rs. 90 for a wife, while in the case of a boy of fourteen to eighteen the sum would ordinarily range in tolerably well-to-do families from Rs. 20 to Rs. 25. After the ghatak’s report has been duly considered, for nothing may be done in a hurry, a party of the boy’s relatives go to the girl’s house with the ghatak, bearing an offering of curds, which they distribute to the members of the bride’s family. This is the right time to pay the bride-price, or at least half of it, should the bridegroom’s father not be able to pay the whole at once.

The offer made through the ghatak having thus been ratified by the bridegroom’s family, the wedding day is fixed with due regard to the auspicious days determined by the priests of the caste. On the appointed day the bridegroom is taken in procession to the bride’s house, where four women (bardati) of the bride’s family lift him out of his palanquin, place him on a seat, and offer him pān and tobacco after his journey. In the courtyard of the house a marua or wedding canopy has been erected, consisting of five plantain stems, about three feet high, arranged in the form of a quincunx, with an earthen pot (ghārd) of water placed at the foot of each. The distance between the plantain stems is the distance from the bridegroom’s foot to his ear. Outside the figure are a sieve and a winnowing fan with two extra pots of water. The following plan illustrates the arrangement:

```
Bride
* O *
* O *
* O *

Bridegroom

* O *

§ O

• Plantain stems.
O Water pots.

§ Winnow.

$ Sieve.
```
The four bardti or processional women already referred to lead in first the bridegroom and then the bride, and put them in their places on either side of the marua, which they walk round five times, conducted by the bardti. As they reach their places after each complete turn, the bridal pair stand still and pelt each other with dtab, rice and imitation cowries made of pol (sold). While this goes on a cloth is held up across the centre of the marua and suddenly raised when the bride throws, so that only a few of her missiles reach the bridegroom while it is dropped for the latter so as to give him a clear shot at the bride. Throughout the ceremony the couple wear high crowns or helmets made of sold pith.

After the marua has been duly circled, a cloth is spread in front of the winnow and sieve, and the couple sit down on it, cross-legged, the bride being on the right. Her left hand is then tied with kuss grass on the top of the right hand of the bridegroom; the father of the bride puts a rupee or half a rupee into her hand, and she gives the coin to the bridegroom, while a priest sitting at one side recites mantras or mystical formulae supposed to be in Sanskrit. This completes the giving of the maiden (kanyâdân) which the more orthodox Rajbansi affect to regard as the binding and essential portion of the ceremony. The father of the bride then gives her a new cloth, a lota, a cow, jewellery, etc., according to his means, and presents are also made to the bridegroom.

A basketful of cowries is now brought for the couple to foretell the fortunes of their wedded life. The girl takes a handful and passes them to the boy, who in his turn picks them up and lays them down by the girl. The bardti women then count the shells and observe how many of them are lying with the hollow side upwards. If the greater number are in this position, the girl is said to have won the game, and this is an omen of her triumph in connubial disputes hereafter. If, however, most of the shells lie the other way, it is believed that the husband will get the best of it. After this the bride and bridegroom give one another curds and molasses to eat and afterwards betel, and the bardti women conduct the bride inside the house, while the bridegroom returns to his own party. The night is spent in feasting, and early next morning the bridegroom takes the bride to his own house. Here a sort of duplicate ceremony is gone through, under the name of bâsi bibâka, the four bardti women accompanying the procession in order to lift the bride out of her palanquin and to attend upon her during the celebration.

It is curious to observe that sindurdán, the smearing of vermillion between the bride’s eyebrows and on the parting of her hair, which ordinarily forms the binding portion of the marriage ceremony of the lower castes, is relegated by the Rajbansi to a position of comparative obscurity. It is performed by two of the bardti women before the bridegroom arrives, at the time when the bride is washed with turmeric. The bridegroom merely puts a small black spot (kájoI) of oil and lamp-black between the bride’s eyebrows. In Darjiling, on the other hand, sindurdán holds its ground as the binding portion of the marriage ceremony, and as soon as it has been completed grass, water and rice, symbolising happiness and fertility, are showered. upon the couple from the sieve and winnowing fan which lie ready.

The Rajbansis of Jalpaiguri vary in some particulars the ritual described above. They use four plantains instead of five, and wind cotton thread seven times round each. The place of the fifth plantain stem in the centre of the quincunx is taken by some glowing embers supposed to represent the sacred fire of orthodox tradition, across which the bride and bridegroom pelt each other with flowers. The fire is circled seven times, not five, and in marching round the couple keep the fire on their left hand, thus going counter to the path of the sun—a remarkable deviation from orthodox usage sufficient of itself to indicate that the Réjbansis have borrowed a ritual which they understand very imperfectly. In giving the bride to the bridegroom, the father of the bride must touch the bridegroom’s knee with the second and third fingers of his left hand, repeating at the same time certain mantras dictated by the priest.

The precise form of Hinduism followed by the Réjbansis seems to vary in different parts of the country according to the influences to which they are subjected. In Rangpur they profess to be Vaishnavas, while in Darjiling, where Tantric ideas are perhaps more prevalent, their favourite goddess is alleged to be Káli. Bisahari or Manasa, Grámi, Tistu Buri, Hanuman, Bindur Tulsi, Rishi Kishtho, Petháni, Jogini, Hudum Deo, Bahastho or Bahustho, Balibhadra Thákur, and Kora-Kuri are mentioned as among their minor gods. Some curious particulars of their worship deserve mention here. When a drought has lasted long, the Réjbansi women make two images of Hudum Deo from mud or cowdung, and carry them away into the fields at night. There they strip themselves naked and dance round the images, singing obscene songs, in the belief that this will cause rain to fall. The household god, Bahastho or Bahustho, is worshipped in Baisakh (April-May) twice daily and at other times whenever the family enters a new house. A round lump of clay made smooth by smearing it with cowdung is set up at the foot of a bamboo to represent the god, and to this offerings of rice are made which are eaten by the worshippers. If this duty is neglected, disease or some similar calamity is believed to come upon the family. To Satya-Narain, whom the Mahomedans revere under the name of Satya-Pir, fresh milk, wheat flour, plantains and sugar are offered by the Brahmans who serve the caste on an auspicious day in Jaishtha (May-June). For this god wheat flour is said to be essential, and no substitute is admitted. Balibhadra Thákur is propitiated at sowing time under the form of a yoked plough, before which the worshippers prostrate themselves and do homage as at the shrine of a regular divinity. The germination of the seed is deemed to depend on the due performance of this ceremony. Seven months after child-birth, when the child is given rice to eat for the first time, Sháti (probably a variant of Shashti) is worshipped with offerings of kántá plantain, atab rice, and the leaves of the bele and the tulsi. Rude image of the goddess are made by the Mali caste in the form of cylinders of sōlā about seven inches high, roughly moulded into human form and mounted on the backs of sōlā ducks. The cult of Kora Kuri is confined to women and children. During the month of Paush (December-January) a small earthen pot (ghat) is set up in the yard, offerings of duba grass, plantain and turmeric are laid on it, and it is smeared with vermilion and oil. Petháni and Jogini are worshipped only by women, Sannyāsī only by boys.

In Rangpur, Kamakhya or Kāmrup Brahmsans superintend the religious observances of the Rājbansā caste. These rank as Barna-Brahmsans, and are not received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order. In Darjiling and Jalpaiguri the caste seem hardly to have attained to the dignity of having Brahmsans of their own, and any one among them who has acquired a reputation for sanctity may be called in to officiate as priest.

Orthodox Rājbansā burn their dead: the less Hinduised members of the caste resort to either burial or cremation as happens to be convenient. Children, lepers and persons who die of snake-bite are buried. Some set up over the grave a small white flag or canopy, usually of muslin, two or three feet square; others put a pot of water and a tula tree there. The period of mourning seems to vary in different districts. Thus the Rājbansās of Darjiling perform sṛddh on the thirteenth day after death, those of Jalpaiguri on the eleventh, and the Rājbansās of Rangpur on the thirty-first. During the thirty days following the funeral, these latter take their meals in wet clothes, changing afterwards to dry ones, sleep on jute, eat ātap rice, and abstain from fish, flesh, pān, masur dāl, condiments and salt. Every year on the eighth or ninth day of the new moon in the month of Bhādra (August-September) sṛddh is performed for three generations of deceased ancestors by throwing into a river milk, wheat, ātap rice, sesamum, barley, plantains, bel leaves and sprays of the tula plant, and uttering at the same time the names of the three ancestors who are to be held in honour.

In spite of their pretensions to be Kshatriyas, the social status of the Rājbansā is still extremely low, and no well-known caste will take cooked food from their hands or smoke in their hookahs. In the Darjiling Terai, where the caste is numerous, Hindus take water from them, but this is one of those concessions to circumstances of which caste custom offers many examples. The caste as a whole may be described as agricultural, though many, as has been mentioned above, make their living as fishermen, and carpenters, blacksmiths, jewellers, and money-lenders are also found among them. Most Rājbansās, however, are cultivating ryots with or without occupancy rights, some are landless day-labourers paid in cash or kind, and others hold their fields as ādhíars or métayers, paying half the produce to their immediate landlord. There are said to be no zamindars among them, the fact probably being all the zamindars who were originally Rājbansā have long ago got themselves transformed into Rajputs. Many of them in Darjiling and Jalpaiguri
The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Kochh tribe in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>......</td>
<td>1,005</td>
<td>Koch Behar</td>
<td>......</td>
<td>290,428</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>2,523</td>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>366</td>
<td>3,938</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>284</td>
<td>Paripurn</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>572</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>4,851</td>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>199</td>
<td>372</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>Mailsankh</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>23,351</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>......</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>1,977</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>170</td>
<td>7,377</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>296</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>1,338</td>
<td>15,355</td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>1,239</td>
<td>3,475</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>2,317</td>
<td>4,758</td>
<td>Chittagong Hill Tracts</td>
<td>110</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>3,514</td>
<td>7,582</td>
<td>Gaya</td>
<td>184</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>17,666</td>
<td>17,582</td>
<td>Bhagalpur</td>
<td>61,724</td>
<td>71,835</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>466,641</td>
<td>407,925</td>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>55,317</td>
<td>65,700</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahi</td>
<td>11,550</td>
<td>10,892</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>435</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rangpur</td>
<td>437,671</td>
<td>486,408</td>
<td>Santal Paragana</td>
<td>28</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boora</td>
<td>15,849</td>
<td>19,085</td>
<td>Orissa Tributary States</td>
<td>11</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purnia</td>
<td>3,073</td>
<td>4,073</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>286</td>
<td>286</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>23,124</td>
<td>30,901</td>
<td>Manbhun</td>
<td>110</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jhalpur</td>
<td>156,067</td>
<td>205,523</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>27</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kochhi Bediá, a sub-caste of Bediá whose original home was in Koch Behar; also called Kochh Bediá.

Kochila, a sub-tribe of Thárus in Nepal; a sept of the Rautára sub-tribe of Thárus in Behar.

Kochohina, a sept of the Suryabansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Kodaria, worker with the spade, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Kodbariá, a mu in section of the Magháyá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Kodo Ság, a kind of water vegetable, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Koiri, Murdó, a very numerous cultivating caste of Behar and Chota Nagpur, whom Dr. Wise believed to be "closely allied to the Kurni, with whom they drink, but do not eat, while the Kurni attend their marriages and partake of the feast." Mr. Nesfield again identifies the Koiri with the Káchhi, and adds that the name Koiri "shows that the wandering and semi-savage Kol, who is still to be found in the districts south of..."
the Ganges,” was the remote ancestor of the caste, “though every tradition of such descent appears now to have been forgotten.” Both theories appear to me to go much farther than the evidence justifies. There is nothing specially improbable in the suggestion that both Koiris and Kurmis may be descended from the same stock, nor even in the conjecture that the parent tribe was of non-Aryan origin; but we can point to no definite facts tending to affiliate the Koiris to the group of tribes included in the general name Kol, nor are the cases of social intercourse noticed by Dr. Wise sufficient to prove tribal affinity between the two castes. All that can be said is that the Koiri have too long been a distinct caste, and have been too much affected by Hindu influences for it to be possible to frame any plausible hypothesis regarding the elements of which they are made up. Their own tradition, that they were created by Siva to tend the radish (murdi) and to look after the sacred gardens of Benares, is of the common mythological type and gives no clue to their descent.

We find among Koiris in different parts of the country the following thirteen sub-castes:—

Barki-Dangi, Chhotki-Dangi, Banapar, Jaruhar, Kanaujiya, Magahiya, Tirhutia, Chirimait, Kumari, Goita, Dhara, Reutia, Pauri, Barakar, and Palmohi. The common story regarding the origin of these groups is that the first Koiri, the son of Mahadeva and Parvati, was placed by them in charge of a garden, and that the sub-castes are descended from girls of various castes who came to pick flowers in the garden and conferred their favours on the gardener. The sections are shown in Appendix I. In Behar they are territorial or titular; while in Chota Nagpur and the Santal Parganas survivals of totemism may be traced in the Kasyap and Nag gotras, the members of which will not kill or molest tortoises and snakes. The Kasyap Koiris, indeed, carry their reverence for the tortoise to such a length that if one is caught they smear its shell with oil and vermilion and put it back into the water. Some of the Behar section-names, again, are a kind of shibboleth, referring to the occupation of the caste or reciting at length the supposed habitat of the section. The usual rule is that a man may not marry a woman of his own section, but in Bhagalpur as many as nine sections are said to be excluded. The standard formula calculated to seven generations in the descending line is used for reckoning prohibited degrees not covered by the rule forbidding marriage within the section.

Koiris usually marry their daughters as infants between the ages of seven and ten, but rich men sometimes have the ceremony performed when the girl is only three or four years old: “after she has got her teeth,” as the saying goes; while both in Behar and Chota Nagpur a girl’s marriage may be deferred for special reasons until she has passed the age of puberty without the family incurring serious reproach thereby. Colonel Dalton gives the following account of a Koiri marriage in Chota Nagpur, which does not appear to differ materially from the usage current in Behar:—

1 The Barki-Dangi, who forbid widow-remarriage, are supposed to be the highest in rank; then come the Chhotki-Dangi and the Jaruhar, followed by the territorial divisions Kanaujiya, Magahiya, and Tirhutia. The Goita and Dhara groups, found in Champaran, keep fowls, and are believed to be the illegitimate descendants of a Koiri woman by a Kunjra or vegetable-seller.

"The preliminaries are first arranged by mutual friends, who meet at the house of the bride. If they come to an agreement, small sums of money are interchanged. The boy's friends give four annas and a half, and the girl's friends one and a half, and this is an engagement.

"But as a betrothal it is incomplete till the ceremony called sugan bándhná is performed. Ten or more of the boy's friends with music and a Brahman go to the girl's house; her friends are also invited, and the ceremony commences by the father of the girl and the father of the boy each spreading a new cloth on the ground. The Brahman then takes some dún from the store of the bride's father and places it in the hands of the maiden, who throws it on the cloth spread by her father-in-law that is to be. The Brahman next takes some grain that has been brought from the bridegroom's house, and this is thrown on the cloth spread by the father of the maiden. The cloths are then rolled up with the grain in them: the bride retains that which was brought from her betrothed's house. The friends of the latter take away the cloth produced by the bride's father.

"Eight days after the above ceremony the marriage takes place. A Brahman priest presides, and the service is strictly Brahmanical. At the conclusion of the orthodox ritual the bride and groom, their scarfs tied together, are made to perform seven times a circuit round a collection of vessels containing water, grain, oil, and a light. This is called the bhanwar. The girl goes first; she carries one of the cloths with grain, and the boy the other, and, allowing the grain to drop, they thus mark the circuits they make.

"When all is over, the boy is taken into the women's apartments and invited to eat, but he will not touch food till a present is made to him. In the same manner, when the bride first appears amongst the females of her husband's house she obstinately declines all refreshments till bribed to eat. The jahás is used by the Koiris as well as by the Kurmis."

Polygamy is permitted, and there does not appear to be any positive rule limiting the number of wives a man may have. The caste, however, is not a wealthy one, and it is unusual to find a man with more than two wives, while a second wife is commonly taken only in the event of the first being barren.

All the sub-castes except the Barki-Dángi allow a widow to marry again by the sagai or sangá form, and impose no restrictions on her choice of a second husband. It is, however, deemed the right thing for her to marry her late husband's younger brother (devar) if such a relative exists; and the fact that a woman who marries an outsider must give up her male children to her late husband's family tends on the whole to make marriage with the devar a very common arrangement. The sangá ritual as performed by the Koiris of Manbhum is a very simple one. Late in the evening the bridegroom accompanied by a few of his friends goes without any special display to the bride's house, where he is received by her relations and given a seat in the courtyard. There he is joined by the bride, who is brought in by two widows, and takes her seat on a sāli leaf in front of the bridegroom. The bridegroom presents to her a new sāri, and touches with the little finger of his left hand some powdered vermil- ion, which is brought to him in a sāli leaf. A widow then smears some of this powder on the bride's forehead and the parting of her hair; this act, which completes the ceremony, being greeted with a cry of "Haribol" by the lookers-on. The proceedings end with a feast provided by the bridegroom, who takes his wife home quietly the same night. In the north of Manbhum (thānas Jharia and Topchānchi) a different custom prevails, which may perhaps represent a state of transition towards the abandonment of widow-marriage. There no ceremony of any kind is performed; but if a man wishes to keep a widow as his mistress, he announces his intention to the headmen. If they agree, he simply takes the woman to live with him.

The practice of the caste in the matter of divorce appears to vary with the surroundings of the caste, and to depend on the extent to which they have been influenced by the example of the higher castes. In Chota Nagpur and parts of Behar considerable license of divorce is allowed. Reference is made to the caste panchāyat; and if it is found that the husband has just cause of complaint, he is permitted to put away his wife. Divorced wives may marry again. The Koiris of Bhagalpur and Patna, on the other hand, profess not to recognise divorce, and a woman who goes wrong is simply turned out of the caste. In Champaran the rule is said to be that a man may obtain from the panchāyat authority to divorce his wife for adultery or for serious faults of temper. A woman so divorced may marry a man of a different (presumably lower) section, but may not marry within her own section without the express permission of the leading members of the group—the caste Brahmans and the local zamindar. For this permission certain fees have to be paid. This seems to imply the opinion that a woman having by marriage become a member of her husband's section does not revert to her own section when divorced, and thus is not precluded from marrying a man who before her marriage would have been deemed a blood relation.

Koiris profess to be orthodox Hindus belonging to the Saiva or Śākta sects, and Vaishnavism has hitherto made little progress among them. The quality of their orthodoxy, however, seems to vary with locality, and may perhaps be gauged by the degree of consideration accorded to their Brahmans and by the character of their minor gods. Thus in Chota Nagpur the Brahmans who serve the Koiris as priests are not received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order; while among their minor gods we find the aboriginal Marang-Buru or Barpahāri alongside of Sokhá, Parameswari, Mahāvira, and Hanumán. Mounds of dried clay representing these are found in every house, and there is often a larger mound with a tulāī tree in the courtyard, which, according to Colonel Dalton, is sacred to the entire group of deities. In addition to the Hindu festivals of Janmāštami and Sivarāṭ they observe the aboriginal feasts of Karma and Jīttā parāb, and invoke Marang-Buru at certain intervals, specially when rain does not fall in due season. In Behar, on the other hand, the Kanaujiā, Srotī, or Tirhutā Brahman, who is employed by the Koirī for religious and ceremonial purposes, seems to hold a fairly high position and not to be looked down upon by his brethren. Their village gods are Bandi, Goraiyā, Sokhā, Hanumān, Rām Thākūr, Kurklā, and Dharm-Rāj, who are worshipped by the head of the household with the usual offerings of sheep, goats, and sweetmeats of various kinds. In Arrah the Koirī, like the Kāndus, worship the Pānch Pir and hold a festival in their honour on the ninth and tenth days of the Dasaharā in Asvin (September–October). A few are found following the tenets of Kabīr, Nānak, and Daryā Das.

Koirī women are unclean for twelve days after child-birth, at the end of which time the mother bathes twice, and after each bath plasters the house floor with cowdung. She then marks with red lead five spots on the rim of the well, draws a jar of water, and her purification is complete. The dead are burned, the body being laid on the pyre with the head pointing to the north, and the ashes thrown into the Ganges or into any river that may happen to be handy. The ceremony of sraddh is performed in the regular method on the thirteenth day after death. Cakes and libations of water are offered every Aswin for the propitiation of ancestors in general. In Chota Nagpur a curious custom prevails, under which on the day of death the friends and relatives of the deceased, and even the members of other castes, give the family a few handfuls of rice and receive in return a small quantity of milk.

The social position of Koirīs is respectable. They rank with Kurmis and Goālās, and Brahmans will take water from their hands. In the matter of food the practice of the caste, in some districts at any rate, seems to fall below the ordinary Hindu standard of purity. Thus the Koirīs of Champaran eat fowls, and in North Bhagalpur fields rats are mentioned as a legitimate article of diet. On the other hand, they will not touch the leavings of even the highest castes, nor will they take personal service—a point wherein they consider themselves to be raised above the Dhánukas, Kewats, and Amātas. They will, however, eat pakki with, and take water from, men of these castes, and will smoke in the same hookah when on a journey. Their pursuits are purely agricultural, but they are distinguished from the Kurmis and other purely cultivating castes by their skill in rearing tobacco, opium, and other special produce requiring more careful cultivation than the staple crops. In the neighbourhood of large towns they work as market-gardeners, growing and selling all kinds of vegetables. Many Koirīs are tenure-holders, and here and there members of the caste have risen to be petty zamindars. Most of them are prosperous cultivators holding occupancy rights, and comparatively few have sunk to the position of landless day-labourers. In fact, their skill and industry are so notorious that a Koirī, even if he has no land of his own, is usually rather in demand as a partner on the bhág-jot system of cultivation.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Koiris in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>709</td>
<td>344</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>2,397</td>
<td>234</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>652</td>
<td>97</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>2,140</td>
<td>320</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>145</td>
<td>343</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>1,539</td>
<td>1,535</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>8,704</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>9,702</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>576</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>7,912</td>
<td>323</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshabab</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>3,352</td>
<td>266</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahiye</td>
<td>1,007</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rampur</td>
<td>748</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>428</td>
<td>181</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>38</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Durgapur</td>
<td>1,016</td>
<td>211</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Purbasa</td>
<td>438</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khow Behar</td>
<td>526</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjeeling</td>
<td>306</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jhalpur</td>
<td>1,516</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koch Behar</td>
<td>822</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Asoca</td>
<td>306</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pasrarpur</td>
<td>371</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bheraghat</td>
<td>1,516</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mainamnath</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kokarsá, a section of Sonárs in Behar.

Kokás, a sub-caste of Barhis in Behar who are said to have come from Gorakhpur, and work only in wood; a sub-caste of Lohárs.

Kokenamba, he who rises with the sun, a sept of the Pánthar sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Koki, a thar or sept of Gurungs in Darjiling.

Kokras, a section of the Sátmuliá Maghayá sub-caste of Kándus in Behar.

Kol, a sub-caste of Gonris in Behar which, though endogamous as regards the other sub-castes of Gonris, allows of intermarriage with the Parbatti Kurin sub-caste. The Kolas say they are not Gonris, and distinguish themselves as Gonrh.

Kol or Kolh, a generic name applied by Hindus to the Munda and Oraon tribes, and sometimes also to the Bhumij and Kharias. Herr Jellinghaus1 thinks that it means pig-killer; but the question is a very obscure one, and it is at least equally likely that the word may be a variant of hor or hóra, the Mundari for 'man,' which is used by both Mundás and Santál in speaking of themselves.

Kolandh, a section of the Pachainyá sub-caste of Doms in Behar.

Kola-Parámánik, a sub-caste of Nabits in the 24-Parganas.

Kolasa, a sept of Maghas in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Koleman or Kalu, a hypergamous group of Telis in Bengal.

Kolh-Asur, a sub-tribe of Asuras in Chota Nagpur.

---

1 Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, iii, 326.
Kolita, Kolita Tasa Orh Tasa, an agricultural caste of the Southern Tributary Mahals of Chota Nagpur, whose traditions say that they came originally from Mithila in the days of Rama. Colonel Dalton describes them as of fair complexion with good features and well-proportioned limbs, and pronounces them to be mainly Aryan in blood with "a slight deterioration arising from intermixture with the less comely aborigines." They generally allow their daughters to grow to maturity before giving them in marriage, and Colonel Dalton saw many full-grown girls in the villages that he visited. Nothing is known about the internal structure or the religion of the caste. They usually call themselves Tasa, a corruption of Chasa, and I think it is an open question whether they are not merely Orh-Chasas who have settled in the Tributary Mahals and acquired the name Kolita.

Kolita, an endogamous sub-division of Kayasths in Assam.

Kolkatari, a sept of Kauras in Chota Nagpur.

Kol-Munda, a sub-tribe of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Konari, an endogamous division of Paschaty Bairdk Brahmans in Bengal.

Konark, a pur or section of Sakadwipi Brahmins in Behar.

Kondongwa, the vagabond, a sept of the Atrharai sub-tribe of Limbus in Darjiling.

Kongaddi, crow, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Konhar, a sept of the Rautar sub-tribe of Tharus in Behar.

Konkpata, a title of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Konkpata-Munda, a sub-tribe of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Konn-Gop, a hypergamous division of the Purba Kuliyah Sadgops in Murshedabad who take their wives from other Sadgops, but give their daughters only in their own group.

Kons, grass, a totemistic sept of Lohars in Chota Nagpur.

Kopetah, a section of Maghayah Dhibis in Behar.

Kopinyar, a section of Awadhia Hajjamis in Behar.

Koput, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Kora, a sub-caste of Tantis in Bengal, a मुल or section of the Kanaujiya sub-caste of Sonars in Behar, a sept of Hos in Singhbhum.

Kora, Kdora, Khairá, Khayrás, a Dravidian caste of earth-workers and cultivators in Chota Nagpur, Western and Central Bengal, probably an offshoot from the Mundá tribe. The Kora or Khayras of Manbhum and Bankura have well-marked totemistic sections of the same type as the Mundas, and the latter admit that some sort of affinity may at one time have been recognised. The Kora of the Santal Farganas on the other hand claim to have come from Nagpur. The Bádá section of the Kora have a curious legend concerning their totem. They say that one of their ancestors went out hunting. with his two brothers in the jungle, but found no game. While they were wandering about, they noticed a bundle wrapped in sáś leaves hanging from the branch of a bārdā or pithālī tree. The bundle contained meat, which, being very hungry, they cooked and ate without further inquiry. Afterwards they found out that what they had eaten was a human placenta, and expressed their horror by making the fruit of the bārdā tree taboo for themselves and their descendants. The Ālu section, on the other hand, believe that their first ancestor was born under a Phalālu tree, and for this reason they will not eat the bulb-like fruit of this tree, or any bulbs, such as potatoes, which bear a resemblance to it. Both stories seem to be attempts to find a rational explanation for a prohibition which seemed unreasonable to men who had got beyond the stage of believing in their actual descent from trees. Further east these characteristic section-names have been dropped, but the caste is divided into four sub-castes, bearing the names Dhalo, Molo, Sikhariá, and Bādāria, of which the first three still preserve the memory of their original settlements. Thus the Dhalo sub-caste say that they came from Dhalbhum, the eastern pargana of Singbhum; the Molo from Manbhum; and the Sikhariá from the tract of country between the Dāmodar and Barākar rivers bounded on the east by Samet Sikhar or Pārasāth Hill. In Bankura, again, besides the Sikhariá we find three other groups—Sonārekhá, Jhettiá, and Guri-Bāwá, of which the first is associated with the Sonārekhá or Subarnarekhhá river, which rises in the Mundári country, while the second bears the same name as one of the sub-castes of the Bāgdís. In Bankura all four sub-castes are strictly endogamous; in the districts further east Molos and Sikhariás intermarry. In Manbhum no sub-castes appear to have been formed, and the caste is still more or less in the tribal stage.

The Hinduised Khairás of Central Bengal have developed a legend of the common mythological type, to the effect that they were generated by the bellowing of the miraculous cow Kāmadhenu when Vīswāmitra came to take her away from the sage Vāsiśtha, and that they with other soldiers born from the cow drove off the intruding Kshatriya. Another tradition current in the Santál Parganas says that the Khairás came from the west, and that their special function is to prepare catechu (khair) for use in conjunction with betel. There is nothing to show that the Korás ever followed this particular occupation, and the statement is referred to here merely as an instance of the striving after a meaning which meets us so frequently in the popular derivations of caste names.

Where the exogamous groups have been preserved, the rule is that a man may not marry a woman of the same totem as himself; but on the mother's side the totem is not taken into account, and the rule of exogamy is supplemented by the standard formula mamerá, chacherd, etc., calculated to three generations in the descending line.
The Koras of Western Bengal marry their daughters both as infants and as adults, and in Chota Nagpur sexual intercourse before marriage is regarded as a venial offence. This measure of toleration, so characteristic of the aboriginal races, is no longer recognised in Bankura, where sexual indiscretions are visited with severe social penalties, although adult-marriage still maintains its ground. In Bengal Proper the caste has fully adopted the more fashionable custom of infant-marriage.

The marriage ceremony of the Bankura Koras corresponds precisely with that described at length in the article on the Bagdis, with the curious difference that vermilion is applied to the bride’s forehead with the handle of the cutter (chimta) used for slicing areca nut. In Manbhum the bride and bridegroom are made to stand one behind the other on a bundle of straw laid on the top of a bullock-yoke (jordn), and the bridegroom, whose place is in the rear, treading on the heels of the bride, reaches forward and smears vermilion three times on the bride’s forehead. This, which is deemed to be the binding portion of the ritual, has clearly survived or been borrowed from the marriage ceremony of the Mundás. The Eastern Korás follow the regular Hindu ritual.

Polygamy is everywhere permitted, and in theory there is no limit to the number of wives a man may have. Custom, however, and the standard of living imposed by the comparative poverty of the caste, combine in actual life to bring about the result that hardly any one has more than two wives, and most men content themselves with one.

Among the Korás of Manbhum and the Santálparganas a widow is allowed to marry again, and her choice of a second husband is un fettered, save that she must observe the prohibited degrees, and that she may not marry her deceased husband’s elder brother. She may marry his younger brother, but she is under no special obligation to do so, though such marriages are deemed both respectable and convenient, and very commonly take place. The ceremony (sangd) is much the same as that described in the article on the Koirás. In the Kora ritual, however, the bridegroom does not himself apply the vermilion to the bride’s forehead. He merely touches the powder, which is then smeared on the parting of the bride’s hair by the widows who are present. In Bankura and the districts further east the example of the rest of the population has induced the Korás to abandon widow-marriage. The working of the same influence may be observed in the matter of divorce, which is prohibited in the eastern districts, while in Chota Nagpur and the Santál Parganas aboriginal usage still holds its ground and divorce is granted by the caste council on the application of either husband or wife. Persons so divorced, whether men or women, are allowed to marry again.

Like the Bauris and Bagdis, Korás admit into their community members of any caste ranking above their own in social standing. The occasions on which this privilege is sought are doubtless rare, and usually occur only when the outsider has been turned out of his own caste for carrying on an intrigue with a Kora woman and eating food which she has prepared. A case of this kind, which has been reported to me from one of the districts of Central Bengal, throws a curious light upon the working of the caste system at the present day. A man of the highly respectable Aguri caste fell in love with a Kora girl, and after keeping the intrigue secret for some time was ejected from his caste and turned out of his household. He then went to live with his mistress, and at first thought of turning Vaishnava. Finally, however, at the girl's suggestion he decided to join the Korá community, and his case was laid before a meeting of the headmen (mandals) of the caste. These worthies the convert propitiated with a liberal feast, and was thereupon formally admitted to be a member of the Korá caste.

Like most of the lower castes, the Koras settle the bulk of their civil disputes through the agency of their own panchkysats, and very seldom resort to the regular courts. In fact the value of the property in question is usually too small to bear the costs of a regular suit. In matters of inheritance and succession they affect to be governed by the standard codes recognised in the locality, by the Dáyabhágas in Bengal districts and by the Mitáksharás in Chota Nagpur. Their customs, however, imperfectly as it has been possible to ascertain them, show some curious deviations from the ordinary Hindu rules of law. In Bankura the custom of giving the eldest son an extra share (jeth-anges) is in full force, and even in the eastern districts traces of this practice still survive. The Korás of Manbhum, on the other hand, divide a man's property equally among his sons, but where he leaves sons by more than one wife, they follow the custom known in the Panjab as chundarand, under which the sons, however many, of one wife get no more than the sons, however few, of another wife.

In matters of religion Korás affect to be orthodox Hindus, worshipping the regular gods and calling themselves Saktas or Vaishnavas, according as they incline to the cult of Káli, Durgá, and Manasa, or to that of Rádhá and Krishna. Manasa, the heavenly petroness of snakes, and Bhádu, the virgin daughter of the Pachete house, whose worship has been described in the article on the Bégdis, are their favourite deities. Their village and household deities are Bhairab Thákur, Grám-Deoti, and Kudra, to whom goats, fowls, pigeons, rice, sugar, and plantain are offered on no fixed dates, and are divided between the worshippers and the Deogharis. Brahmans, who serve them as priests and keep in order the shrines (Kudrásthán and Bhairabsthán) of the village gods. In Manbhum the Korás do not employ Brahmans, but a member of the caste, styled the Léyá or Náyá acts as priest, and is sometimes remunerated by a grant of rent-free land held on the tenure known as táydti. Further east they are served by Barna Brahmans, who are looked down upon by other members of the sacred order, and occupy about the same position as the Brahmans who look after the spiritual welfare of the Bauris and Bágdis.
Like the Bauris, the Korás of Chota Nagpur admit both burial and cremation as modes of disposing of the dead; and when burial is resorted to, the corpse is laid in the grave face downwards and with the head pointing north. In Bankura and further east the rule is to burn, burial being confined to the case of those who have died of cholera, small-pox, or any disease supposed to be infectious. Here also the fashion of placing the body face downwards is observed, the idea being apparently that this affords some security against the spirit of the dead man 'walking' and giving trouble to the living—a danger which is always supposed to be greater in the case of those who have died by a comparatively sudden or violent death. A meagre imitation of the orthodox sruddh is performed on the eleventh day after death, and annual offerings of rice, ghi, and gur are made to deceased ancestors in the months of Kartik and Chait.

The social position of Korás is very low, and they are usually classed with Bágdis, Bauris, Bunás, and other dwellers on the confines of Hinduism. Their own practice in the matter of diet varies in different parts of the country. In Chota Nagpur they eat beef, pork, and fowls, and all manner of fish, whether scaly or scaleless, but refrain from eating field-rats, snakes, lizards, and animals which have died a natural death. Further east they are more particular. No Korá will touch beef, and some members of the caste abstain from fowls and from strong drink, in the belief that by doing so they acquire some sort of social distinction. These comparatively ascetic Korás have not as yet formed themselves into a sub-caste, but there is no reason why this should not hereafter take place. In Bankura Korás will eat sweetmeats, etc., with members of the Bágdi caste, but will not take water from their hands or smoke in the same hookah. Boiled rice they will take only from members of the Nabásákha group.

The caste believe tank-digging, road-making, and earthwork generally to be their characteristic profession, and it may be surmised that their adoption of a comparatively degraded occupation, necessarily involving a more or less wandering manner of life, may have been the cause which led to their separation from the Mundás, who are above all things settled agriculturists, conspicuous for their attachment to their original villages. As earth-workers they rank next to the Beldárs, but, unlike these, they carry earth in a pair of triangular baskets slung on a shoulder-yoke (bahangí), and will on no account carry it on their head. Beldárs, on the other hand, always use single baskets, borne on the head, and refuse to touch a bahangí, deeming it an indignity to carry anything on their shoulders. Within the last generation many Korás have taken to cultivation, holding land as occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats, and working as agricultural labourers. In Bankura, however, and in other districts of Western Bengal, their connexion with the land must be of very ancient date, for we find a certain number of them at the present day in possession of substantial ghatwádi tenures—a fact which indicates that they were among the earliest settlers in that part of the country.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Korás in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>728</td>
<td>8,211</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>.....</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>1,216</td>
<td>2,058</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>3,201</td>
<td>2,927</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burdwan</td>
<td>5,776</td>
<td>5,079</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>176</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>6,161</td>
<td>3,068</td>
<td>Shagpar</td>
<td>246</td>
<td>223</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>5,117</td>
<td>5,117</td>
<td>Maida h</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>.....</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>330</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>7,211</td>
<td>3,790</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>175</td>
<td>175</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>3,197</td>
<td>217</td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>607</td>
<td>967</td>
<td>Hazardih</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>Godardaga</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahi</td>
<td>143</td>
<td>143</td>
<td>Singbhum</td>
<td>474</td>
<td>474</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barga</td>
<td>210</td>
<td>210</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>103</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>564</td>
<td>701</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>561</td>
<td>561</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Korabania, a synonym for Korá in Western Bengal.

Korait, a synonym for Goráit.

Koránch, a title of Koiris and Kándus in Hazaribagh, said to refer to the mythical island Kraunchdwip; a section of Babhans and of Awadhiá Hajjáms in Behar; also a sub-caste of Halwais and Kándus.

Korángi, a thar or sept of the Das-Gurung sub-tribe of Gurungs, having derived its name from Koren, a place in Tibet.

Korankárk, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Kórá, a sub-caste of Chamárs in Behar.

Koriár, a section of Koránch Kándus in Behar.

Korisá, a mul or section of the Chhamuliá Madhésiá sub-caste of Halváis in Behar.

Kórla, a fig, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Kórwá, a Dravidian tribe of Sarguja, Jashpur and Palamau, who claim to be the original inhabitants of the country they occupy, and whose claim is in some measure borne out by the fact that the priests who propitiate the local spirits are always selected from this tribe. The hill Korwás of Sarguja have the singular legend that they are descended from the scare-crows set up to frighten wild animals by the first men who raised crops in Sarguja, which were animated by the great spirit to save his votaries the trouble of continually making new ones. The male Korwás are described by Colonel Dalton as short of stature, dark-brown in complexion, strongly built and active with good muscular development. Their foreheads are narrow, and the lateral projection of the zygomatic arches very marked. Some of the wilder specimens have black skins, flat faces and projecting lower jaws, while their matted hair has acquired a tawny shade from constant neglect. "The women," says Colonel Dalton, "appear ground down by the hard work imposed on them, stunted in growth, black, ugly, and wretchedly clad, some having only a few dirty rags tied round their persons, and in other respects untidy and unclean. On them falls the double task of labour in the fields and of providing the daily bread for the miserable household."
They have all the burdens, but none of the privileges, of women. The man may follow his instincts as a hunting animal, and bow and arrow in hand search the hills for the meat that his soul loveth; but he, day after day, returns unsuccessful, and in the meantime the woman has been hunting for and digging up wild esculent roots, or cutting wild vegetables, hewing wood, and drawing water, and woe betide her if she has not been more successful than her lord.

The Korwas appear to be divided into four sub-tribes, the Agaria-Korwa, probably a cross with the Agarias, the Dand-Korwa, the Dih-Korwa, who are settled in regular villages, and the Paharia-Korwa, who live in the hills, and are the wildest branch of the tribe. Colonel Dalton mentions that he failed to find among them any tribal distinctions by which restrictions on intermarriage were imposed such as are observed by cognate stocks. I am indebted to Mr. W. H. P. Driver, of Ranchi, for the interesting list of septs given in Appendix I. Most of these, it will be seen, are totemistic. Among the totems we find the tiger, the snake, the parrot, the wild goose, two kinds of eel, a fish, the kerketa bird, the mango, myrabolam, unhusked rice, ploughs and pestles used for pounding grain, also a curious group called Muri, alleged to derive its name from the fact of its ancestors having made a chulha, out of four skulls, and cooked their dinner on this uncanny sort of fireplace. This is clearly a sept of the nickname type such as are common among the Tibetans, Limbus and the people of the Chittagong Hill Tracts. To what extent the totems mentioned above are taboo to the septs which bear their names is a point on which no certain information is as yet forthcoming. The general tendency is for such prohibitions to fall into disuse, and the only rule about the sept-name that really holds its ground is the rule forbidding marriage within the circle which it defines.

Korwas, says Colonel Dalton, are considered formidable as bowmen, but he was not struck with the accuracy of their aim. Their bows are surprisingly strong, and they use arrows with barbed heads, nine inches long by an inch and a half wide. The feathers are arranged in a spiral, which is supposed to give great steadiness to the flight of the shaft. They make battle-axes from iron of their own smelting, and are very expert in the use of this weapon.

Their system of agriculture is primitive. They cultivate only virgin soil, resorting freely to fire for the purpose of clearing away the jungle, and changing their homesteads every two or three years as the land becomes exhausted. Rice, vetches, millets, pumpkins, yams, chillies and arrowroot are their standard crops, and they eke out the scanty yield of their fields with a variety of jungle products. Grain they store underground done up in small packets of leaves, and thus packed they say it will keep for years. They also trade in honey, bees-wax, arrowroot, resins, gum, stick lac and iron.

Of their religion little is known. According to Colonel Dalton the Korwas of Sarguja sacrifice only to the spirits of their ancestors, and as this must be done by the head of each family, they have no priests. In Jashpur, on the other hand, Baigas serve them as priests, and the Khuria Rani, a bloodthirsty goddess, dwelling in a cave overhanging a stream, is worshipped with offerings of slain buffaloes and goats. The families of the Dewan of Jashpur and the Thakur of the Kallia estate—the only Korwás who now hold any considerable landed property—affect to have adopted Hinduism and “spurning alliances with the ordinary Korwás have continued inter-breeding for several generations,” although “they dare not altogether disown the spirits of the hills and forests that their ancestors adored, and they have each at their head-quarters a Korwa Baiga or pagan priest to propitiate the gods of the race.”
KORWA

Korwár, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Koshtá, Māhārā, a weaving and cultivating caste of Chota Nagpur, who believe their ancestors to have immigrated from Sambalpur, Rajiah and Chattisgarh in the Central Provinces. The caste call themselves Māhārā, and the name Koshtá is used only by outsiders. The exogamous sections of the Koshtás are shown in Appendix I. With three exceptions, they appear to be totemistic; but there is nothing to show whether the members of the sections pay any reverence to the totems whose names they bear. As a rule Koshtás marry their daughters after they have attained maturity, and infant marriage is also resorted to occasionally by comparatively wealthy men, who believe that they perform an act of social merit by giving a daughter in marriage before puberty. The marriage ceremony differs little from that in force among the lower classes of Hindus. Sindurdén or the smearing of vermilion on the bride’s forehead and the parting of her hair is deemed the essential and binding portion. A widow may marry again by the sagái ritual, and is expected to marry her late husband’s younger brother if one survives him. Divorce is permitted on various grounds. No special formalities are prescribed. A simple declaration before the pancháyat that the parties propose to dissolve their marriage is all that is necessary. As a rule the husband is the person who moves, and it is a doubtful point whether a woman is entitled to take steps to obtain a divorce from her husband.

The principal god of the Koshtás is the Gond divinity Dulha Deo, a boy-bridegroom raised to divine honours by reason of his tragic death in the midst of his own bridal procession. There are also many Kavirpanthis, owing, it is said, to the activity of the missionaries of this sect among them of recent years. Koshtás have no Brahmans; the village barber (návdá) presides at marriages, and on all other occasions the heads of families are priests unto themselves. Both burial and cremation are in vogue. Members of the Kavirpanthi sect are always buried.

In respect of diet, Koshtás observe most of the rules held binding by middle class Hindus, but they do not consider themselves bound to abstain from strong drink. They eat paktí and drink with Brahmans, Rajputs, Khandaitas, Kharwas, Jhorás, Ahirs, Kumhars. Kachchi they can take only from Gonds and Rantias, a fact...
KOSHTA.

which, taken in connexion with their traditions of origin and their worship of Dulha Deo, seems to imply some affinity with the former tribe. It is curious to find that the children of Koshta men by women of any of the Jālāchehramiṣya castes from whom a Brahman may take water are readily admitted into the Koshta community.

Koslié, a section of Goálás in the North-Western Provinces and Behar.

Kosuar, fish, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Kotá, a sub-caste of Báruis in Bengal; a section of Madhesiá Kándus in Behar.

Kotábándab, a totemistic sept of Juángs in Orissa.

Kotah Kaisi, a small vulture, a totemistic sept of Mundás in Chota Nagpur.

Kotál, Kotwal, a small Dravidian cultivating caste of Central Bengal, frequently employed as village watchmen. They believe themselves to be descendants of Guhak Muni, the traditional ancestor of the Chandáls, and it is possible that they may be a branch of that caste separated from the main group by their adopting the profession of Kotwal or village policeman. In Murshedabad they are divided into four sub-castes—Atpárá, Dhukursání, Kutabpur, and Manoharsáhi.
They have no sections, and regulate their marriages by counting prohibited degrees down to the seventh generation in the descending line. Kotáls marry their daughters by the regular ceremony followed by the lower castes of about their own standing. The binding portion of the rite is adtpák, the carrying of the bride seven times round the bridegroom. Polygamy is permitted when a man’s first wife is barren but is rarely resorted to. Neither widow-marriage nor divorce is recognised.

By religion the Kótáls are Saiva Hindus, worshipping Káli in the month of Kártik and Dharmaráj in Jaishita. Sasthi and Lakshmi are held in special reverence by their women. Their priests are a low class of Brahmans, who are looked down upon by other members of the sacred order.

Their original occupation they believe to be to perform the duties of village watchman, an office for which they sometimes hold small allotments of land rent free. Of late years, however, and especially since the introduction of the Chaukidari Act, they have rather tended to abandon these functions, their place being taken by members of other low castes. As cultivators, they usually hold land as non-occupancy raiyats, or work as agricultural labourers. Their social rank is much the same as that of the Chandáls. Some of them drink spirits, but this practice is by no means universal. For the rest their practice in the matter of diet is very much that of orthodox Hindus in general, and they look down upon the Bégdis and Háris as unclean feeders.
The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kotáls in 1881. The figures for 1872 are included with those of Chandáls.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwán</td>
<td>10,334</td>
<td>Rajsháh</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>2,533</td>
<td>Dacá</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>673</td>
<td>Chittagóng</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>16</td>
<td>Purush</td>
<td>115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooghly</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>69</td>
<td>Santál Parganas</td>
<td>559</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadia</td>
<td>366</td>
<td>Manubhum</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>1,402</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshidabad</td>
<td>1,768</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kotálipára, a samaj or local group of the Bharadvája gotra of Páshátya Baidik Brahmans in Bengal.

Kothádomar, a section of Soná in Behar.

Kothipál, a section of the Karan sub-caste of Káyahsths in Behar.

Kotoliá, probably a corruption of Kotwádi, a title of a class of rural policemen who hold allotments of land for keeping watch and ward in the town of Darbhanga, in Behar.

Kotri, a small deer, a totemistic sept of Chikhs in Chota Nagpur.

Kotsá or Korsá, a mul or section of the Chhamulia Madheśi and Bhojpuria sub-castes of Halwáis in Behar.

Kotsobhni, a mul or section of the Naomulia or Majraut sub-caste of Goálás in Behar.

Kotwal, Kotál, a pangat or section of Bánsphor Doms and Dosaðhs in Behar; a title of the Bágdí, Chandál, Hárí, and other castes in Bengal employed as chaukidars.

Kotwái, a synonym for Dámi.

Kotwár, a title of Khandáits and Rautilás and a sept of Kharwárs in Chota Nagpur.

Kowriar, a sept of Chikhs and Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Koyá, the wild dog, a totemistic section of Rautilás in Chota Nagpur.

Kraunchdwipi, a division of Brahmans in Behar including Jaisí, Jetkhi or Jetá, Dákutiá, Bhadáriá or Bharerti, Jadwá, Saguuní, Sanisherá.

Krishak, Krishán, Krishi, a title of those who work in the fields, whether as day-labourers or as cultivators of their own land.

Krishnakándári, a title of Pátíns, q.v.

Krishnátreya, a gotra or section of the Brahman, Baidya, Káyahst, and Gandhabinik castes in Bengal, and the Jhórás in Chota Nagpur.

Kritanya, a group of Gaura Brahmans in Behar.

Krong Khyungtsa, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Krubchhágí, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.
Kshám, a title of Dakshin-Rárhí and Bangaja Káyasths in Bengal.

Kshatri-Sankoch, a synonym for Kochh.

Kshatriya, the warrior caste in the traditional Hindu system. The word is now used mainly as a synonym for Rajput.

Kshem, a title of Dakshin-Rárhí and Bangaja Káyasths.

Kshetragrámi, a gáiś of the Bharadwája gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kshir, a sub-caste of Tántis in Bengal.

Kshom, a title of Dakshin-Rárhí and Bangaja Káyasths in Bengal.

Kshuri, razor, a title of Bhandařís in Orissa.

Kuar, a hypergamous division of the Maghaya sub-caste of Barhis in Behar.

Kuardar, a sept of Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Kuásanchhá, a thar or sept of Kumbus in Darjiling.

Kuchal, a section of the Bahán-najáti sub-caste of Khatris in Bengal.

Kuchhainá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kujhariá, a section of Awadhiá Hajjámos in Behar.

Kujrí, a fruit, from which oil is made; a sept of Mundas; a section of Goráits in Chota Nagpur.

Kujur, a fruit, the oil of which is used in anointing horns of cattle at the Sohoraí festival; a totemistic sept of Oraons; a section of Goráits.

Kuká, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kukar, a group of the Aoghar sect of Saiva ascetics founded in Guzerat by a Dasnami mendicant named Brahmagiri. See Aoghar.

Kukkuti, a gáiś of the Bátaya gotra of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kukral, a mul or section of the Kanaújiá sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Kuktáiáre, a sept of the Agniá sub-tribe of Meches in the Darjiling Terai.

Kukur, Kukura, dog, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kukurbandhá, a pur or section of the Sákadwípi Brahmins in Behar.

Kukurbans, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kukuriá, a sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kukurjhampar, a section of the Kanaújiá Lohárs in Behar.

Kul, a group of the Bárendra sub-caste of Sonárs in Eastern Bengal.

Kulabhi, a gáiś of the Sándilya gotra of Rárhí Brahmins in Bengal.

Kuláí, a synonym for Kumhár.

Kulchuliá, a section of the Suryabansí sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Kulden, a section of Murmis in Darjiling.
Kulhá, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Kulhai, a tiger, a totemistic sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Kulhariá, a sept of the Suryabansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Kulhasia, a sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kulin, (i) a hypergamous division of Rárhí Brahmans in Bengal attributed to Rájá Ballál Sen, who is said to have instituted similar divisions among the Baidyás and Káyastha. Other Hindu castes below the latter in rank have adopted the same system as they have done in the case of gotras or sections; (ii) a hypergamous division of the Paschim Kulyá Sadgops, including Bhálki, Kánkse, Fráháraj, and Siur, and of the Purbba Kulyá Sadgops in Midnapur, including Biswás, Neogi, and Sur; (iii) a hypergamous group of Chásádhobás and Subarnabanika in Bengal; of Karans in Orissa; (iv) a hypergamous group of Jugis comprising four families—Raghu, Mádhab, Nímaí, and Págmal. For a fuller treatment of the subject, see the article on Brahmán.

Kulin-rási, a section of Málos in Eastern Bengal.

Kulisá or Kulkuli, a gáin of the Sándilya gotra of Rárhí Brahmans in Bengal.

Kulkhwár, a muí or section of the Náiyá caste in Behar.

Kumhára, Kumár, Kumbhakár, the potter caste of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa. Concerning their traditional parentage there seems to be a wide difference of opinion among the recognised authorities on that subject. Thus the Brahmavaivartta Purána says that the Kumbhakár, or maker of water jars (kumbha), is born of a Vaiśya...
KUMHAR.

woman by a Brahman father; the Parásara Sanhité makes the father a Málákár (gardener) and the mother a Chamár; while the Parásara Padhati holds that the ancestor of the caste was begotten of a Tili woman by a Pattikár, or weaver of silk cloth. Sir Monier Williams, again, in his Sanskrit Dictionary, describes them as the offspring of a Kshatriya woman by a Brahman. Conjectures of this kind do not pretend to have any historical basis, and their only object is to reconcile the fact that there are many castes with the Brahmanical theory that there are only four. All beyond the canonical number are therefore supposed to have arisen from a complicated series of courses between the original four and their descendants; and if a new caste is formed, it is some one's business to find a mythical pedigree for it. Such pedigrees, however, are not taken very seriously, even by the people most concerned, and stories ascribing the origin of a caste to an act of special creation seem to be quite as popular as traditions of mixed descent. The Kumhárs, for example, say that at the marriage of Siva a water jar (ghat) was wanted, but no one knew how to make one. The god therefore took a bead from his necklace and with it created a potter; while with a second he made a woman, who became the potter's wife. This man was the father of all those who work in pottery, and in memory of their creator all potters bear the title Rudra Pál.

The endogamous subdivisions of the caste are very numerous, and vary a good deal from district to district. In Dacca, for instance, we find the five subdivisions Baré, Bhágiyá, Chhoté Bhágiyá, Rajmaháliá, Khatya, and Magi. The Baré Bhágiyá Kumhárs have separated into two divisions. The first, descended from Tilak Pál, only make black utensils; the second, sprung from Mádhava Pál, like the Chhota Bhágiyá, only manufacture red. In both sub-castes, again, there is a further grouping into Lál and Sádá, so called from the custom of wearing red or white clothes at the marriage ceremony.

The Rajmaháliá potters are quite distinct from the Khatya Kumhárs on the one hand and the Bengali Kumhár on the other. They originally came from Rajmahál with a member of the Banga Adhikárí family, and having tarried in Dacca for several generations lost caste, while those who subsequently arrived from Hindustán were in their turn likewise degraded. There are about two hundred houses belonging to these potters in Ja'farganj, Sultánganj, Ráí Bázár, and Kárwán, suburbs of Dacca, and the caste still speaks a language made up of Hindi and Bengali. Having been settled in Bengal for many years, the clean Súdra castes drink from their water-vessels, while the Súdra Brahman and other servants work for them. The sráddha, moreover, is celebrated after thirty days, as with the Nava-sákha.

The Khatya, or debased Kumhárs of Dacca, claim to belong to the Maghaiyá potter family of Patna. They drink water from the vessels of the other Kumhárs, and may give water to them, but hold no communication with the Rajmaháliá Kumhárs. None of the other Bengali Súdras, however, admit their equality. In Dacca they are all Nának Sháhifs in creed, the Mahant of the Shujá'atpür Akhāra being the Guru. Unlike the other sub-castes, they work throughout the month of Baisakh, and on the Dasharā make oblations of rice, wheat-flour, clay, and red lead to Mahādeo, their patron deity.

Khatya Kumhārs only work with chikni-matt, or potter's earth, manufacturing with the chāk, or horizontal wheel, long-necked flasks (surāh), lotas, pipes, water-spouts, balusters (gurarādā), and toys, but never idols. On the tenth day after death the Kantahā Brahman performs a religious service, at which he tastes the oblation rice. On the following day the sraddha is celebrated as among Chandāls and Ekādaś Jogs.

The Magi subdivision is outcasted, having a purohit of its own. Their debasement is referred to the days when the Maghs harried Eastern Bengal, and, entering houses, defiled the inmates. There seems no reason, however, for concluding that these degraded potters are the offspring of Maghs by Kumhār women, as they resemble in every feature the genuine stock of potters.

One of my correspondents in Dacca describes an entirely different arrangement of sub-castes, thus:—Chhota Bhāgiyā, Bikrampurīya, Jahàngirnagarī, Faitābājī, Bhāgaldāspuri. The last four names have a purely local significance. Jahṅgirnagar is the old name of Dacca, and its derivative is applied to the potters of the city; Faitābāj is the name of a pargana, and Bhāgaldāspur is a village in Bhowā. It appears, however, that these groups are not invariably endogamous, and that intermarriages between them are not absolutely prohibited. At present, then, they cannot certainly be ranked as sub-castes; and it is possible that they are merely organizations for trade purposes. Dr. Wise mentions that in the city of Dacca the Kumhārs have two dal, or trade unions—one known as Islampūr, the other as Bhāgalpūr, after two quarters of the city where the potters chiefly reside; while outside the city every four or five villages have a dal to promote the interests of the trade. The headman is styled Parāmānik, who, on account of the increase in the size of the caste, is obliged to employ assistants, Nāiks or Gumāshitas. They are treated with little deference, and merely execute the orders of their master.

The four sub-castes found in Noakhali—Bhaltiya, Sarāllā, Chāṭgāinya, and Sandwipā—appear to be based on differences of original habitat. In Pabna five sub-castes have been formed—Sırasthān, Májhāsthān, Chandanasāra, Chaurāsī, and Daspārā. The first are believed to have come from the North-Western Provinces, and are said to be descended from Premānanda, third son of the original potter, Rudra Pāl. Their habits are supposed to be unclean, and Brahmans will not take water from their hands. The Daspārā are said to be descended from Kulavanda, the eldest of Rudra Pāl's sons. The Chaurāsī, according to local tradition, were originally a branch of the Chandanaśra sub-caste, who settled among the Daspārā, but were not admitted by them to equal social rights. The immigrants waited their time, and took the first opportunity which offered of righting themselves. When the Nawāb of Murshed-abad chanced to be travelling in that part of the country, they presented to him a number of artificial flowers and fruits made of pottery. The imitation was so exact that in reward for their skill the Nawâb gave the settlers eighty-four villages, and permitted them to call themselves by the title Chaurâsî. From that time their social supremacy was secured, and they were able to impose upon the Daspâra sub-caste the condition that only those who admitted the superiority of the Chaurâsî should hold the title Parâmanîk; that those who served them with pân at marriage and social ceremonies should be called Pânpâtra; and that those who still insisted on holding aloof should be degraded to the lowest rank under the designation Mujgarni.

In Murshedabad and Hughli the sub-castes Bârendra and Rârhi are met with, the theory being that the original settlements of each group were in the large tracts of country whose name it bears. Some, however, say that the Bârendra Kumhârs are descended from one of the sons of Rudra Pâl, who had forcible intercourse with his own sister. The Daspâra sub-caste is also known in Murshedabad, where it is believed to be the offspring of one of Rudra Pâl's sons by a maid-servant. Its special function is supposed to be the manufacture of the shell bracelets which are worn by married women. The Jessore sub-castes appear to be only local.

In Behar, Chota Nagpur, and the Santál Parganas a wholly different set of sub-castes is met with. The Maghaiya, Kanaujiâ, and Tirhutiâ are named after large tracts of country; the Ayodhiâ-bâsi claim to be immigrants from Oudh; the Bangâli or Rârhi are Bengal Kumhârs who have settled in Behar; and the Turk-Kumhâr are Mahomedans. Of the rest, the Biahut forbid widows to marry again, and the Châpuâ take their name from a particular kind of earthen vessel which they make.

The Kumhârs of Orissa are divided into two endogamous sub-castes—Jagannâthi or Uriya Kumhârs, who work standing and make large earthen pots, and Khatya Kumhârs, who turn the wheel sitting and make small earthen pots, cups, toys, etc. The latter are immigrants from Upper India, whose number is comparatively insignificant.

In the matter of exogamy the practice of Kumhârs differs widely in different parts of the country. In Eastern Bengal, where the influence of Mahomedan usage is strong, only one or two sections are known to the caste, and marriage within the section is permitted. The Maghaiâ Kumhârs, on the other hand, and probably most of the Behar sub-caste, have a long array of sections, mainly of the titular type, but referring in some instances to local and territorial areas. A man may not marry a woman of his own section or of the sections to which his mother, paternal grandmother, or maternal grandmother belonged. The Jagannâthi Kumhârs of Orissa, who hold a tolerably high social position in that province, are subdivided for matrimonial purposes into the following exogamous sections:—Kaundinya, tiger; Sarpa, snake; Neul, weasel; Goru, cow; Mudîr, frog; Bhad-bhadri, sparrow; Kurma, tortoise. The members of each section express their respect for the animal whose name the section bears by refraining from killing or injuring it, and by bowing when they meet it. The entire caste also abstain from eating, and even go so far as to worship, the sūl fish, because the rings on its scales resemble the wheel, which is the symbol of their craft. The Khatya Kumhārs in Orissa have only one section (Kāsyapa), and thus, like the Rājbaneris of Rangpur, are really endogamous in spite of themselves. The reason probably is that there are too few of them in Orissa to set up a proper exogamous system, and they content themselves with the pretense of one. Both sub-castes appear to be conscious that the names of their sections are open to misconception, and explain that they are really the names of certain saints, who being present at Daksha’s horse sacrifice transformed themselves into animals to escape the wrath of Siva, whom Daksha, like Peleus in the Greek myth, had neglected to invite. It may well be that we owe the preservation of these interesting totemistic groups to the ingenuity of the person who devised this respectable means of accounting for a series of names so likely to compromise the reputation of the caste. In the case of the Khatya Kumhārs, the fact that their single section bears the name of Kāsyapa, while they venerate the tortoise (kachhap), and tell an odd story by way of apology for the practice, may perhaps lend weight to the conjecture, in itself a fairly plausible one, that many of the lower castes in Bengal who are beginning to set up as pure Hindus have taken advantage of the resemblance in sound between kachhap and kāsyap (chh and s both become sh in colloquial Bengali) to convert a totemistic title into an eponymous one, and have gone on to borrow such other Brahmanical gotras as seemed to them desirable. If, for example, we analyse the matrimonial arrangements of the Bhars of Manbhum, many of whom are the hereditary personal servants of the pseudo-Rajput Rājā of Pachete, we find the foregoing conjecture borne out by the fact that two out of the seven sections which they recognise are called after the peacock and the bel fruit, while the rest are eponymous. But this is an exceptionally clear case of survival, and I fear it is hardly possible to simplify the diagnosis of non-Aryan castes by laying down a general rule that all castes with a section bearing the name Kāsyapa, who have not demonstrably borrowed that appellation from the Brahmins, are probably offshoots from some non-Aryan tribe.

In Behar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpur Kumhārs still permit girls to be married as adults, though they hold infant-marriage to be more respectable. In Singhbhum and the Tributary States of Orissa adult-marriage is the rule. The Kumhārs of Bengal, on the other hand, have long conformed to the usage of the higher castes, and marry their daughters before the age of puberty.

Everywhere a bride-price (pan) is paid to the father of the bride, and in determining the amount of this the comparative social position of the parties is not usually taken into consideration. “It is considered,” says Dr. Wise, “a dishonouring act for a Kumhār to accept a wife without paying money to the father. Of late years the price has risen so much that the poorer young men find it difficult to procure wives at all.” One of my correspondents says, indeed, that it ranges from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,000, but I am inclined to suspect some exaggeration here. There are, however, signs of the development of a system of hypergamy, modelled on the Kulinism of the higher castes, which may lead in time to the conversion of the bride-price into a bridegroom-price. The Parámanik, Pánpátra, and Mujgarní groups mentioned above seem on the way to become hypergamous; and I am informed that a Kumhár of Bikrampur in Dacca would, within that district at any rate, be able to obtain a higher price for his daughter than would be paid to a member of another group. The marriage ceremony is of the orthodox type; the essential and binding portion of the ritual is usually Sindürón, or smearing vermilion on the bride’s forehead and the parting of her hair. The Jagannáthi Kumhárs of Orissa regard the knotting together of the clothes of the married couple as the most important feature in the ceremony. This is done by a Brahman after the offering of hom has been made. The Khatya Kumhárs follow much the same ceremony, but substitute for hom the worship of the goddess Bindubásini.

Polygamy is permitted to the limited extent that a man may take a second wife if his first wife has not borne him a son. Some say that he can only do so if the wife gives permission. It is certain, however, that polygamy is not much in vogue. Widow-marriage and divorce are not recognised by the Kumhárs of Bengal, who adhere strictly to the customs of the higher castes on these points. In Behar, Chota Nagpur, and Orissa a widow of any but the Biáhut sub-caste may marry again by the sagai or chumumá form, and is not ordinarily restricted in her choice by any positive obligation to marry her deceased husband’s younger brother should such a relative exist. Divorce is permitted on the ground of unchastity, with the sanction of the panchdyaat of the caste. In Orissa the finding of the panchdyaat is usually recorded on a palm-leaf, and the woman is allowed maintenance for six months. Divorced women are looked upon as degraded, but are permitted to marry again by the same ritual as widows.

Notwithstanding their alleged descent from the god Siva, Vaishnavism seems to be the favourite religion of the caste. In Eastern Bengal, Dr. Wise states that Kumhárs still worship the ancient Vedic deities Agní, Brahma, Indra, and Pavana, and on the first of Jaishtha (May–June), at the termination of the idle month, special services are held in their honour, at the same time as the festival of Viswa-Karmá is celebrated. With this exception, their religious observances in Bengal and Behar do not appear to differ materially from those of other Hindu castes of similar social standing. In Orissa Rádhá, Krishna, and Jagannáth are the deities most revered by the Uria Kumhárs. The Khatya Kumhárs, on the other hand, in Cuttack, as in Dacca, profess to follow the precepts of Guru Nának, while at the same time they worship Durgá under the name of Bindubásini. Among the Uria Kumhárs, Rudra Pál, the mythical ancestor of the caste, is worshipped as a sort of patron saint. His image is placed between the images of Rádhá and Krişna in the Bhagwat gadi, or room set apart for the reading of the sacred books of the Vaishnava sect, and on the Sukla Sásti, the sixth day of the new moon of the month of Aghrán, fried paddy, plantains, coconut, and similar offerings are presented to him. A Brahman recites mantras, or mystic invocations, and receives as his perquisite the articles offered to Rudra Pál. This festival is called Ohran Sásti. The Khatya Kumhárs pay a similar tribute to Kunwár, whom they regard as their ancestor, in the month of Srában. Sitalé, the goddess of small-pox, is worshipped in the same month, and Chaitra is regarded as sacred to the tutelary goddess Bindubásini. Kunwár is revered in Behar as the chief of the Gáíán, or spirits of departed Kumhárs, who exercise some vague sort of influence over human affairs, and have to be appeased by periodical sacrifices of goats and sweetmeats, which are afterwards divided among the members of the caste who attend at the ceremony. The snake goddess Bisohari, Sckhá, Sambhunath, Bandi, Goriayá, and the Pánc Pir, also rank among the minor deities of the caste, and are worshipped four times a year, in the months of Mágh, Pálgun, Baisákh, and Sráwan. In Chota Nagpur the religion of the caste seems to be of a more primitive type. Although professing Hinduism and worshipping in a general way all the gods of the regular pantheon, they also offer goats, molasses, ghi, and milk to the mountain gods Kánya Buru, Mátha Buru, and Káinki Buru, who are reverenced by the non-Aryan tribes. On the occasions of this worship Brahmans officiate as priests and take the offerings. It might perhaps be argued that the cult is a genuine survival, indicating that the Kumhárs of that part of the country are merely an offshoot from a non-Aryan tribe; but I think it equally possible that we have to deal with mere imitation, encouraged by the desire to appease the local gods.

\footnote{1 In Singbhum she is expected to marry her deceased husband’s younger brother.}

On the first of Baisákh the Bengal Kumhárs put an image of the god Śiva on their wheel (chák), and leave the wheel unturned during the whole month. On the thirtieth day Śiva is formally worshipped, and his effigy is thrown into a river or tank. The wheel is then again brought into use. Viswakarma, the artificer of the gods, is worshipped on the last day of Paus. All the implements of the potter's craft are laid before him, and offerings of fruits, sweetmeats, and the like are presented.

For the service of the greater gods Kumhárs, like other members of the Nava-Sákha group, employ Brahmans, who are for the most part received on equal terms by other members of the sacred order, although less esteemed than those Brahmans who themselves serve Brahmans only.

The dead are burned by all except the very poor, who cannot afford the wood for the funeral pyre. The Kumhárs of Bengal and Orissa perform the ceremony of śraddh on the thirtieth day after death, in much the same fashion as the higher castes. Among the Kumhárs of Behar and Chota Nagpur and the Khatya Kumhárs of Bengal and Orissa, the Kantha Brahman celebrates a religious service and tastes the oblation rice on the tenth day after death, and the regular erdddh is performed on the eleventh day. Some, however, say the thirteenth, and it is possible that the practice may differ in different parts of the country. Libations (tarpan) for the benefit of ancestors in general are poured forth in the month of Aswin every year.
KUMHAR. 524

The social standing of the caste is respectable. In Bengal they are recognised as members of the Navasákha group, and in Behar and Orissa Brahmans take water from their hands. The Jagannáthi Kumbárs of Orissa, though professing Vaishnavism and deeming it praiseworthy to abstain from the flesh of any living creature, nevertheless eat goats which have been sacrificed to the gods, deer, wild boars, and all fish except the sél. They also partake of the leavings of Brahmans, and at the mahotsab, or sacred feast of the Vaishnava sect, they will eat cooked food with Khandáyats. Orh-Chássés, Gurías, Chhutárs, Kámárs, Goélás, Telís, Nápita, and Tántís. On no other occasion will they eat with, or take water from, a man of a caste lower than Teli. Smoking from a hookah is governed by the rule about water, but cigars may be taken from any one. Khatya Kumbárs eat goats and all kinds of scaly fish, and also the leavings of Nának Sháhi priests. Neither sub-caste permits the use of strong drink. In Bengal the Kumbárs eat sacrificial animals—deer, ducks, geese, and pigeons. Boiled rice they take only from Brahmans; water and sweetmeats from members of the Nava-Sákha group. The Kumbárs of Behar eat cooked food and smoke only with their own caste, but take sweetmeats and water from Koiris, Gangotás, and the large group of castes from whom a Brahman may take water. Goat flesh and mutton, and all kinds of fish except the bagár, are lawful food. Strong drink is also indulged in, but it is thought more respectable to abstain.

In Dacca, says Dr. Wise, the manufacture of pottery is still in its infancy, and no improvement can be looked for so long as the obligation of breaking all cooking utensils after a death, or any sort of ceremonial pollution, limits Hindus to the use of the cheapest kinds of pottery. The wheel in use is the Roman rota, a circular table of baked clay weighted along the rim, revolving rapidly on a pivot cut from the heart of a tamarind tree. The neck and shoulders of all globular vessels are made with the wheel (chakk), but the body is fashioned by hand, often by women. A round ball of hardened clay (boild) is held inside, while with a wooden mallet (piind) the material is beaten from the outside into the requisite shape and thinness. Two kinds of earth are used by the Dacca Kumbárs: one called báli, the other kála matti; and one part of the former mixed with two of the latter are employed in the production of the strongest pottery. For making the common red earthenware vessels red laterite earth from Bhowál is used, the colour of the rim being deepened by coating it with a mixture of catechu (kath) and fuller’s earth. The cheap red and black earthenware are both prepared with the same clay, the latter being blackened by covering up the kiln at a certain stage and adding oil-cake to the fire. Bengali potters cannot glaze or fix the colours on the ware, but are content to paint the vessel after it has been baked. Their colours are always mixed with mucilage, obtained from bela or tamarind seeds. Red paints are prepared with red lead; yellow with arsenic (hartal); green by mixing yellow arsenic and indigo; and black with lamp-black, charred rice, or nal reeds. A gloss is often imparted with the white of duck's eggs, but as this washes off before long, garjan oil is more generally used. Idols, toys, and tobacco-bowls are also painted with these colours, and the images of deities are further embellished by having powdered mica sprinkled over them while the paint is still wet. The Dacca Kumhars manufacture bricks, tiles, earthenware of all shapes and sizes, idols, and toys; the two last being moulded if of small size.

The manufactory of the Kumhár well repays a visit. Beneath the same thatched roof are the kiln, storehouse, and dwelling-house, while at the door the clay is prepared. The kiln is called the pan, from the Sanskrit Pavana, that which purifies, and the hut the pangwar. The kiln is divided into compartments, in which the newly-made vessels are arranged, earth being heaped over all. Wood is never used to heat it, but grass, reeds, or bamboo stems are the ordinary combustibles.

Although Kumhars are prohibited from using the chák during the month of Baisakh, because Visvakarma, the great artificer, rested from his labours during that month, they are permitted to dig and store clay. A potter never cultivates the soil or serves as a domestic servant, but he has no objections to become a trader, a cloth merchant, a writer, or a servant to a shopkeeper. The village potter occasionally holds chakarán land, on the condition that he supplies the vessels required at all festivals observed by the zamindár or the village community. Hindu households generally contract for their annual supply of earthenware, while a few pay the market rate for what is wanted. The pottery made at Rái Bazár, in Dacca, bears a great name throughout Eastern Bengal, and in the cold season boats laden with coconuts arrive from Sondip, Noakhali, and Bárganj, returning full of pots and pans from this mart. Vijayapur, in Tipperah, is another bazár famous for the excellence of its pottery.

Rájmahálía Kumhars have a curious custom, which is a source of much wit among Bengalis. They thatch the drying houses with green grass, merely fastening it down with weights, but never tying it, and when dry the thatch is used for lighting the kiln fire. They manufacture cooking pots for vegetables, milk-pans (ras-dokana), and salvers on which sweetmeats and other delicacies are handed round at weddings, but will not make idols or platters used in offerings to deities.

Like the Bengali Kumhars, they do no work during the month of Baisakh, and on the first Saturday of that month celebrate the worship of Visvakarma. They work double during the previous month Chaitra, and it is lawful to bake the pottery in Baisakh. At the time of worship their trade implements and manufactures are arranged on the top of the kiln and ornamented with bel leaves, while the usual oblations are presented. The purohit, meanwhile, mutters a few incantations, soliciting the favour of the divine workman. Once a year, when the kiln is filled, the caste Brahman officiates at the Agni Pújá. Offerings are made of rice, plantains, cocoanut, sweetmeats, and a piece of cloth.
KUMHAR. 526 KUNCHBANDHWÁ.

The wives of these Kumhárs assist their husbands, fashioning the globular part of the vessels, while the men make the necks and rims. Kumhárs are singular in placing over their wells an earthenware rim or chák, admirably suited for preventing the ingress of filth. It is made by themselves, but has not been adopted by any other class.

The foregoing description of the occupation of the potter caste is substantially correct at the present day. Kumhárs, however, are not so exclusively devoted to their characteristic profession as Dr. Wise makes them out to be. In Orissa some of them follow the trade of carpenters and bricklayers, and everywhere a certain proportion of the caste is engaged in agriculture. This, however, is a comparatively recent departure, and few of them have risen above the status of tenure-holders or occupancy raiyats. Cultivating Kumhárs still regard the chák as the symbol of their caste, and brand their cattle with a rude representation of it. In Chota Nagpur the Maghaiya Kumhárs are looked down upon by the Kanaujia sub-caste because they castrate bullocks.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of Kumhárs in 1872 and 1881:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th></th>
<th>District</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>19,947</td>
<td></td>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>10,945</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>4,518</td>
<td></td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>3,825</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>7,585</td>
<td></td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>3,618</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>20,122</td>
<td></td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>22,688</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hugli</td>
<td>8,686</td>
<td></td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>25,939</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>14,973</td>
<td></td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>19,931</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24 Parganas</td>
<td>16,474</td>
<td></td>
<td>Monoucharpur</td>
<td>33,406</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>30,430</td>
<td></td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>25,341</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>8,332</td>
<td></td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>21,911</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>10,933</td>
<td></td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>17,731</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munschedabad</td>
<td>31,278</td>
<td></td>
<td>Monoukry</td>
<td>20,961</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burdwan</td>
<td>6,408</td>
<td></td>
<td>Bhakpur</td>
<td>20,909</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahiye</td>
<td>7,356</td>
<td></td>
<td>Purnah</td>
<td>11,013</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rangpur</td>
<td>5,083</td>
<td></td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>3,604</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roara</td>
<td>5,748</td>
<td></td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>14,755</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palna</td>
<td>20,393</td>
<td></td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>16,143</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>345</td>
<td></td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>9,066</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalpiwari</td>
<td>3,215</td>
<td></td>
<td>Balsore</td>
<td>10,599</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuch Behar</td>
<td>1,101</td>
<td></td>
<td>Trubutary States</td>
<td>10,097</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dacca</td>
<td>14,355</td>
<td></td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>16,559</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Partipur</td>
<td>3,166</td>
<td></td>
<td>Lohardagaon</td>
<td>16,085</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>13,748</td>
<td></td>
<td>Pumbhujun</td>
<td>7,145</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munnansinh</td>
<td>10,333</td>
<td></td>
<td>Mabudhun</td>
<td>24,501</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Kumháriá, a section of the Banodiá and Jaiswár Kalwárs in Behar; a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Kuna, a stone quarry, a title of the Karangá caste in Singhbhum.

Kunbáhong, a sept of Limbus in Darjiling.

Kunbi, a synonym for Kurmi.

Kunchbandhwá, a maker of the kas-kas brushes (kunch), used by weavers to smooth the threads of the warp before it is put into the loom. The occupation is usually followed by Nats and by Mahomedans, who combine with it the castration of cattle.
KUNDAIL.

Kundail, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kundalā, a gām of the Sābarna gotra of Rārhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Kundārk, a pur or section of Sākadwipi Brahmans in Behar.

Kundi, a section of Awadhi Hajjáms in Behar.

Kundiar, a section of Kurmis in Chota Nagpur and Orissa; a section of Mahilis in Western Bengal.

Kundil, a section of Rautiás in Chota Nagpur.

Kundkar, a turner, denoting more particularly workers in horn, who are always Mahomedans. The Kundkar makes combs, pegs for shoes, small boxes (dibiya) for keeping medicines and various odds and ends. They despise the Kasai and the Kuti and decline to intermarry with them.

Kundri, a vegetable used in making curry, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Kundu, Kunda, a title of Aguris, Gandhabaniks, Kaibarttas, Káyasthas, Tántis, Telis, Sánkharis, Sutrardhars, and certain other castes in Bengal.

Kundula, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kunjakuli, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kunjalwár, a section of Bábhans in Behar.

Kunjasiri, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kunjilwár-Malangiá, a mui of the Kátyáyan section of Maithil Brahmans in Bengal.

Kunjilwár-Sater, a mui of the Kátyáyan section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kunjilwár-Ullu, a mui of the Kátyáyan section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kunjilwár-Bhakrain, a mui of the Kátyáyan section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kunjilwár-Digaun, a mui of the Kátyáyan section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kunjilwár-Bhakhruli, a mui of the Kátyáyan section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kunjrá, a greengrocer who sells tarkári and sabji—an occupation usually, but not exclusively, followed by Mahomedans in Behar. In Dacee, according to Dr. Wise, Kunja is used as a term of abuse, and the fruit sellers call themselves Meewa-farosh, Sabzi-farosh or Bepári.

Kunkál, a title of Kumhárs.

Kunot, a sub-caste of Gonrhis in Behar.

Kuns, a section of Binjhiás in Chota Nagpur.

Kuntiá, a sept of Hos in Singbhum.

Kunwar, a section of Bháts.

Kunwardár, a section of Cheros in Chota Nagpur.

Kurá, a sept of Chakmáis in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kurái, a pur or section of Sákadwipi Brahmans in Behar; a sept of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kural, a title of Kaibarttas in Bengal.
KURAMBI.

Kurambi, a synonym for Kurmi.

Kurga, a sub-caste of Karangas in Western Bengal who are employed in making bamboo baskets.

Kuri, a sub-caste of Dosadhua who make their living as bird-catchers, and occasionally as peddlers. A synonym for Mayarai, Madhukuri, or Madhumapit, etc.

Kurin, a sub-caste of Dosadhas and Gonruis in Behar; of Mallhaus in Behar, usually employed as boatmen.

Kurisarjan, a subdivision of the Meches, also called Mechkuri, who sell oil.

Kurmi, Kunbi, Kurambi, a very large cultivating caste of Upper India, Behar, Chota Nagpur, and Orissa. Their origin is obscure, and their meagre traditions throw no light upon the subject, being for the most part mythological tales of a trivial character, or legends relating to recent migrations of comparatively small sections of the caste. Writing of the Kurmis of Behar, Buchanan classes them among the “aboriginal Hindu nations that were not of sufficient consequence to be admitted into the order of Kshatris, but too powerful to be thrust into the dregs of impurity.”1 In another place he mentions as not wholly untenable the opinion that the Kurmis of Gorakhpur are the same as the Tharus, adding, however, that the Kurmis strenuously deny the connexion, they being nearly as pure as the Ahirs.2 The only evidence in support of this view seems to be the fact that the title Dhelphor, or ‘clod-breaker,’ given by Buchanan as the name of a Kurmi tribe, is found also among the Tharus. This, however, proves nothing, as the term might obviously be applied to any class of regular cultivators. On the other hand, it is perfectly possible that a branch of the Tharus on taking to settled cultivation may have sought to connect themselves, under the name of Dhelphor Kurmis, with the leading agricultural caste of the Ganges Valley. Sir Henry Elliot,3 Mr. Sherring,4 and Mr. Nesfield5 treat the caste as an accomplished fact, and venture on no conjecture regarding its probable origin. Sir George Campbell, speaking of the Kurmis of Hindustan, says they are on an average darker and less good-looking 1 Eastern India, i, 166.

2 Ibid., ii, 469.
3 Races of the North-Western Provinces, p. 155.
4 Hindu Tribes and Castes, i, 323.
than Brahmans and Rajputs, but still quite Aryan in their features, institutions, and manners. Colonel Dalton regards them as the descendants of some of the earliest of the Aryan colonists of Bengal—a brown, tawny-coloured people, of average height, well-proportioned, rather lightly framed, and with a fair amount of good looks. They show well-shaped heads and high features, less refined than Brahmans, less martial than Rajputs, of humbler mien even than the Goálás; but, except when they have obviously intermixed with aborigines, they are unquestionably Aryan in looks. Grey eyes and brownish hair are sometimes met with amongst them. The women have usually small and well-formed hands and feet."

The foregoing description clearly refers only to the Kurmis of Behar, who are on the whole a fine-looking race, though perhaps hardly so Aryan in appearance as Colonel Dalton seeks to make out. The caste bearing the same name in Chota Nagpur and Orissa belongs to an entirely different type. Short, sturdy, and of very dark complexion, these Kurmis closely resemble in feature the Dravidian tribes around them. In Manbhum and the north of Orissa it is difficult to distinguish a Kurmi from a Bhumij or a Santál, and the latter tribe, who are more particular about food than is commonly supposed, will eat boiled rice prepared by Kurmis; and according to one tradition regard them as half-brethren of their own, sprung from the same father, who begot the Kurmis on the elder and the Santáls on the younger of two sisters. The distinct and well-preserved totemism of the caste is noticed at length below.

The question then arises—are these Kurmis a degraded branch of the Kurmis of Behar and Upper India, or should they be treated as a separate caste formed out of Dravidian elements and owing their name to the accident of their having devoted themselves exclusively to cultivation? Colonel Dalton does not distinctly commit himself to either view; but it is clear from his account of the caste that he was conscious of the difficulty, and was inclined on the whole to dispose of it by the hypothesis of degradation. This theory, however, fails entirely to account either for the remarkably uniform type of the Chota Nagpur Kurmis or for their totemistic usages. The latter point, however, appears to have been unknown to Colonel Dalton, and might possibly have induced him to change his opinion. Three hypotheses seem to be more or less tenable:—(1) that the class Kurmi is made up of two distinct stocks, the one Aryan and the other Dravidian; (2) that the entire group comes of an Aryan stock, the type of which has been modified to a varying extent by mixture of blood and vicissitudes of occupation; (3) that the entire group was originally Dravidian, but that those portions of it which lay in the track of the Aryan invasion were refined by intercourse with the immigrants, while those who settled in remote parts of the country preserved their primitive type.

\[1 \text{Ethnology of India, p. 99, in J. A. S. B., vol. xxxv, part II.} \]
\[2 \text{Ethnology of Bengal, p. 320.} \]
The internal structure of the Kurmi caste is shown in a tabular form in Appendix I. In Behar the chief sub-castes are the following:—Ayodhiyá or Awadhiyá, Chanaur, Ghamelá, Jaiswár, Kachaisá, Ramaiyá, Sanswár. The Ayodhiya claim to be of the highest dignity and purest blood, coming, as their name indicates, from Oudh, where they are usually cultivators, while in Bengal they often enlist in the native army or serve as constables. The Jaiswár, less punctilious than the Ayodhiyá, are husbandmen, proverbial for industry and skill, who, from indulging in spirits and permitting their widows to marry, are held to be degraded. In Manbhum we find four endogamous groups,—Kurum, Adh-Kurmi or Madhyam-Kurmi, Sikhariá or Chhota-Kurmi, and Nich-Kurmi. The Kurum aver that they are the original nucleus of the entire caste, and explain that the other groups were degraded for eating fowls and drinking spirituous liquor. To these ceremonial offences the Nich-Kurmi add great sexual laxity, and pay little regard to the chastity of young girls before marriage. In the north of Chota Nagpur two sub-castes appear to exist, Magahiá, who are supposed to be immigrants from Behar and conform on the whole to Hindu practices, and Bagsariá or Bāgsariá, whose usages are more of an aboriginal type. The latter group is popularly supposed to derive its name from Buxar, in Shahabad; but the traditional reverence with which its members regard the tiger, and the occurrence of the same name as a section among wilder cognate castes, incline me to look upon it as totemistic. There is no evidence whatever in favour of the opinion that this sub-caste came from Buxar, and this notion is merely another instance of the common striving to find a rational explanation of terms the meaning of which has been forgotten. In Orissa we have Gáysari, Maisásari, Bagsari, and Gádásari.1 The first two are more Hinduised than the others, and are said to have given up eating pork, fowls, etc. The two lower divisions have no objection to marry into the upper divisions, but such marriages are extremely rare, and entail degradation of the members of the higher groups. The sections in use among the Kurmis of Chota Nagpur and Orissa are purely totemistic, and it will be seen from Appendix I that a large proportion of the totems are capable of being identified. In Behar, on the other hand, the section-names are titular, and the tendency is to discard the primitive rule of exogamy in favour of the more modern system of reckoning prohibited degrees by the formula quoted in the article on Bais. Where the section rule is in force, it is usually held that a man may not marry a woman of his own section, or of the sections to which his mother and his paternal and maternal grandmothers belonged. These facts tell in favour of the theory that all Kurmis are derived from a Dravidian stock: for, if the Behar Kurmis had been originally Aryans, they could have had no motive for discarding their original section-names; whereas a Dravidian tribe intimately associated with Aryans and 1 Some interpret these names as having reference to the cow, the buffalo, the crane, and a pit or hollow in the ground (gādd). I mention the explanation for what it may be worth.

subjected to Aryan influences would certainly be anxious to cast off totemistic designations which would serve only as a badge of social inferiority. It should be observed, moreover, that even in Behar the Kurmis have not risen high enough to establish a claim to use the Brahmanical gotras, and have had to content themselves with a titular series of names; while in Bengal they are excluded, on the ground of their Dravidian descent, from the group of castes from whose hands a Brahman can take water.

Among Behar Kurmis the general practice is that girls are married as infants, adult-marriage being resorted to only in those cases where the girl's parents are too poor to conform to the fashion which requires that she should have been provided with a husband before reaching the age of puberty. The ceremony is of the orthodox type, and was formerly followed by an elaborate entertainment given by the bridegroom. In course of time, however, the rivalry of neighbouring families made this a source of such heavy expense that the Kurmis determined to abolish the custom, and now refuse to ask for or to give money on such occasions. In Chota Nagpur and Orissa, though the tendency is on the whole towards infant-marriage, adult-marriage is still in full force, and sexual intercourse between unmarried people is tacitly recognised, it being understood that if the girl becomes pregnant her lover will come forward to marry her before her child is born. In such intrigues the law of exogamy must be strictly observed, and intercourse between members of the same totem is reckoned as incest and punished by expulsion from the caste. The marriage ceremony is of a highly primitive character, and comprises several usages of special interest. After the preliminary negotiations have been completed and a bride-price (pan), varying from Rs. 3 to Rs. 9, has been paid to the parents of a girl, an auspicious day for the marriage is fixed on the basis of certain astrological data, which are usually arrived at by consulting a Brahman skilled in such matters. Early on the wedding morning the betrothed pair, each in their own homes, are separately married to trees—the bride to a mahúá (Bausea latifolia), and the bridegroom to a mango (mangifera Indica). This curious rite merits full description. Wearing on the right wrist a bracelet of the leaves of the mahúá, the bride walks round the tree seven times, and then sits in her mother's lap on an earthen platform built close to the trunk. While sitting in this position her right hand and right ear are tied to the tree with thread by her elder sister's husband or by some male member of the household, and she is made to chew mahúá leaves, which are afterwards eaten by her mother. Last of all, lights are lit round the tree, and it is solemnly worshipped by all present. The same ritual is separately performed by the bridegroom, with the difference that in his case the tree is a mango, and is circled nine times instead of seven. The people who practise this singular ceremony believe that by it all misfortunes of the bride and bridegroom are somehow forestalled and transferred to the tree, which thus acts as a sort of scapegoat. Instances of similar superstitions are given by Tylor and Peschel.\footnote{Primitivo Culture, ii, 149: Volkerkunde, 263.}
however, as possible that we may have here a survival of a still more ancient idea—the notion that a virgin, before being married, must be dedicated to some god, who exercises the right to her person, which, in the first beginnings of communal life, is supposed to have been claimed by the tribe.

On the completion of the rite by the bridegroom (the bride, as I have stated, goes through it separately in her own home), his friends form a procession and escort him to the bride’s house, the time of starting being arranged so that the party shall arrive in the evening. On reaching the house the bride’s people come out to meet the bridegroom, and daub sandal wood paste on his forehead, using the point of an areca nut for this purpose. He is then taken to a wedding canopy made of sal branches, where the bride joins him, and both march seven times round a sacred fire represented by an earthen vessel with a lamp burning inside it. Meanwhile the maternal uncles of the bride and bridegroom exchange plates of rice in token of friendship and social intercourse. After circling the fire the wedded pair sit down together on a platform of dried clay built under the canopy, and the bridegroom touches the bride between the breasts with a drop of his own blood, drawn by cutting through the nail of his little finger and mixed with lac-dye. This symbolical transfusion of blood marks the transfer of the bride from her own to her husband’s section, and is evidently the original form of the widespread custom of sindurdán.

Oddly enough, the next stage of the ritual is sindurdán, performed in the ordinary way by smearing vermillion on the bride’s forehead and the parting of her hair. At the same time an iron bracelet (khâru) is put on the bride’s left wrist. This double observance of sindurdán, in its original and its derivative form, may probably be accounted for by supposing the latter to have been adopted from the Hindus after its connexion with the former and less civilised practice had been lost sight of. It gives an excellent illustration of the facility with which customs, like myths, pass from tribe to tribe and are adopted by men as the fancy strikes them, without any one taking the trouble to inquire into their original meaning.

The Kurmis of Behar usually employ Brahmans to preside at their marriages and to recite sacred texts (mantras) at certain stages of the ceremony. In Chota Nagpur and Orissa Brahmans are not called in: the eldest male of the household, the Léyé of the village, or in some cases the brothers-in-law of the bride and bridegroom, take the leading part in the ritual. In the matter of polygamy the Behar Kurmis profess to hold that a man may only take a second wife in the event of the first being barren; but this rule is frequently transgressed in practice by those who can afford to maintain several wives. In Orissa, again, polygamy appears to be regarded with disfavour, and it is deemed more respectable for a man to have but one wife. The Kurmis of Chota Nagpur, on the other hand, recognise no restrictions at all except those imposed by the standard of living common in the caste.

All Kurmis except the Ayodhiá sub-caste in Behar allow a widow to marry again, and require her to marry her husband’s younger brother or younger cousin, even though he be already married, on pain of forfeiting not merely all claims to a share in her husband’s property, but also the custody of all children whom she may have had by him. The idea seems to be that she has been bought at a price, and belongs to the family that bought her. If she is perverse enough to fall in love with an outsider, no active measures are taken to prevent her from marrying him, but she may take nothing with her—not even the children begotten on her by her late husband. In some cases she is allowed to retain temporary charge of female children or of infants at the breast; but she is bound to make them over before they attain a marriageable age, in order that her late husband’s family may not be deprived of the bride-price payable for the girls. The ceremony in use at the marriage of a widow is comparatively simple, consisting merely of putting on bracelets and applying vermilion, which is touched by the bridegroom and then smeared on the bride’s forehead by some of the married women of her own or the bridegroom’s family. Others, again, say that this must be done by widows; and in parts of Manbhum the widow has to undergo the indignity of receiving sindur from the bridegroom’s great toe.

Divorce is permitted, with the sanction of the panchéyat, on the ground of the wife’s adultery or barrenness, or if the couple cannot get on together. The husband pours some water on the ground or tears a leaf in two to symbolise separation, while the wife must give up the iron ring (kháru) which was placed on her wrist at her marriage. Three months’ alimony is usually given to the wife. Divorced women may marry again by the same ceremony as widows. The Midnapur Kurmis profess not to allow divorce, and there are symptoms among them of a tendency to abandon widow marriage.

In the matter of inheritance Behar Kurmis follow the standard Hindu law; while in Chota Nagpur and Orissa traces of an earlier tribal custom may still be discerned, under which the eldest son gets twice the share of his brothers, and a son by a bihádi wife, married as a virgin by the full ceremony, has a similar advantage over sons by sagai wives. An actual instance will illustrate the working of the rule. A Kurmi dies leaving three sons and three khrís of land; the eldest gets a khrí and a half, the two younger three-fourths of a khrí apiece. If there were two sons—one by a bihádi and the other by a sagai wife, the former would get two khrís and the latter one. Daughters and daughters’ sons are excluded by male agnates, such as cousins; but in Orissa an only daughter may claim something on account of her marriage expenses.

The religion of the Behar Kurmis differs little from that of other Hindu castes of similar social standing. Maithil or Tirhutía Brahmans usually serve them as priests, and are received on terms of equality by other members of the sacred order. By preference they appear to incline rather to Vaishnavism, but votaries of Siva and the Saktis are also found among them. Besides the minor gods ordinarily worshipped in Behar, the members of the Sanswár sub-caste have a special deity of their own, called Mokini Mahato, who is said to have been a Kurmi. I have been unable to ascertain on what grounds he was deified. He-kids are sacrificed to him occasionally, and various kinds of sweetmeats offered, but there appear to be no fixed days for his worship. In Eastern Bengal members of the Ayodhyá sub-caste employ Sakadwipi Brahmans for religious and ceremonial purposes, and have Atit or Vaishnava mendicants for their Gurus. The majority are followers of Kabír, Dará Dás, or Rámánand. In the same parts of the country the Jaiswár Kurmis favour the Pánch Píryá creed, eating any animal offered in sacrifice to a Hindu deity, and at the same time keeping the Muharam and fasting during the Ramazan, while a few are followers of Nának Sháh and Kabír.

In Chota Nagpur and Oriiisa the Kurmis are in a still earlier stage of religious development. The animistic beliefs characteristic of the Dravidian races are overlaid by the thinnest veneer of conventional Hinduism, and the vague shapes of ghosts or demons who haunt the jungle and the rock are the real powers to whom the average Kurmi looks for the ordering of his moral and physical welfare. Chief among these is Bar-Pahár, the mountain deity of the Santals; Gosain Rái, perhaps a variant of Gosain Eré; Ghát, any striking hill pass, such as the Dhangará Pass, near Chatra, which figures in the early traditions of the caste; Gároár, who watches over cows; Grámeswari, the patron goddess of the village; Kinchekeśwari; Boram-devi; Sá-t-bahani; Dakum Buri, and Mahámái. The functions and attributes of these deities are not susceptible of close definition, and the worshippers seem to be conscious of little more than a vague notion that by sacrificing goats, sheep, fowls, etc., and offering libations of rice-beer, certain material calamities, such as disease and bad harvests, may be warded off. In this worship Brahmans usually take no part, and either the head of the household officiates or a professional hedge-priest (dehari or lāyā) is called in; but to this rule there is a curious exception in the Bámangháti pargana of Moharbanj, where Brahman priests offer fowls to the goddess Kinchekeśwari on behalf of her Kurmi votaries. Jitibáhán, again, a deity whose attributes I cannot ascertain, is said to be worshipped only by women, assisted by degraded Brahmans. In respect of the employment of Brahmans, the practice of the Kurmis of Chota Nagpur and Oriiisa is by no means uniform. In Midnapur they call in the assistance of Brahmans on all religious and ceremonial occasions, but these priests are held to be degraded by rendering this service, and are not received on equal terms by other members of their own order. In Manbhum, Lohardagá, and Moharbanj Brahmans assist only in the funeral ceremonies of the caste, and all other religious functions, including marriage, are discharged by the eldest Kurmi who is present at the time. The Moharbanj Kurmis affect to get their Brahmans from Sikharbhum, and some of these claim to be of the Rárhi sub-caste, though such pretensions would of course not be recognised by the Brahmans of Bengal.
Besides the Bändhná Parab, which is common to them and the Santáls, the Akhan Játá, or cake festival, deserves notice as being peculiar to the Kúrmis.

"On the last day of the month of Pús (in the middle of January), when the granaries are full, the people make cakes in the shape of a double cone, called gargaria pithá, put on their best attire, and assemble on a green outside their village, and the young men and women form circles and dance and sing. This is followed by a joust of archery: a cock is thrown up in the air, and this is continued till one of the young men manages to shoot the bird with an arrow. The successful archer is then treated as the hero of the day."

As a general rule all Kúrmis, except the very poor, burn their adult dead, and perform obsequies resembling the regular śrāddh more or less closely according to the standard of ceremonial purity recognised in the caste. Thus the Jaiswár Kúrmis celebrate the śrāddh on the thirty-first day after death, following herein the traditional period of mourning ordained for the Sudras; the Ayodhíá, claiming higher rank and greater purity of blood, mourn for twelve days only, and perform the śrāddh on the thirteenth; while the Kúrmis of Chota Nagpur and Oríssa, like most Dravidians working up to Hinduism, observe the term of mourning laid down for Brahmans, and hold obsequies on the eleventh day. In Gýá unmarried persons of either sex are buried, but this appears to be merely an extension of the common practice of burying children, which is probably traceable to the desire to avoid the expense of cremation. Burial is also resorted to in Chota Nagpur and Oríssa in cases where death has been caused by cholera or small-pox, and the body is laid in the grave face downwards, the idea being that the spirits of those who die by a rapid and fatal disease, arising from the malice of a special demon, can be prevented by this device from returning after death and spreading infection among the living.

A Kúrmi woman is unclean until three ceremonies have been performed. On the sixth day after birth the Gulháti Chháthi is observed, at which the mother is obliged to drink rice-gruel. On the twelfth day the Báráthi is kept, and a feast provided for ten or twelve children. Lastly, on the Bísá, or twentieth day, the mother paints the well with red lead, draws water, and is deemed clean.

In Behar the social rank of the caste is respectable, and Brahmans will take water from their hands; while they themselves profess to follow the rules of diet which are binding on all respectable Hindus. The Jaiswár sub-caste, however, are supposed in some districts to eat fowls and field-rats. In Chota Nagpur and Oríssa their practice is far more lax. By abstaining from beef and pork they have raised themselves a step higher than the Santáls, Oraons, and other non-Hinduised tribes; but the fact that they eat fowls and field-rats, both abominable in the eyes of the orthodox, and indulge freely in spirituous liquors, excludes them from the circle of castes.

1 Dalton’s Ethnology of Bengal, p. 320.
2 In Oríssa this reform has been adopted quite recently. from whose hands a Brahman can take water. Their standing in these districts, though not very clearly defined, is sufficiently indicated by the circumstance that in the north of Orissa Magahiya Kumhârs, Bhuiyâs, and Rajvârs are the highest castes who will admit that they can take water and sweetmeats from Kurmis. On the other hand, the Kurmis themselves have some curious prejudices in the matter of food, in which perhaps we may discern traces of the traditional antipathy to Brahmans which distinguishes the Santál. A Kurmi, for example, will not touch food cooked by any Brahman except his own guru; while a Kurmi woman will not eat food prepared by her husband’s guru. Santâls will eat food cooked by a Kurmi, but the Kurmis will not return the compliment, though they will smoke from the same hookah as a Santál, and will take water from his hands. In Eastern Bengal, according to Dr. Wise, Kâyasthas, but not Brahmans, will drink from a Kurmi’s water-vessel and smoke from his hookah.

Agriculture is regarded by the Kurmis as their original and characteristic profession, and no marked tendency to engage in other occupations seems to be traceable among them, although of late years a few have taken to trading in grain. In Behar Kurmis are sometimes employed as personal servants in the households of the higher castes; and this practice, which seems to have been more widely prevalent in Buchanan’s time, must have played an important part in the refinement of their physical type. The great majority of the caste are occupancy or non-occupancy raiyats; some have acquired substantial tenures. In Orissa many are pradhâns, or village headmen, holding service lands; a small proportion make a livelihood as landless day-labourers; while, at the other end of the scale, the few who have risen to be considerable zamindars have managed to transform themselves into Rajputs, and cannot now be recognised as Kurmis. Two instances of this have come to notice. The zamindar of Khelar, in Nayábásan pargana of the Midnapur district, is said to have been a Kurmi, who attempted to reform his brethren by urging them to abandon the custom of widow-marriage, and to give up yoking cows to the plough. His efforts, however, were unsuccessful, and the Khelâr family now call themselves Kshatriyas, and strenuously disown all connexion with the Kurmis. Another case is that of the well-known house of Pachet in Eastern Manbhum. The Pachet Râjá claims to be a Go-bansi Rajput, and traces back his ancestry fifty-two generations to a child discovered in the woods by the Kurmis being suckled by a cow. The Kurmis of those parts say they have been there just the same number of generations, and Colonel Dalton seems to have thought that the Pachet people were probably of Kurmi extraction, basing his opinion partly on the coincidence in the number of generations, and partly on the fact that the family cannot rationally trace back their origin out of the district, while there is no particular reason for supposing them to be Bhumij or Munda. Any attempt, however, to account for the fact that hardly any Kurmi zamindars are to be found at the present day must, from the nature of the case, be purely conjectural. The settlement of the caste on the land must have taken place in very early times, and in Manbhum many Kurmis claim even now to hold their lands at a moiety of the current rates of rent, on the ground that they were the original clearers of the soil. Some of these pioneers of cultivation must in the nature of things have developed into zamindars or local Rájás; but on attaining this position they would undoubtedly set up as Rajputs, and in the course of a generation or two would be accepted locally as members of that very heterogeneous group.

1 Eastern India, i, 166.

Kurmis are excellent cultivators, and a large proportion of the raiyats who grow opium in Behar are drawn from their ranks. They are said, however, to be less painstaking and less skilful in the management of special crops than the Koiris, who show a remarkable talent for spade husbandry and all forms of gardening. Kurmis, on the other hand, are noted for their industry in the management of the staple food-crops, and are particularly successful wheat-growers. To render thanks for the harvest already reaped and garnered, as well as to ensure an abundant crop next season, the Ayodhýá sub-caste annually celebrate a harvest home in the following manner. In the centre of a piece of ground, levelled and plastered for the purpose, a lofty pole is erected, to which the cattle are tethered and made to tread out a portion of the new wheat crop. This being finished, the pole is removed and the hole filled with water, and sweetmeats (laddu) consecrated to Mahádeva and Paramesvara, after which a feast of parched barley and various kinds of confectionery is given to the Brahmans of the village. All Kurmis worship the plough at the time of the Dassahará festival.

The following statement shows the number and distribution of the Kurmis in 1872 and 1881:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
<th>DISTRICT</th>
<th>1872</th>
<th>1881</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bardwan</td>
<td>350</td>
<td>2,551</td>
<td>Chittagong</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bankura</td>
<td>325</td>
<td>11,610</td>
<td>Noakhali</td>
<td>114</td>
<td>154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birbhum</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>1,491</td>
<td>Hill Tracts</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midnapur</td>
<td>40,410</td>
<td>45,250</td>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>165,685</td>
<td>194,272</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughli</td>
<td>596</td>
<td>638</td>
<td>Gya</td>
<td>40,298</td>
<td>65,280</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howrah</td>
<td>575</td>
<td>708</td>
<td>Shahabad</td>
<td>66,540</td>
<td>69,254</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24-Parganas</td>
<td>4,275</td>
<td>2,688</td>
<td>Tirhat {Morpurpur</td>
<td>142,903</td>
<td>115,117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nadiya</td>
<td>1,204</td>
<td>2,361</td>
<td>Darbhanga</td>
<td>51,060</td>
<td>61,060</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Khulna</td>
<td>456</td>
<td>486</td>
<td>Saran</td>
<td>101,015</td>
<td>115,670</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessore</td>
<td>333</td>
<td>544</td>
<td>Champaran</td>
<td>77,641</td>
<td>67,720</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murshedabad</td>
<td>3,332</td>
<td>4,515</td>
<td>Monghyr</td>
<td>25,029</td>
<td>26,610</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dinajpur</td>
<td>460</td>
<td>2,345</td>
<td>Bhagpur</td>
<td>16,827</td>
<td>30,423</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajshahiye</td>
<td>1,460</td>
<td>2,798</td>
<td>Purush</td>
<td>6,415</td>
<td>14,578</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bangpur</td>
<td>1,360</td>
<td>4,353</td>
<td>Maldah</td>
<td>1,528</td>
<td>3,996</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bogra</td>
<td>298</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>Santal Parganas</td>
<td>9,777</td>
<td>18,240</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Patna</td>
<td>446</td>
<td>2,333</td>
<td>Cuttack</td>
<td>3,397</td>
<td>3,897</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Darjiling</td>
<td>520</td>
<td>639</td>
<td>Puri</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jalipur</td>
<td>448</td>
<td>355</td>
<td>Balasore</td>
<td>252</td>
<td>5,013</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koch Behar</td>
<td>21,581</td>
<td>31,841</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>11,581</td>
<td>19,510</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dakas</td>
<td>258</td>
<td>2,831</td>
<td>Hazaribagh</td>
<td>45,638</td>
<td>62,144</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fardipur</td>
<td>233</td>
<td>794</td>
<td>Lohardaga</td>
<td>35,888</td>
<td>45,980</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bakarganj</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>137</td>
<td>Singbhumi</td>
<td>10,967</td>
<td>7,706</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Malmaunth</td>
<td>459</td>
<td>1,723</td>
<td>Manbhum</td>
<td>157,354</td>
<td>188,380</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tipperah</td>
<td>121</td>
<td>572</td>
<td>Tributary States</td>
<td>1,947</td>
<td>14,373</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

2 M
Kurminiá, Karminiá, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kurmuri, a gáin of the Bátsya gotra of Bérendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kurnat, a section of Awadhi Hajjáms in Behar.

Kuru, the local and popular name of a fragment of the Pardhiá, a hunting sub-tribe of Savars, who are found in the south of pargana Biru in Lohardágá. The Kuru speak a dialect of Mundari, but do not eat or intermarry with Mundas, Kharias or Oraons; marriage is both infant and adult, and the practice of marrying one or both of the parties to a mango tree is in vogue. The Sarhul and Kuram festivals are observed in spring and autumn.

Kurus eat beef and pork, and it is doubtful whether they can be classed as Hindus at all, though the fact that they will take water, sweetmeats, etc., only from the hands of Brahmans, Rajputs, Rautias, Kharwars, Jhoras and Khandas, seems to indicate a desire on their part to rise in the scale of social distinction. For the most part they earn a miserable livelihood by collecting jungle products and watching the crops of their more civilised neighbours. Some, however, have taken to cultivation, and a few are recognised as having acquired Korkar rights.

Kurum, a sub-caste of, and a synonym for, Kurmi in Western India, occasionally used in Behar.

Kurumánik, a synonym for Kurmi.

Kurumbár, a sept of the Suryabansi sub-tribe of Rajputs in Behar.

Kurumbhong, the divider of the village, a sept of the Chhotahar sub-tribe of Limbus. The founder of this thar is said, for reasons not stated, to have divided his village into two parts by drawing a line down the middle.

Kurunkh, a synonym for Oraon.

Kurur, a sub-caste of Muchís in Bengal.

Kusadái or Saptagrání, a sub-caste of Támbulís in Bengal.

Kusál, a thar or sept of Newars; a section of Brahmans.

Kusalá, a gáin or sub-section of Saptasati Brahmans in Bengal.

Kusári, a gáin of the Sándilya gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Kusarpákri, a mul or section of the Chhamúli Mádesí sub-caste of Halwais in Behar.

Kusbbháíni, a sept of Rajputs in Behar.

Kusbbhansi, a sept of the Chandrabansi division of Rajputs in Behar; a title of Bágdís in Bengal.

Kushihár, a synonym for Arkasiya, q.v.
Kusiet, a mul or section of the Ghosin sub-caste of Goalès in Behar.

Kusik, a section of Káyasths in Bengal.

Kusmére-Sabás, a mul of the Káyapa section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kusmére-Dhanauli, a mul of the Káyap section of Maithil Brahmans in Behar.

Kusmetié, 1i'us-métizi, or 1i'us puira, a sub-oaste of Bagdis in Western Bengal, said to be named after the kusa grass, and apparently totemistic.

Kusro, a sept of Gonds in Chota Nagpur.

Kussum, a fruit, a totemistic sept of Bhuiyás and Kharwars in Chota Nagpur.

Kusuar, fish, a totemistic sept of Lohárs in Chota Nagpur.

Kusum, a fruit, a totemistic sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kusumbaha, kusum flower, a sept of Mundas in Chota Nagpur.

Kusumkali, a gaín of the Sándilya gotra of Rárhi Brahmans in Bengal.

Kusurn, a tree or its fruit; a sept of Chiks in Chota Nagpur.

Kusuwa, fish, a totemistic sept of Oraons in Chota Nagpur.

Kutabbháni, a pathí or hypergamous sub-group of Bárendra Brahmans in Bengal.

Kutabpur, a sub-caste of Kotás in Chota Nagpur.

Kutabpuri, a sub-caste of Telis in Bengal.

Kutár, a section of Goalès in Behar.

Kutári, Káthurá (Kuthar, an axe), a degraded sub-caste of Sutracharás who work as carpenters and also deal in lime.

Kutba, a mul or section of the Ayodhiá sub-caste of Sonárs in Behar.

Kútí, a subdivision of Mahomedans in Eastern Bengal, deriving their name from the Hindustani Kútína, to pound or beat. They are regarded as a most degraded class, it being the popular belief that they joined the ranks of Islám only a few generations ago, while, like all new converts, they are most intolerant, affecting to be more orthodox than their neighbours and regarding foreigners with extreme suspicion. They are either followers of Dúdhú Miyán, or of Mauláví Karámat Ali; and, although punctilious in their religious duties out of doors, cling to many Hindu superstitions. In October they worship the Dhenkí used for husking grain, at the same time making offerings to Lakshmi, the goddess of plenty, and every morning bowing thrice before it; while nothing, according to them, is more ominous of evil than for a stranger to sit down or to rest his foot on it. When small-pox attacks their families the Sitala pújáh is observed, the same offerings being made to the goddess as among Hindus.

Kútis are divided into the three following classes, who intermarry and hold social intercourse with each other—Páon Kútí, Háth Kútí, Chutki Kútí. The Páon Kútí, by far the most numerous, are masons, thatchers, goldsmiths, boatmen, water-carriers, but their principal occupation is husking rice. Bepári is their ordinary title, while those who are expert at weighing grain are called Kayyál, the equivalent of Dándi-dár, or weighman.

The wives of the Kútí alone among Mussulman women appear unveiled in public, making purchases in the bazar, fetching water from the river, and boiling and husking rice in the open air. Among the richer families the women are expert workers of Kashida cloth, and often take service as wet-nurses. The Páon Kútí have a pancháyat of their own, like any Hindu caste, and a headman called Sardár. The Háth Kútí pound bricks for road metal with an iron pestle or mallet, and makes surkhi for mortar. This subdivision is a small one, and is being gradually absorbed by the first.

According to Buchanan, the Chutki probably take their name from carrying about samples or a pinch (chutki) of rice to show the quality of the whole, and as all Kútí deal in rice, the designation was applied to them collectively. At the present day the usual occupation of the Chutki is extracting the kernel of the cocoanut for the manufacture of oil, and polishing the shells to make hookahs.

No respectable Mahomedan will marry, eat, or associate with the Kútí, although they are admitted into the public mosques and buried in the public graveyard. It is a plausible conjecture that the entire Kútí class may be made up of Chandálás converted to Islam, and this view gains some support from the fact that in Eastern Bengal Kútíás and Chandálás annually compete in boat races on the popular Shashthi Pújáh—a circumstance which would account for their low rank among Mahomedans.

Kutua, a sept of Chakmás in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kutunjiá, a section of Páns in Chota Nagpur.

Kwinjusa, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kyabohchá, a thar or sept of Sunuwárs in Darjiling.

Kyágchhági, a thar or sept of Mangars in Darjiling.

Kyaukmatsa, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.

Kyaukpiatsa, a sept of Maghs in the Hill Tracts of Chittagong.